upon his loins, and in his shoes that were upon his feet;" i. e. treacherously, and under pretence of peace and friendship, besprinkled his girdle and wet his shoes with the blood of these two generals, as though he had slain them in battle. "But do thou according to thy wisdom, and let not his hoar head go down to the grave in peace." I ere are three murders David mentions to Solomon as the ground of this charge, not to let him die a natural death. The one intimated, "thou knowest what he did to me," viz. when he cruelly stabbed Absalom, contrary to my immediate orders; the two others expressly mentioned, those of Abner and Amasa; on these accounts he advises him to put him to death; and I allow David's dying advice, or rather order, in this instance, to be peremptory and absolute; and, if I understand any thing of justice and equity, it was an order worthy of a good king, and fit to be given in the last moments of his life. The reader will remember, that the facts are these. Upon Abner's reconciliation with David, and bringing over the people to his interest, Joab out of revenge for his brother Asahel's death, whom Abner, forced to it by Asahel's rashness, had unwillingly slain, and probably envying him the glory of settling David on the throne of Israel, and afraid of his being placed at the head of the Hebrew army, as the reward of so signal a service, under the pretence of a friendly salutation, in the most base and cowardly manner, stabbed him unexpectedly to the heart. David highly resented this murder, followed Abner's corpse to the grave, and to show what part he would have acted immediately, had it been in his power, says: "I am this day weak, though anointed king; and these men, the sons of Zeruiah, are too hard for me. The Lord shall reward the doer of evil according to his wickedness." After the rebellion under Absalom was ended, David thought this a proper opportunity to show his displeasure to Joab; and as he imagined it would be an acceptable thing to the people of Israel, who were now zealous to restore the king to his throne, he ordered it to be signified to Amasa, who had been their general in the rebellion, that he would constitute him captain-general of his armies in the room of Joab, and actually appointed him, as such, to assemble the forces of Judah, and suppress the new insurrection under Sheba. As Amasa was returning with his troops, Joab meets him, and with a compliment and a kiss, thrust his sword through his body, and laid him at a single blow dead at his feet; and immediately usurped the command of the army, quelled the insurrection, and returned to Jerusalem.

And now, reader, let me appeal to thy conscience. Were not these two execrable murders deserving of punishment? Was the cowardly base assassin worthy to live? If he was too powerful a subject for David to bring to justice, did not David do well, and act like a righteous prince, to give it in charge to his successor, to punish, as soon as ever he had power, such a villain, according to his desert? Mr. Byle's judgment is, that David well knew that Joab deserved death, and that the suffering the assassinations, with which that man's hands were polluted, to go unpunished, was a flagrant injury done to the laws and to justice. With what truth then can it be said, that David delivered two murders in charge to his son Solomon; one of them to be executed on his old faithful general, Joab? Was it charging Solomon to murder a man, to order him to put to death a criminal, for having basely committed two most execrable murders? Or is the doing justice on murderers and assassins committing murder? Or is the representation just, that this order, viz. to murder Joab, was afterwards fulfilled in the basest manner, by the administrator to this pious testament? Judge, reader, and be thyself a witness to the manner of Joab's execution, which is thus stigmatized with the epithet of basest. Solomon, in obedience to his father's directions, gives orders to Benaiah to put Joab to death in these words. "Fall on him, that thou mayest take away the innocent blood which Joab shed, from me, and from the house of my father; and the Lord shall return his blood upon his own head, who fell upon two men, more righteous and better than himself, and slew them with the sword, my father David knowing nothing thereof." Solomon was now king, firmly fixed on the throne, and had it in his power to execute justice on the greatest offenders; and remembering, I doubt not, how Saul's house was punished for the innocent blood of the Gibeonites which he spilt, he was willing to secure himself and family from a like vengeance. He would have been in some measure chargeable with Joab's guilt, had he refused to punish it when it was in his power; and especially, as he had it in charge from his father to execute the vengeance on him that his crime deserved. But where shall we here fix the character of basest? What, on Solomon's command to take away the guilt of innocent blood from himself and his father's house; or on his ordering the execution of the man that shed it, the man that slew two men, more righteous and better than himself; or on God's returning his own blood upon his head; or, on his ordering Joab to be slain at the horns of the altar, and not permitting even the altar of God himself to be an asylum for murderers; or, on his appointing Benaiah, the captain of his host, to execute justice on this treacherous assassin? This was the manner in which Solomon performed his father's orders, in an open public manner, appealing to God for the reasons of his conduct, and by a hand too honourable for the wretch that fell by it. And is this, what it hath been termed, putting a man to death in the basest manner? Is not this condemning, as a piece of villainy, a most exemplary instance of royal justice, and exhibited in such a manner as showed a regard to religion, conscience, honour, and the prosperity of his government and people?

But in order to show David's ingratitude to Joab in ordering Solomon to punish him for the murder of Abner, it hath been urged that it appears, that Joab, uniting his revenge with the dead, acted basely for David's service. Supposing it. Doth it follow, that David's ordering the execution of a base and treacherous assassin was baseness and ingratitude, because the assassination was intended for his service? I do not understand this morality. I should rather raise a panegyric upon a prince, who should order a treacherous assassin to execution, notwithstanding the pretence of the assassin's intending to serve him by the villainy; than on one, who should protect a villain from the punishment of treachery and murder, because he intended to serve, or actually served him by these notorious crimes. But the supposition itself, that Joab murdered Abner for David's service is without any foundation, and contradicted by the whole history of that affair. For this asserts once and again, that Joab murdered Abner in revenge for his brother Asahel's death. And as to his expostulating with David on the imprudence of trusting Abner, saying, He came to deceive thee, and to know thy going out, and thy coming in, and all that thou dost; David had all the reason in the world to look on this charge against Abner as a mere calumny. For Abner, before ever he had waited on David, had brought the elders of Israel to a resolution to accept of David for their king, and he came to inform him of this transaction. Abner went also to speak in the ears of David all that seemed good to Israel, and that seemed good to the whole house of Benjamin; i. e. all that had been agreed on between Abner and the tribes in reference to David. So that Joab's charge of treachery against Abner was contrary to the strongest evidence of his integrity, and only a pretence to colour over that murder of him which he intended. Joab knew very well the intention of Abner's interview with David; for he was informed that he had been with the king, and that he had sent him away in peace; and he expostulated with the king for this dismissing him, that he came only to deceive him. And therefore his murdering Abner could be with no intention to serve David, but to execute his own revenge and serve himself; for no transaction could have been at that time more directly contrary to David's interest, as the tribes would naturally resent so cruel a breach of faith, as the treacherous assassination of their own general and ambassador to David, sent by them to fix the terms on which they would receive him for their king; and it was a thousand to one, that, in their fury, they had not broke off all treaty with him, and with their united forces opposed his accession to the throne of Israel. What prevented this was, David's so solemnly and publicly clearing himself of having any hand in the murder, and showing, to the fullest satisfaction of the people, that it was wholly the contrivance of Joab, and perpetrated by him without his privity and consent.

Had Abner lived to have finished this great revolution in favour of David, and actually settled him on the throne of Israel, Abner ought in justice to have continued in the command of the army. This Joab could not be ignorant of, and therefore, uniting his revenge with his ambition, he assassinated Abner, to free himself from a rival in power and his prince's favour, and secure himself in the chief command. He acted just the same infamous part afterward, when he assassinated Amasa, because David had promised him to make him general of the army in Joab's room; and this strengthens the probability, or rather renders it certain, that he murdered Abner, not only out of revenge for his brother's death, but also from the same cause of jealousy, envy, and ambition. And indeed Josephus will not so much as allow, that even the revenging Asahel's death was any thing more than a pretence for Joab's murdering Abner, but says, that the true cause was, his being afraid of losing the generalship, the favour of his master, and being succeeded by Abner in both.

It is further objected, that Joab was really ill used in the affair of Amasa. But to me it appears, that he was used no otherwise than he deserved. It is true he gained the victory over the rebels; but the merit of this victory he destroyed by a base and infamous murder, contrary to the express command of his sovereign. For David charged Joab and Abishai, and all his officers, before the engagement: Deal gently, for my sake, with the young man, even with Absalom. Had Joab cut him off in the heat of the battle, he would have had somewhat to have alleged in his defence. But nothing could argue greater insolence and contempt of the king's order than Joab's conduct on this occasion. For when one of the army informed him he saw Absalom hanging by the hair in a tree, Joab replies: "Why didst thou not smite him there to the ground, and I would have given thee ten shekels of silver and a girdle?" The soldier answered him with a noble spirit of loyalty: "Though I should receive a thousand shekels of silver, I would not put forth my hand against the king's son; for, in our hearing the king charged thee, and Abishai, and Itai, saying, Beware, that none touch the young man Absalom; otherwise I should have wrought falsehood against my own life, and thou thyself would have set thyself against me." But what doth the loyal Joab do after this warning? He said: I may not tarry thus with thee. Tell me no more of the king's orders. I have something else to do; and immediately he took three darts in his hand, and thrust them through the body of Absalom, while he was hanging alive in the midst of the oak. Could there be a greater insult offered to the king than this? Or, a more treasonable violation of his orders? Or, a more deliberate and aggravated murder committed? Would any prince have endured this? Or, ought he to have pardoned even a victorious general, after such an audacious cruel instance of disobedience? But not content with this, he carries his insolence to the king further, and keeps no measures of decency with him. For, upon David's mourning over his rebel son, Joab imperiously reproaches him: "Thou hast showed this day the faces of all thy servants which this day have saved thy life, and the lives of thy sons, and daughters, and wives; in that thou lovest thine enemies, and hatest thy friends. For thou hast declared this day, that thou regardest neither princes nor servants; for this day I perceive, that if Absalom had lived, and all we had died this day, then it had pleased thee well;" and then, to complete his audacious insolence, threatens with an oath to dethrone him, if he did not do as he ordered him. "Now therefore arise, go forth, and speak comfortably to thy servants; for I swear by the Lord, if thou go not forth, there shall not tarry one with thee this night; I will cause the whole army to revolt from thee before morning; and that will be worse unto thee than all the evil that befell thee from thy youth until now." I will appeal to all men, that know what duty or decency means, whether Joab, after such a behaviour to his sovereign, was fit to be continued general of the forces: and, whatever might be his merits in other respects, whether any prince, who consulted his own honour and safety, would not take the first opportunity to humble and break him? The opportunity came. Amasa, the general of the rebel army, brought Jerusalem and Judah back to their allegiance, and, according to David's promise, was constituted captain-general in the room of Joab. In defiance of this appointment, Joab, to get rid of his rival, like a coward and poltron, under pretence of peace, and a friendly salutation, ripped open Amasa's belly, and shed out his bowels upon the ground. But it is said, to extenuate Joab's guilt, that he confined his resentment to his rival.

What then? Is a cowardly murder to be pardoned, because committed on a rival? Do not the laws of God and man call for an exemplary punishment of such an atrocious offender? Are not such treacherous cruelties, though practised towards a rival, offences of a public nature, a breach of that allegiance which men owe to their princes, and a capital violation of the sacred laws of government? David, it is plain, thought so; and though Joab was too powerful a subject for him to call to an immediate account, yet to show that he had never forgiven it, he orders Solomon, agreeable to all the rules of honour and justice, to punish him as he deserved for his numerous treasons and murders. But we are told that "it will avail nothing to plead the private faults of the man. We are now to consider him as relative to David in his public capacity, as his old faithful general, who powerfully assisted him on all occasions, and who adhered to him in all his extremities; in which light we must loathe the master, who died meditating black ingratitude against so faithful, so useful a servant." I would ask: If David had had power, and had ordered the execution of Joab, immediately upon the assassination of Abner, or of Amasa, whether his master David ought to have been loathed on that account, because Joab had been an old faithful servant? If it should be said, that he ought to have been loathed for it, the doctrine advanced is this: that whatever person hath been an old faithful servant, or general, to any prince, and powerfully assisted him upon all occasions; and murders, presuming on his own power, and past services, through malice, revenge, or ambition, by a secret stab, and under the pretence of friendship, one or two of the principal officers of the kingdom; the prince, whom he serves, becomes an object of loathing and abhorrence, and is guilty of black ingratitude, if he resolves on his death, and actually executes him, as such a base and treacherous assassination deserves. No man, I believe, will coolly assert this. If it is said, that David ought not to have been loathed, but commended, if he had then ordered his execution; I think it cannot be true, that because Joab had been an old faithful general, &c., we ought to loathe David for ingratitude, for meditating Joab's punishment while he lived, and expressly ordering it just before his death; for whatever it was just for him to do, it was just for him to order to be done; inasmuch as he really did himself what Solomon did by his order; and because an act, that is just to-day, cannot become unjust merely by being deferred till to-morrow, or the most convenient opportunity of performing it. But it is said, that it will avail nothing to plead the private faults of Joab. What were the murder of Abner, who had just brought over the eleven tribes to submit to David, and the assassination of Amasa, appointed general of the national forces, at the head of his troops, private faults? High treason, murder, and felony, private faults! What then can be public ones, and what faults can be aggravated with any more heinous circumstances than these?

But it avails nothing, it seems, to plead these private faults, in vindication of David's ordering him to be put to death by his successor; because we are to consider him as relative to David in his public capacity. Very right: David in his public capacity was king of Israel, and Joab in his public capacity stood related to him as his general, and assisted him, and adhered to him in all extremities. David therefore, in his public capacity, was obliged, by the laws of God and man, to punish assassinations and murders; and Joab, in his public capacity, as general, was an assassin and murderer; and therefore David, in his public capacity, as king, was obliged to punish Joab with death, in his public capacity, as general, assassin, and murderer. If Joab had been his faithful general, and frequently assisted David in his extremities, private obligations are in their nature inferior, and ought to give way to public ones; and the yielding up such an offender to public justice, when personal obligations might have been pleaded by the prince in his favour, was a nobler sacrifice in its nature, and renders David's merits, as a prince, the more illustrious, and himself more worthy the character of the man after God's own heart. And this Mr. Bayle thinks David ought to have done sooner, and says, that notwithstanding Joab deserved death, yet that he kept his place; he was brave, he served the king his master faithfully, and to good purpose, and dangerous discontents might be apprehended if he attempted to punish him. These were the political reasons which made the law give place to utility. But when David had no further use for that general, he gave orders that he should be put to death. So that Mr. Bayle blames David, not for ordering Joab to be put to death at last, but for deferring to do it so long, through reasons of policy, and ordering it only when those reasons of policy subsisted no longer. I would here just observe, that what Mr. Bayle calls political reasons were really reasons of necessity. For Joab was too powerful a subject to bring to justice. He attempted it twice, by turning him out from being general. But he restored himself to his command by murder and treason, in spite of David, who seized the very first opportunity, after Joab's power was broken, of ordering his execution.

It should be added also on this head, that whatever Joab's past services were to David, and however faithful he had formerly been to him, yet he had now been engaged in a treasonable conspiracy against him, to set aside the intended succession to the crown, and had actually proclaimed Adonijah king of Israel during his father's life; altogether without, and even contrary to his consent. And it is allowed, that David had on this account justifiable cause for chagrin. And it is certain, that Joab's treason, in endeavouring to depose the good old king, and advance an ambitious youth into his throne, was just reason for chagrin. And therefore as Joab added rebellion to murder, David did justly, in his last moments, to order his execution by his son and successor, and he would neither have been a wise or a righteous prince, had he forgotten or refused to do it. When it is said, that Joab had not appeared against him in actual hostility, and that his defection may admit of being interpreted into a patronisation of that particular plan for the succession, rather than into a rebellion against David, it is in part not true in fact. To proclaim any person king, in opposition to the reigning king, is an overt act of rebellion, and therefore of real hostility. This Joab did, and had not the design been seasonably prevented, by the loyalty and prudence of Nathan, further hostilities must have been immediately committed; David himself at least confined, and Solomon, his intended successor, actually put to death. The plan of the succession, concerted by Joab, in favour of Adonijah, was, in every view of it, a treasonable one. It was a plan formed without the consent of the nation, without the knowledge of David, and the appointment of God. David had, a considerable while before this, solemnly sworn to Bathsheba, that Solomon her son should reign after him, and sit upon his throne in his stead; and tells all the nobles and officers of his kingdom, that as the Lord God of Israel had chosen him, among the sons of his father, to be king over all Israel, so, of all his sons, God had chosen Solomon to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over all Israel. To patronise therefore any other plan of succession, and actually to take measures to execute that plan, was breaking out into open rebellion; and the favourers, abettors, patrons; and aiders, in such a plan, were traitors to their king and country, and in all nations would have been punished as such; and should it be pleaded in excuse of such persons, that their defection to patronise such a plan of succession, was not a rebellion, it would be treated with the contempt it deserved; and as a defection from a prince is a revolt from him, and a revolt a rebellion, they would probably be told, that they should have the choice of being hanged for a defection, or rebellion, just as they pleased.

I shall only take notice further, on this head, that David, in his lamentation for Abner, had declared the Lord to be the rewarder of evil-doers; by this expression referring the punishment of Joab to the Lord. And the inference that hath been made from hence is, that David having enjoyed the benefit of Joab's services through his life, he having been his right hand all along, gratitude, after such an attachment, ought to have influenced David to have left him to the justice of God, and not have bequeathed him death, as a legacy for his long friendship. But David did not bequeath him death for his friendship, but for his repeated treasons and murders; which no just principle of gratitude will ever shelter; since no services, public or private, can be a compensation for these impious violations of the laws of God and man, and ought not to hinder the progress of justice in the execution of such notorious offenders; and were kings and princes to act according to this notion of gratitude, the peace, order, and safety of society, could not possibly be maintained. Besides, as David declared the Lord to be the rewarder of evil-doers, so he really left it to the providence of God to reward Joab, by not punishing him himself, but by waiting for the proper opportunity to give him his reward, when it could be done consistently with his own safety, and the peace of his kingdom. Joab's defection or rebellion in favour of Adonijah, and Solomon's establishment on the throne, furnished this opportunity, and the providence of God, by these means, brought on the punishment he had long deserved. Let Solomon explain his father's meaning in the very order he gives for Joab's execution. The king said to Benahai: "Fall upon him . . . that thou mayest take away the innocent blood which Joab shed, from me and the house of my father, and the Lord shall return his blood upon his own head, who fell upon two men more righteous and better than himself, and slew them with the sword." David therefore left Joab to the justice of God, and God executed justice on him by Solomon's order; and the hand of providence was very remarkable in this transaction; in that, had Joab's treason, in patronising Adonijah's usurpation, succeeded, Joab would have escaped with impunity; for Adonijah, no doubt, out of gratitude to Joab, would have forgiven him his murders, for the sake of his services. David's meaning, therefore, in declaring that the Lord would reward the evil-doers, could be no other than that in which Solomon understood it: That though Joab was too powerful for him, at that time, to punish, yet that God would not suffer him finally to escape; but that, sooner or later, in the course of his providence, he would bring the punishment on him which he so richly deserved. And this Joab experienced, since the very measures he took in the close of David's reign, to secure himself from it, fixed his doom, and proved his destruction. David's conduct therefore, in this instance, is no proof that his repentance for his sins was not sincere, nor any argument that he had not forgiven his enemies, as far as he ought to do it, and did not die in charity with all mankind, as far as that charity ought to be extended. If a prince's charity influences him, living or dying, to pardon repeated offences, inconsistent with the public safety and peace, such as assassinations and treasons, it is folly and weakness, and not virtuous charity; it is cruelty to his people, instead of real generosity and goodness. David had not this charity, and it heightens his character that he had not. His last charge to Solomon shows his inviolable regard to justice, by positively ordering the execution of a murderer, who was too powerful for himself to punish; and the order was executed by Solomon, in a manner worthy a wise, a just, and a great prince; or, worthy the son of such a father.—CHANDLER.

Ver. 7. But show kindness unto the sons of Barzillai the Gileadite, and let them be of those that eat at thy table: for so they came to me when I fled because of Absalom thy brother.

At public entertainments in the courts of eastern kings, many of their nobles have a right to a seat, others are admitted occasionally by special favour. In this sense Chardin understands the dying charge of David to his successor, to show kindness to the sons of Barzillai the Gileadite, and to let them be of those that should eat at his table. He means not that they should eat at his table at every meal, or on every day, but only on days of public festivity. In the same light, he views the conduct of the king of Babylon to the captive monarch of Judah: "Evil-Merodach spake kindly to Jehoiakim, and set his throne above the throne of the kings that were with him in Babylon; and changed his prison-garments, and he did eat bread continually before him all the days of his life." He received a daily allowance from the king suitable to his high station, and the value which Evil-Merodach had for him; besides this, he had a seat at all the public entertainments of the court. The eastern custom explains the reason that David was not expected at Saul's table, till the day of the new moon; he did not sit at the king's table every day, but according to established usage, he had a right, and was expected to be present in his allotted seat on the day of a public and solemn festival. In the same manner, though Mephibosheth was to sit at David's table on all public occasions, yet he wanted the produce of his lands for food at other times. It was therefore very proper to mention the circumstances to Ziba, that he might understand it would be necessary for him to bring the produce of the lands to Jerusalem, and in sufficient quantity to support Mephibosheth in a style suitable to the dignity of one who had a right, by the royal grant, to appear at court, and sit at the king's table on public occasions: "Thou, therefore, and thy sons, and thy servants, shall till the land for him; and thou shalt bring in the fruits, that thy master's son may have food to eat; but Mephibosheth thy master's son shall eat bread always at my table."—PAXTON.

Ver. 8. And, behold, thou hast with thee Shimei the son of Gera, a Benjamite of Bahurim, which cursed me with a grievous curse in the day when I went to Mahanaim: but he came down to meet me at Jordan, and I swear to him by the Lord, saying, I will not put thee to death with the sword. 9. Now therefore hold him not guiltless; for thou art a wise man, and knowest what thou oughtest to do unto him; but his hoar head bring thou down to the grave with blood.

After the charge to Solomon, to execute the due punishment on Joab, for his numerous and aggravated crimes, David gives him another, relative to Shimei the Benjamite, who, as hath been already observed, when the king was in his flight from Jerusalem, to prevent his falling into Absalom's hands, met him, railed at, and cursed David in his journey; and as he went on, had the further insolence to pelt him with stones, and dust him with dust, crying out to the king, "Come out, come out, thou bloody man, and thou man of Belial. The Lord hath returned upon thee all the blood of the house of Saul, in whose stead thou hast reigned; and the Lord hath delivered the kingdom into the hand of Absalom thy son; and behold thou art taken in thy mischief, because thou art a bloody man." This, as Mr. Bayle says, is a small specimen of the abuses to which David was exposed among the friends of Saul; they accused him of being a man of blood, and looked on the rebellion of Absalom as a just punishment for the mischiefs which they said David had done to Saul and his whole family. But surely an abuse and insult of a more atrocious and insolent nature was never offered to a prince; an insult the viler, as it had no foundation in reality or truth to support it. He twice styles him a bloody man; and tells him, that because he had reigned in the stead of Saul, the Lord had returned on him all the blood of the house of Saul. The reader will observe, that this transaction was before the affair of the Gibeonites; and therefore this circumstance could not enter into Shimei's thoughts, nor be any reason for his charging David with being a bloody man, and having the blood of Saul's house returned on him. Now, in what other respects could David be guilty of the blood of Saul's house? Saul's three eldest sons were slain with him in a battle with the Philistines, in which David was not present. The only remaining son that Saul had was Ishbosheth, whom Abner made king in Saul's room, in opposition to David, who was raised to the throne by the house of Judah. Ishbosheth was killed by two of his captains, whom David put to death for that treason and murder; and Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, the only remaining one, was restored to his patrimony, and, in all things, treated as one of David's own sons; and Saul's line by him, the eldest branch, continued down through many generations. The charge therefore that David was a bloody man, because the blood of the house of Saul was upon him, was a scandal and a lie, and uttered in the madness of the passion and malice of a man, who, being of Saul's house and family, was enraged to see that family rejected from the throne, and David advanced to it in their stead.

Mr. Bayle himself acknowledges, that in the friends of Saul carried things too far in these reproaches against David. And yet, as though he had made too large a concession in his favour, he doth, in a manner, retract it, by adding: "It is true, that, by the testimony of God himself, David was a man of blood, for which reason God would not permit him to build the temple." But, by Mr. Bayle's good leave, David was not a man of blood, by any testimony of God himself; nor doth either of the places he cites in proof of it, prove any such thing. The expression which Shimei made use of to revile David was, איש דמים, Thou art a man of blood; an expression always used, I think, in a bad sense, to denote a cruel bloody man. But God never gave this character to David. What God said of him was that he had been a man of wars, איש מלחמה and hast shed blood; or, as it is elsewhere expressed: Thou hast shed much blood, and hast made great wars. Now the shedding of blood implies nothing criminal, except it be shed in sine causa, without reason or cause; innocent blood, as our version renders; and this very expression is used, in the same verse, in the criminal and in the good sense, to denote murder, and the justly putting the murderer to death. "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." If then David's wars were just and necessary, the blood he shed in them was not his crime; and it is evident, that when David told his son, and afterward all the princes and officers of his kingdom, that the reason why God would not permit him to build his house, was because he had shed much blood in his wars; he did not mention it to them as a reproach, or any crime imputed to him by God. Indeed this could not be the case, because, immediately after God had assigned this reason why he would not permit him to do it, yet, without in the least blaming him, he graciously gave him a proof of his peculiar favour, by assuring him, that his son should build his house, should long enjoy prosperity and peace, and that the throne of his kingdom over Israel should be established for ever. Mr. Bayle urges it as a further reason of David's being a bloody man, or else he introduces it for no' purpose at all, that, to appease the Gibeonites, he delivered up to them two sons, and five grandsons of Saul, who were all seven hanged. Had Mr. Bayle told, as he ought to have done, the reason of David's delivering them up, it would have been no proof of his delighting in blood. He did it not by choice, but by necessity, and a divine order. As therefore God never charged David with being a man of blood, this charge, as thrown on him by Shimei, was false and injurious; and the observation, that "here an opportunity may be taken to introduce a circumstance, which is so far material, as it serves to show, that the sanctity of David was not quite so universally assented to, as may be imagined, while he was living, and his actions not only fresh in memory, but more perfectly known, than was prudent to transmit to these distant ages," is quite groundless and injudicious. For how doth the being reviled and cursed by one interested and disappointed person, and charged with crimes for which there is no foundation, but many strong concurring circumstances to show the falsehood of the charge; how doth this, I say, serve to prove, that David's sanctity was not so universally assented to, as may be imagined? It is no proof that Shimei himself believed the truth of his own reproaches; nothing being more common than for men, in the extravagance and fury of passion, to vent many things, which they well know they have not any foundation for affirming: much less doth it serve to show that David deserved these reproaches; and, least of all, that others believed them just, and had as bad an opinion of him, as Shimei who reviled him. If this be argument, then I will, to the fullest conviction, demonstrate, that David's sanctity was, while he lived, thought as great as any body imagines. For, in the first place, Jonathan tells Saul; "He hath not sinned against thee, his works have been to thee ward very good." In the next place, Saul, his professed enemy, acknowledges David's innocence, and that he was a more righteous man than himself, and that in persecuting him, "he had played the fool, and erred exceedingly." Nay, Shimei himself, upon whose railing against David this notable observation I am remarking upon is grounded, retracts all he had said, owns himself a slanderer and a liar, and begs pardon for his abusive impudence. "Let not my lord impute iniquity unto me, nor remember what his servant did perversely; for thy servant doth know that I have sinned." From hence I argue: If Shimei's reproaching David shows his sanctity was not quite so universally assented to, as may be imagined, while he was living, therefore, a fortiori, Jonathan's, and Saul's, and Shimei's testimony, to David's innocence and righteousness, serves to show, that the sanctity of David was really as universally assented to, as hath been imagined, while he was living, and all his actions fresh in memory. I must beg leave also to add, that as Shimei owned himself to be a lying, slanderous, iniquitous varlet, and that the charge of David's being "a man of blood, and guilty of the blood of Saul's house," was an iniquitous, perverse calumny; that charge destroys its own credit and truth; and instead of serving to show that David's sanctity was not quite so universally assented to, as may be imagined, while he was yet living, rather serves to show that it was. For, as there are several unquestionable evidences to his integrity and virtue, of persons that knew him well, and were his contemporaries; as friends and enemies have given their united testimony in his favour, and there is but one evidence to the contrary, and that a lying one, upon record, who retracted his own charge publicly, and begged pardon for the falsehood of it; the sanctity of David's character in the opinion of the public, while he lived, stands unimpeached; and Shimei's infamous calumny against him, refuted and falsified by himself, can never, with justice, be pressed into the service against David to defame his reputation. As to the suspicion here thrown in, that David's "actions, when fresh in memory, and perfectly known, were worse than have been represented, or was prudent to transmit to these distant ages;" surely this must have been a very unreasonable one, if the actions that have been transmitted to these ages are such, as justify the charges brought against David, and the splendid character given him, of usurper, ungrateful, perfidious, perjured, whose conscience was his slave and his drudge, a tyrant, a Nero; in a word, a monster and a devil. Can he be painted in worse colours than these? Or do the enemies of David suspect the representations they have made of the actions recorded, as injurious and false, and want further materials to bespatter one of the greatest and best of princes! But they needed no further memoirs to assist them. For, in spite of Shimei, and though he had retracted all his curses and calumnies, yet the world is told, after reciting Shimei's blasphemies: "This is pathetic, and truly characteristic of the tyrant," to whom the speech was addressed. But David's real character was quite the reverse of a tyrant. He never oppressed his subjects; but when he reigned over Israel, executed justice and judgment among all his people; and, perhaps, there never was a prince of greater humanity and clemency, or that gave more shining and disinterested proofs of it, than David, though he hath been characterized as the vilest of men, and the worst of tyrants.

Shimei himself was one illustrious proof of this. For when David's officers would have effectually silenced his reproaches, by putting the brawler to death, as he really deserved, what saith this Nero of the Hebrews! See, reader, the lineaments of his blood-thirsty disposition, in his reply to Abishai: "Let him curse. For if the Lord hath said unto him, curse David, who shall then say, wherefore hast thou done so? Behold, my son, which came forth of my bowels, seeketh my life. How much more now may this 'Benjamin do it? Let him alone, and let him curse, if the Lord hath bidden him. It may be that the Lord will look on my affliction, and that the Lord will requite me good for his cursing this day." In this grievous calamity, David could not but see the hand of God, it was now falling heavy on him for his great sin in the affair of Uriah, and therefore ascribes the curses of Shimei to his immediate permission, and, in some measure, even to his appointment; as he was now reduced to that low condition, through the effect of his displeasure, as that this wretched dard to pour out these undeserved calumnies against him. This shows the moderation and great command of his temper, who would deny himself the vengeance due to such an outrageous insult on his person and character. Oh! how perfect a picture doth this exhibit to us of a Nero, and who can help discerning and admiring the happy resemblance!

But it was not, it seems, piety, or humanity and goodness of heart in David, but policy and prudence, that prompted him to preserve Shimei's life. For so we are told: "Some of his retinue were at the point of silencing this brawler with the ultima ratio regum; but David prevented it; wisely considering this was not a season for proceeding to extremities." Why, what was there in the season to prevent David from punishing a treasonable reviler and brawler as he deserved? What would David's cause and interest have suffered by permitting a single person to be put to death, for a crime that made him worthy of it? There is but one possible inconvenieny that would have attended it, and that is, there would have been wanting one noble instance of his generous disposition, and the government of his passions; which is now recorded, to do honour to his memory, and heighten the glory of his truly illustrious character. But supposing that this was not a season for proceeding to extremities, yet when David recovered his throne, and had Shimei fully in his power, this surely was a season for David's coming to any just extremities that he pleased, and he did not want very powerful advisers to make use of them; for Abishai said to him: "Shall not Shimei be put to death for this, because he hath cursed the Lord's anointed?" And is there any one man in the world, that would not have applauded David's justice, in ordering to execution a wretch that had cursed and pelted him with stones in his adversity? It is true, Shimei owned his fault, and, as it is expressed, reflecting on David's vindictive temper, came to make his submission, and petition forgiveness. This persuasion, one would think, would certainly have kept Shimei from ever coming near him, and forced him to seek safety by flight. I should rather have imagined, that, reflecting on David's merciful and forgiving temper, and the experience he had lately of it, in David's not permitting his officers to cut him off, when he was actually cursing and stoning him, he made his submission, and petitioned for mercy. If David had been the vindictive Nero, which he hath been represented to be, Shimei's owning his fault would not have been his security, and he would have paid dearly for the scurrility of his abusive tongue; especially as he was one of Saul's family, whom, it is said, lest they should hereafter prove thorns in his side, he concluded it expedient to cut off. But notwithstanding this expediency, David accepted his acknowledgments, and told him with an oath: "Thou shalt not die."

But what shall we think, it is said, when we see this Nero of the Hebrews die in a manner uniform and consistent with the whole course of his life? What will be our reflections, when we find him, with his last accents, delivering two murders in charge to his son Solomon? One against Joab, the other against Shimei, which we are now to consider. The charge that David gave to Solomon concerning him runs thus: "And behold thou hast with thee Shimei, the son of Gera, a Benjamite of Bahurim, which cursed me with a grievous curse, in the day when I went to Mahanaim; but I swore to him by the Lord, saying, I will not put thee to death with the sword. Now therefore hold him not guiltless, for thou art a wise man, and knowest what thou oughtest to do unto him; but his hoar head bring thou down to the grave with blood." This is the ground of the accusation brought against David; that when he lay on his death-bed, where all mankind resign their resentments and animosities, his latest breath was employed in dictating this posthumous murder to his son Solomon. My reader will not forget who Shimei was; of the house and family of Saul; that he was a person of great power and influence in the tribe of Benjamin, of whom he had a thousand in his train, when he made his submission to David upon his restoration; and that the manner in which he accosted David, when fleeing from Jerusalem, discovered the inward rancour of his heart, and his readiness to join in any measures to distress and disturb his government, and cause the crown to revert to the house of Saul. Therefore David puts Solomon in mind, that Shimei cursed him with a grievous curse, in the day that he went down to Mahanaim; that he was an implacable enemy to his person and family, one who was not to be trusted, and would not fail to show his hatred upon any proper occasion. It appears further by the expression: "Behold thou hast with thee Shimei;" that he was now in Jerusalem; and that therefore David thought this a proper opportunity of confining him, that he might not spread disaffection to Solomon's government, among those of his own tribe, or of any of the other tribes of Israel; a precaution the more necessary in the infancy of Solomon's reign, and as some of his brethren were inclined to dispute with him the succession to the crown; and therefore David said: "But now do not thou hold him guiltless;" i. e. though I forgive him, and swore to him that he should not die, do not thou let him go off, do not leave him at liberty, nor treat him as an innocent man, that is reconciled to my family, and thy successor in the throne of Israel. He is Shimei still, and wants nothing but a fair opportunity to declare it. He is now with thee. Hold him fast, keep him continually under thine eye to prevent his doing any mischief; and if thou findest him guilty of any malpractices, his hoar head bring thou down to the grave with blood; cut him off as an old offender, and dangerous enemy, to secure thy own peace, and the safety of thy government.

Further, David's telling Solomon that he swore to Shimei by the Lord, that he would not put him to death for his outrage and treason, is a demonstrative proof, that he did not advise Solomon to put him to death for the crime that he himself had solemnly forgiven him. For can any one imagine, that David should tell Solomon, that he had sworn by the Lord not to put Shimei to death, and, in the same breath, order him, in defiance of the oath, to be put to death by Solomon? Common decency and prudence would have made him conceal the circumstance of the oath, unless he intended to brand himself publicly for the grossest perfidy and perjury; or, what is the real truth, to prevent Solomon from putting Shimei to death, in resentment for a crime for which he had solemnly sworn he would never execute him; and therefore it may be allowed Mr. Bayle, that strictly speaking, a man, who promises his enemy his life, doth not acquit himself of that promise, when he orders him to be put to death by his will. But this doth not affect David's integrity, who either never promised him absolutely his life, or never gave any positive orders by his will to execute him. I add therefore, that the words themselves, when rightly rendered, imply no such order. The common rendering of them is: His hoar head bring thou down to the grave with blood. But it is a better interpretation, and supported by parallel passages, if we render them, Bring down his gray hairs to the grave for blood, or for being guilty of it. Shimei was a man in blood, intentionally murdering the king, and who actually attempted it by stoning him; and, on that account, deserved to be put to death. Now, though David could not order Solomon to put him to death for this attempt, because he had forgiven him, yet he might justly urge it, as a reason why Solomon should keep a constant strict guard over him, in order to prevent him from any seditious practices, or put him to death, if he found him guilty of any. The authors of the critical remarks give another turn to the words, which may be justified also by many other places of like nature. They would have the middle words put into a parenthesis, and the negative particle A L repeated in the last clause from the first; thus: "Now therefore do not hold him guiltless (for thou art a wise man, and knowest what thou oughtest to do for him,) but do not bring down his hoary head with blood." I would propose a little alteration in the reading of the prefix vav. "Do not hold him guiltless, (for thou art a wise man,) nor bring down his hoary head with blood." According to this translation, David's direction to Solomon will be: That he should not put Shimei to death for having cursed him, because he had forgiven him upon oath; but, at the same time, should not hold him guiltless; leaving it to Solomon's wisdom to inflict a proper punishment on him, provided it was not a capital one. If David had intended that Solomon should immediately put him to death, there would be no sense nor reason in what David adds: "Thou art a wise man, and knowest what thou oughtest to do to him;" which is evidently the same thing as saying: I give thee no particular directions about him, only observe him. Thou art a wise man, and knowest how to manage him, and to thy prudence and care I entirely leave him. This is the natural proper meaning of the expression, which cannot be construed into any other sense, without doing violence to the words. Now, to what purpose was it to tell Solomon, that he knew how to behave to Shimei, if David's command was immediately to cut him off, and Solomon understood him in this sense? The thing is absurd in its nature, and there can be no meaning in a charge of this kind, viz. giving any man an absolute order to put another to death for a crime, and, in the same breath, leaving him entirely to the management of his own wisdom and prudence, to put him to death or not. If he gave a positive order for his death, he did not leave him to Solomon's wisdom; and if he left him to Solomon's wisdom, as he certainly did, he did not give him any positive order for his death.

It is certain that Solomon did not understand his father in this sense, of putting Shimei to death for his treason at Mahanaim; but only that he should have a watchful eye over him, and prevent him from all seditious practices for the future. For what doth Solomon do after his father's death? What, instantly put Shimei to death? No, but as a wise man, who knew what he ought to do to him, orders him to build a house for himself at Jerusalem; where he confines him that he might be perpetually under his inspection, and I bound him by an oath never to go further out of it than to the brook Kidron; telling him, that whenever he passed it, he should surely die. This is further evident from the different manner in which Solomon treated Joab and Shimei. Joab he immediately, on his accession, put to death, because David could be understood in no other sense; in the charge he gave concerning him, but absolutely to cut him off; for he gives no intimation that he had pardoned him, or that he left it to his son's prudence to do with him as he should think proper; but says peremptorily, after recounting the two murders he had committed: Do thou according to thy wisdom. Do justice on him, and thereby show thyself a wise man, and let not his hoar head go down to the grave in peace. Now if the charge had been the same in reference to Shimei as it was to Joab, what should have prevented Solomon from immediately executing Shimei as well as Joab? Solomon had much less to apprehend from executing Shimei, than Joab. Joab had an interest in the army, and had David's sons, and the high-priest of his party, which Shimei could not have, as he was a powerful man of the house of Saul; a circumstance this, however, enough to incline a jealous prince to get rid of him if he fairly could do it. And if Solomon had David's positive order to do it, the regard to his father's command, and the rules of policy, would have engaged him to have immediately executed him. But this Solomon, in his wisdom, knew he could not do; for David told him that he had pardoned Shimei to prevent his execution, because his offence was personal, and David had a right to forgive it. But he had never pardoned Joab, nor in justice could do it; because he was guilty of death, for repeated murders, by the laws of God and man. Solomon therefore acted wisely and justly in putting Joab to death, and showed his prudence in reference to Shimei, by sparing him; but honourably confining him, that he might have the proper security for his future good behaviour. But to this it is objected, that the executing Joab, and sparing Shimei, was owing to a different cause from what I have now assigned. For Joab, by joining the party of Adonijah, had furnished the pretence for putting him to death, which Shimei doth not appear to have done. Joab therefore was assassinated, and Shimei watched. But this contradicts the history; for David, in his order to put Joab to death, mentions not one word about his being of Adonijah's party, but orders him to be cut off expressly for the treacherous assassination of Abner and Amasa. And when Solomon ordered his execution, not a word of Adonijah; but take away the innocent blood which Joab shed from me, and from the house of my father. So that, as the cause of Joab's execution was not his being of Adonijah's party, so the cause of Shimei's being spared, cannot be said to be, because he was not of Adonijah's party. The true reason of their treatment, was the different nature of their crimes, and the difference of the order relating to them. And as Joab was put to death for repeated murders, by the express order of the king, it is with great injustice that his death is censured as an assassination; especially as he was executed in the same manner as state criminals at that time generally were.

Besides, if, as hath been asserted, David had, without any condition, and by a positive injunction, ordered Shimei to be put to death, then his joining, or not joining Adonijah, had been a circumstance of no weight; for, whether the one, or the other, Solomon ought not to have ordered him to be watched, but instantly to have put him to death, as he did Joab. And if, because he was not of Adonijah's party, Solomon spared him, and ordered him only to be watched, then Solomon did not think his father's order to be an order to cut him off, but only to have a watchful eye over him. For David knew Shimei's circumstances as well as Solomon, and Solomon's conduct to Shimei is an abundant explanation of the nature of his father's command, and how he himself understood it. This is the sentiment of F. Houbigant, who doth not so much as give a single intimation that Shimei was watched, and not put to death, because he was not of Adonijah's party; but absolutely denies that David gave any order at all to Solomon to put him to death for the crimes which he had pardoned him, but only to watch his conduct, till he should render himself guilty by some fresh transgression. And when upon breaking his oath, he was sent for by Solomon, the king reproached him for his perjury, for acting contrary to the condition of life, which he himself acknowledged to be just and equitable, and for the wickedness that his heart was privy to in his conduct to his father David; the mercy that had been shown him, in the pardon of that offence, aggravating his fresh crime in violating his oath, and in transgressing the king's command; a crime that showed he was of a restless spirit, and incapable of being restrained within due bounds by the most solemn oaths, or any sense of interest, gratitude, or duty, whatsoever. Solomon adds: "The Lord shall return thy wickedness on thine own head, and King Solomon shall be blessed: and the throne of David shall be established before the Lord for ever;" plainly intimating, that Solomon now cut him off, as an act of prudence and justice, because he knew him to be a turbulent implacable enemy to his person and government, and saw it necessary for establishing the throne of David before the Lord.

I would further add, that Shimei himself, sensible of Solomon's great kindness to him, approves the sentence pronounced on him, and therefore the charge that David gave him, promising him upon oath obedience to the condition, on which his life was afterwards to depend. "The sentence is good. As my Lord the king hath said, so will thy servant do." It doth not appear that Solomon mentioned one word about Shimei's cursing David, when he ordered him to confine himself to Jerusalem, and that therefore this was not the immediate reason why he confined him, but as his father had forewarned him, because he thought it would be a dangerous thing to suffer a person of Shimei's family, tribe, interest, and known rancour to his crown and government, to be entirely at liberty. And, upon this supposition, Shimei could not but own the justice of the sentence, and Solomon's lenity in pronouncing it. But if Shimei had any apprehension that David had violated his oath of safety to him by the charge he gave Solomon concerning him, or that Solomon had broken it, by making his life depend on a new condition, which his father had never obliged him to come under; why did he not plead David's oath and promise, and that had no condition annexed to it, when he appeared before Solomon; that the annexing a new condition to it was actually reversing it, and therefore a breach of oath in David, if he directed it, or in Solomon, if it was his order only, and not David's? And though David, being dead, Shimei could not reproach him to his face, yet he might have reproached him, and Solomon himself to his own face, for this breach of oath, if there had been any. But Shimei urges nothing of all this in favour of himself, and instead of reproaching David or Solomon, acknowledges the king's moderation, and says: The sentence is good. It is most just and merciful. As my lord the king hath said, so will thy servant do. Shimei therefore knew, either that he had an absolute pardon from David, or that he had forfeited that pardon, or that, whatever was the purport of David's oath to him, no injustice had been done him, either by David's charge to Solomon, or by Solomon's executing it. The adversaries of David may choose which they please. David's honour, and Solomon's justice, will be abundantly vindicated.

Let me beg the candid reader's attention to another remark: That though it hath been positively affirmed, that David guaranteed Shimei's pardon with a solemn oath, yet this is by no means certain from the history. For let it be observed, that after Shimei's confession of his fault, Abishai said to David: "Shall not Shimei be put to death, because he cursed the Lord's anointed?" Meaning, be put to death instantly, as appears by David's answer: "Shall there be any man put to death this day in Israel? Do I not know that I am this day king over Israel?" Therefore the king said to Shimei: "Thou shalt not die," and the king swore to him, viz. that he should not then, or that day, or at that time, he put to the sword. And it is observable, that the Arabic version expressly mentions this circumstance: "Thou shalt not die in this day." This was certainly all that the king declared to Abishai, that, as he was that day restored to the exercise of his regal power, no man should that day be put to death; and therefore he swore to Shimei, that he should not then die. So again, in David's direction to Solomon about Shimei, the same version hath the same word: "I swear to him by God; I will not put thee to the sword יום־כִּי־זֶה this day." Thus also Josephus understands the words. He assured him, says he, that he should suffer nothing at that time. And indeed nothing further can be certainly collected from the words, as they stand connected, but that David reprieved Shimei from immediate execution, and left him at liberty to call him to an account, at any other time, for the outrage and treason that he had been guilty of. To this it is objected, that probity is greatly wounded by such excuses. By what excuses? What, by excusing David from breaking a promise that he never made; or, for putting a criminal to death whom he only reprieved, but never pardoned? The question is, whether David guaranteed Shimei's pardon with a solemn oath? Or, swore that he should never be put to death for cursing and stoning him? The history makes it somewhat probable that David never swore this, but only that he should not be put to death at that time, as Joab and Abishai thought reasonable. If this was all that David promised, David broke no oath in afterward ordering him, for just reasons of state, for execution; and probity is not at all wounded by thus excusing David, because it is an excuse founded in truth. Instances enough may be produced, even in our own nation, of offenders being brought to justice, after a very considerable reprieve, perfectly consistent with the probity and equity of government.

And how is this inconsistent with piety, or the advice unworthy a just and religious prince on his death-bed? It is true, the forgiveness of enemies is a duty, provided they cease to become our enemies; but no man is obliged, by any law that I know of, so to forgive an enemy, continuing such, as not to take the proper methods to guard against the effects of his enmity, and bring him to justice, if no other method will prove effectual. Much less is a prince obliged so to forgive an implacable enemy to his crown and government, and one who is likely to disturb the settlement of the crown in his successor, as not to order his successor to be upon his guard against him, and punish him, when guilty, according to his demerits. Such a caution and order is what he owes to his people; and he may die, as a private person, in charity with all mankind, and forgive every private injury against himself; and yet, as a prince, advise what is necessary to the public good, and even the execution of particular persons, if, by abusing the lenity of government, and the respite they once obtained, they should become guilty of new and capital offences. David may therefore still be, the man after God's own heart. I shall only add, that it is a very uncharitable and groundless supposition of Mr. Bayle, that David only let him live, first to gain the glory of being a merciful prince, and afterward, on his death-bed, charged his son to put him to death, to avoid being reproached to his face of having broken his word. But surely David's resolution, that no man in Israel should be put to death who had been concerned in the rebellion, and the moderation and lenity of his whole reign over his people, were much nobler evidences of his being a merciful prince, than his sparing Shimei, whose execution, had it been immediately ordered, all the world would have commended as an exemplary act of justice, without the least impeachment of his goodness and mercy. Besides, if David was so false and unprincipled a wretch, as this supposes him, I cannot but think he would have little regarded such reproaches, if he had had an inclination, in his lifetime, out of revenge to have put him to death; and if he was so cautious of these reproaches while he lived, I can scarce think he would have given an order that should have blasted the glory of that character, and eternally stained his memory with the complicated guilt of hypocrisy, perfidy, and cruelty, and subjected his memory to them after death. Besides, whose reproaches would he have been afraid of? What, Shimei's? Surely he might have put him to death by the hands of his officers, without ever permitting Shimei to reproach him to his face; and I presume few of his courtiers would have cared, or dared, thus to reproach him. The truth of the case is—the charge concerning Shimei could not be given till David had established Solomon on his throne. It concerned Solomon only, and he gave him the caution, because necessary to the peace and security of his future reign; and it was of such a nature, as to deserve no reproach while he lived, and to expose him to no just reproach after his death. And if Mr. Bayle cannot prove, that David died immediately after this charge to Solomon concerning Shimei, he might have lived long enough to be reproached for it to his face; and therefore it could not be to avoid this reproach, that he gave this charge to Solomon towards the conclusion of יום־כִּי־זֶה. I cannot help therefore thinking, that the same reasons that led him to spare Shimei, when he cursed and stoned him, in his retreat from Jerusalem, induced him to spare him upon his return to it; viz. as Mr. Bayle himself expresses it—his acknowledging and adoring the hand of God, in the reproaches with which that furious Benjamin loaded him; and that as God had done what he scarce allowed himself to hope for, looked upon his affliction, and requited him with good for Shimei's cursing, he was resolved, in imitation of his God, to requite Shimei with good, and to bless the man who had reviled, cursed, and despitefully used him.—CHANDLER.

Another view of this charge to Solomon is given by Kennicott, whose remarks are well deserving attention. "David is here represented in our English version, as finishing his life with giving a command to Solomon to kill Shimei; and to kill him on account of that very crime, for which he had sworn to him by the Lord, he would not put him to death. The behaviour thus imputed to the king and prophet, should be examined very carefully, as to the ground it stands upon. When the passage is duly considered, it will appear highly probable that an injury has been done to this illustrious character. It is not uncommon in the Hebrew language to omit the negative in a second part of a sentence, and to consider it as repeated, when it has been once expressed, and is followed by the connecting particle. The necessity of so very considerable an alteration, as inserting the particle not, may be here confirmed by some other instances. Thus Psalm i. 5, 'The ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, וּבְיָמֵי הַמִּשְׁפָּט (Heb. and, signifying and not) sinners in the congregation of the righteous.' (Psalm ix. 18. Psalm xxxviii. 1. Psalm lxxv. 5. Prov. xxiv. 12.) If then, there are in fact many such instances, the question is, whether the negative, here expressed in the former part of David's command, may not be understood as to be repeated in the latter part; and if this may be, a strong reason will be added why it should be so interpreted. The passage will run thus: 'Behold, thou hast with thee Shimei, who cursed me, but I swear to him by the Lord, saying, I will not put thee to death by the sword. Now therefore, hold him not guiltless, (for thou art a wise man, and knowest what thou oughtest to do unto him) but bring not down his hoary head to the grave with blood.' Now, if the language itself will admit this construction, the sense thus given to the sentence derives a very strong support from the context. For, how did Solomon understand this charge? did he kill Shimei in consequence of it? Certainly he did not. For, after he had immediately commanded Joab to be slain, in obedience to his father, he sends for Shimei, and knowing that Shimei ought to be well watched, confines him to a particular spot in Jerusalem for the remainder of his life."—B.

Ver. 16. And now I ask one petition of thee, deny me not. And she said unto him, Say on.

The Hebrew has for "deny me not," "turn not away my face." When a man has gained the attention of the person to whom he wishes to speak, he generally says אוּר־כְּאַלֶּב־מִתְרָם, i. e. one request only, to show he is not going to give him much trouble, and to ask for many things. Adonijah said to Bathsheba, "turn not away my face" under similar circumstances it would be said here, "Ah! do not make my face ashamed—Do not put away my face—Reject not my face."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 19. Bath-sheba therefore went unto king Solomon, to speak unto him for Adonijah. And the king rose up to meet her, and bowed himself unto her, and sat down on his throne, and caused a seat to be set for the king's mother; and she sat on his right hand.

When visited by a superior, the Persian rises hastily, and meets his guest nearly at the door of the apartment. On the entrance of an equal, he just raises himself from his seat, and stands nearly erect: but to an inferior he makes the motion only of rising.—MORIER.

Ver. 23. Then King Solomon swore by the LORD, saying, God do so to me, and more also, if Adonijah have not spoken this word against his own life. 24. Now therefore, as the LORD liveth, which hath established me, and set me on the throne of David my father, and who hath made me a house, as he promised, Adonijah shall be put to death this day. 25. And King Solomon sent by the hand of Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada; and he fell upon him that he died.

Far are we from vindicating Solomon in all his actions, any more than David in the matter of Uriah: his severity to his brother, for a seemingly small offence, looked like revenge, and as if he had taken the first opportunity to cut him off for his former attempt upon the kingdom; and yet we cannot but imagine, from Solomon's words to his mother, that there was some further conspiracy against him, though not mentioned in holy writ, of which he had got intelligence, and in which Joab and Abiathar were engaged; and that he looked upon this asking Abishag in marriage as the prelude to it, and the first overt act, as it were, of their treason. It is certain, that they thought to impose upon the king, as they had done upon his mother, and carry their point, without ever discovering the malevolent intent of it.

The wives of the late king (according to the customs of the East) belonged to his successor, and were never married to any under a crowned head. Abishag was, doubtless, a beautiful woman, and by her near relation to David might have a powerful interest at court; Adonijah might therefore hope, by this marriage, to strengthen his pretensions to the crown, or, at least, to lay the foundation for some future attempt, upon a proper opportunity, either if Solomon should die, and leave a young son, not able to contest the point with him, or if, at any time, he should happen to fall under the people's displeasure, as his father had done before him. This might be Adonijah's design, and Solomon, accordingly, might have information of it. But, supposing that his brother's design was entirely innocent, yet since his request, (according to the customs then prevailing,) was confessedly bold and presumptuous, and had in it all the appearance of treason, it was none of Solomon's business to make any further inquiry about it, or to interpret the thing in his brother's favour. It was sufficient for him that the action was in itself criminal, and of dangerous consequence to the state, for it is by their actions, and not intentions, that all offenders must be tried. Adonijah indeed, had he lived under our constitution, would have had a fair hearing before conviction. But we ought to remember, that in the kingdoms of the East the government was absolute, and the power of life or death entirely in the prince: so that Solomon, without the formality of any process, could pronounce his brother dead; and because he conceived that in cases of this nature delays were dangerous, might send immediately and have him despatched, though we cannot but say, that it had been much more to his commendation had he showed more clemency, and spared his life.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 26. And unto Abiathar the priest said the king, Get thee to Anathoth, unto thine own fields; for thou art worthy of death; but I will not at this time put thee to death, because thou barest the ark of the LORD God before David my father, and because thou hast been afflicted in all wherein my father was afflicted. 27. So Solomon thrust out Abiathar from being priest unto the LORD; that he might fulfil the word of the LORD, which he spake concerning the house of Eli in Shiloh.

How far the high-priest Abiathar was concerned in the plot against Solomon, the sacred history does not particularly inform us; but such was the reverence paid to the sacerdotal character, that Solomon would have hardly dared to have deposed such a one from his office, had not the constitution of the nation authorized him so to do. The kings in the East, indeed, soon found out ways to make themselves absolute; but it looks as if, at the first establishment, the king was at the head of the Hebrew republic, and the high-priest his subject, and, in all civil affairs, submitted to his correction: inasmuch that, when any one abused the power of his office, to the prejudice of the commonweal, or endangering the king's person, the king might justly deprive him of his honours and titles, of his temporalities and emoluments, and even of life itself. And therefore, when Abiathar by his conspiracy had merited all this, whatever was dependant on the crown (as all the revenues of this place, as well as the liberty of officiating in it, were dependant) Solomon might lawfully take from him; but the sacerdotal character, which he received from God, and to which he was anointed, this he could not alienate: and therefore we may observe, that, after his deprivation, and even when Zadok was in possession of his place, he is nevertheless still mentioned under the style and title of the priest. The truth is, there is a great deal of difference between depriving a man of the dignity, and of the exercise of his function, in such a determinate place: between taking from him an authority that was given him by God, and the profits and emoluments arising from it, which were originally the gift of the crown. The former of these Solomon could not do, and the latter, it is probable, he was the rather inclined to do, out of regard to the prophecy of Samuel, wherein he foretold Eli (from whom Abiathar was descended) that he would translate the priesthood from his to another family, as he did in the person of Zadok, who was of the house of Eleazar, even as Eli was of that of Ithamar; so that, by this means, the priesthood reverted to its ancient channel.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 34. So Benaiah the son of Jehoiada went up, and fell upon him, and slew him; and he was buried in his own house in the wilderness.

This refers to the interment of Joab, who was slain by the hands of Benaiah. It is probable that Joab had built this house for the purpose of being buried in it, as it is not reasonable to suppose that he would erect a house in such a place to be the habitation of the living. Children or parents often build a house in a retired place, over, or for the remains of their dead; and the rest of the family also when they die are buried there. In some of these places may be seen the funeral car, or palanquin, in which the corpse was taken to its long home, suspended from the roof. At the anniversary of the death of a father, mother, or any other near relation, the friends go thither to perform the annual rites for the benefit of their manes. Such a house, so long as the descendants of the dead interred there have the power to prevent it, will never be allowed to go to decay.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 38. And Shimei dwelt in Jerusalem many days.

Ask a man how long he has lived in the village, or a priest how long he has officiated in the temple, the answer is not a long time, or many years, but veagu-nat, i. e. many days. "How long were they digging that tank?"—"Ah! many days." "Who built that temple?"—"Ah! my lord, how can I tell? it has been built many days." "I hear you were at the taking of Seringapatam, when the great Tippoo Saib was slain."—"Yes, I was." "How long is that since?"—"I cannot really tell, but many days."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 4. And the king went to Gibeon to sacrifice there; for that was the great high place: a thousand burnt-offerings did Solomon offer upon that altar.

An exception has been taken to the account of the great quantity of sacrifices which he is said to have offered on one altar only; but without recurring to any miracle for this, or without supposing this fire, which originally came from heaven, was more strong and intense than any common fire, and therefore, after the return from the captivity, the altar (as some observe) was made larger, because there wanted this celestial flame: without any forced solution like this, we have no reason to think that all these sacrifices were offered in one day. The king, we may imagine, upon one of the great festivals, went in procession with his nobles, to pass his devotion at Gibeon, where was the tabernacle on the brazen altar, which Moses had made. Each of the great festivals lasted for seven days; but Solomon might stay much longer at Gibeon, until, by the daily oblations, a thousand burnt-offerings were consumed; and, at the conclusion of this course of devotion, he might offer up his ardent prayer to God for wisdom, and God, for the confirmation of his faith, might appear to him in a dream by night, and have that converse with him, that the scripture takes notice of.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 7. And now, O LORD my God, thou hast made thy servant king instead of David my father; and I am but a little child: I know not how to go out or come in.

So said Solomon when he came to the kingdom of his father; and so say men here, though they be advanced in years, when they wish to speak of their incapacity for any performance. "What can I do in this affair; I am but a boy of yesterday's birth?" When a man pleads for forgiveness, he says, "I am but a little child, it was my ignorance." Has a man insulted another by not bowing to him, or refusing to take off his sandals in his presence, or by the use of some improper expressions; those who go to intercede for him, say, "Forgive him, sir, he is but an infant of yesterday." A person wishing to compliment a holy or learned person, says, "I am but a little infant when compared with you."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 25. And the king said, Divide the living child in two, and give half to the one, and half to the other.

This was apparently a very strange decision; but Solomon saw that the only way to discover the real mother was by the affection and tenderness she would necessarily show to her offspring. The plan was tried, and succeeded; and it was a proof of his sound judgment, penetration, and acquaintance with the human heart, if not of his extraordinary and supernatural wisdom. There are several similar decisions recorded by heathen writers. Suetonius, in his Life of the Emperor Claudius, whom he celebrates for his wonderful sagacity and penetration, tells us, that this emperor discovered a woman to be the real mother of a young man, whom she refused to acknowledge, by commanding her to marry him, the proofs being doubtful on both sides; for, rather than commit incest, she confessed the truth. Diodorus Siculus also informs us, that Ariophaanes, king of Thrace, being appointed to decide between three young men, each of whom professed to be the son of the deceased king of the Cimmerians, and claimed the succession, discovered the real son, by ordering each to shoot an arrow into the dead body of the king: two of them did this without hesitation; but the real son of the deceased monarch refused.—GREENFIELD.

The great merit of the king in this matter was finding out the true mother. "A woman who was going to bathe left her child to play on the banks of the tank, when a female demon who was passing that way carried it off. They both appeared before the deity, and each declared the child was her own: the command was therefore given that each claimant was to seize the infant by a leg and an arm, and pull with all their might in opposite directions. No sooner had they commenced than the child began to scream, when the real mother, from pity, left off pulling, and resigned her claim to the other. The judge therefore decided, that as she only had shown affection, the child must be hers." The decision of a Hindoo magistrate in the case of some travellers is also in point. "Two travellers once went into a rest-house to sleep; the one had on beautiful earrings, the other had none. In the night the latter arose, and while the other slept, took off one of his rings and put it in his own ear. In the morning the former finding one of his rings missing, looked at his companion and saw it in his ear. He immediately charged him with the theft, but the thief retorted, and charged him with having stolen one of his rings. They disputed for some time, and at last each determined to make his complaint before a magistrate: his worship patiently heard the case, but as each swore that the other was the thief, and as neither of them could produce a witness, he was at a loss how to decide. He then took one of them into a private apartment, and said, I cannot find out who is guilty, but as I perceive the rings are worth one hundred rupees, I will sell them; you shall each pay a fine of twenty-five rupees, and the remaining fifty you may divide betwixt yourselves. The man replied, I will not have the twenty-five rupees; they are my own rings, you can do as you please. The magistrate then called the other man into the room, and proposed the same thing; he replied, What can I do, my lord, I must submit to your pleasure; I accept of the twenty-five rupees. His worship saw that the man was much pleased with the prospect of getting the rupees, and therefore concluded that he was the thief. The ring was then given to the other man, who was the rightful owner."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 26. For her bowels yearned upon her son.

The Hebrew has for yearned, "were hot." A mother, in lamenting over her suffering child, says, "Ah! my bowels are hot over the child." "My bowels burn in his misery." "My heart is burnt to ashes."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 7. And Solomon had twelve officers over all Israel, which provided victuals for the king and his household: each man his month in a year made provision.

The eastern people to this day, it seems, support the expenses of government, in common, by paying such a proportion of the produce of their lands to their princes. These are their taxes. No wonder it was so in remoter ages. Chardin gives us this account: "The revenues of princes in the East are paid in the fruits and productions of the earth. There are no other taxes upon the peasants." The twelve officers of Solomon then, mentioned 1 Kings iv. 7—19, a, e to be considered as his general receivers. They furnished food for all that belonged to the king; and the having provisions for themselves and attendants, seems to have been, in those times of simplicity, all the ordinary gratification his ministers of state, as well as his meaner servants, received. Silver, gold, horses, armour, precious vestments, and other things of value, came to him from other quarters: partly a kind of tribute from the surrounding princes, partly from the merchants, whom he suffered to pass through his country to and from Egypt, or elsewhere, partly from his own commerce by the Red Sea. The horses and armour he seems to have distributed among the most populous towns, who were to find horsemen and people to drive chariots to such a number when called for; and out of the silver, and other precious things that came to him, he made presents upon extraordinary occasions to those that distinguished themselves in his service. And according to this plan of conducting the expenses of civil government, the history of Solomon is to be explained. Commentators have not always had this present to their minds when illustrating this part of scripture.—HARMER.

Ver. 23. Ten fat oxen, and twenty oxen out of the pastures, and a hundred sheep, besides harts, and roe-bucks, (antelopes,) and fallow-deer, and fatted fowl.

"Harts." Dr. Shaw (Trav. p. 414) understands the original bu ayil as the name of the genus, including all the species of the deer kind, whether they are distinguished by round horns, as the stag; or by flat ones, as the fallow-deer; or by the smallness of the branches, as the roe.

"Fallow-deer." The Hebrew yachmar, rendered babulus in the Vulgate, probably denotes the buffalo; and though the "flesh of a buffalo does not seem so well tasted as beef, being harder and more coarse, yet in our times persons of distinction, as well as the common people, and even the European merchants, eat a good deal of it in countries where that animal abounds." (Niebuhr.)—GREENFIELD.

The flesh of the antelope is very grateful to the taste of an Oriental. It is, in the estimation of Arabian writers, the most delicious and wholesome of all venison. They pronounce its juices better than those of any other wild animal, and more adapted to the human constitution. The sentiments of these venerable ancients, are confirmed by the testimony of several intelligent modern authors. Dr. Shaw says, "it is in great esteem in the East for food, having a sweet musky taste, which is highly agreeable to their palates;" and according to Dr. Russel, "the antelope venison, during the winter, or sporting season, is well flavoured, but very lean, and in the spring is fat, and of a flavour which might vie with English venison." These statements account for its being daily served up on the sumptuous table of Solomon and other eastern princes. Besides, the antelope has all the marks which distinguished clean animals under the law; it both divides the hoof and chews the cud. An Israelite, therefore, might lawfully eat of its flesh, although he was not permitted to offer it in sacrifice. This creature belonged to the class of clean beasts, which the people of Israel, as well during their wanderings in the desert, as after their settlement in the land of promise, were permitted to kill wherever they could find them, and use for the subsistence of their families, although, at the time, they might be ceremonially unclean. But the ox, the sheep, and the goat, which some writers distinguished by the name of clean cattle, might both be lawfully eaten and offered in sacrifice; yet while the chosen people sojourned in the wilderness, they were forbidden to kill any of these animals, although intended merely for private use, except at the door of the tabernacle; and if ceremonially unclean, even to eat of their flesh. This regulation occasioned little inconvenience to the tribes in the desert, where they lived in one vast encampment, in the midst of which the sacred tent was pitched; but after their settlement in Canaan, their circumstances required either an alteration in the law, or that the greater part of the nation should abstain altogether from the use of flesh. The permission was accordingly enlarged; while they were still restricted to shed the blood of cattle intended for sacrifice, too far from the national altar, they were permitted, when too far from the tabernacle, to kill those which they designed merely for common food, in any of their cities, or in their houses; even the ceremonial regulation was abolished, and in private clean and unclean fared alike. This permission, which is couched in very express terms, is repeated in the course of a few verses, lest the suspicious mind of an Israelite might suppose that Jehovah envied his people the enjoyment of what he had given them; and "in both instances it is illustrated by an example which must, from the use of it, have been familiar to the Israelites." "The unclean and the clean may eat thereof, as of the (antelope,) and of the hart."—PAXTON.

The great number of beasts required daily in Solomon's kitchen, will by no means be found incredible, when we compare it with the accounts of the daily consumption of oriental courts in modern times, and the prodigious number of servants of an Asiatic prince. Thus Tavernier, in his description of the seraglio, says, that five hundred sheep and lambs were daily required for the persons belonging to the court of the sultan.—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 25. And Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig-tree, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, all the days of Solomon.

Plantations of trees about houses are found very useful in hot countries, to give them an agreeable coolness. The ancient Israelites seem to have made use of the same means, and probably planted fruit trees rather than other kinds, to produce that effect. "It is their manner in many places," says Sir Thomas Row's chaplain, speaking of the country of the Great Mogul, "to plant about, and among their buildings, trees which grow high and broad, the shadow whereof keeps their houses by far more cool: this I observed in a special manner when we were ready to enter Amadavar; for it appeared to us, as if we had been entering a wood rather than a city." The expression in the Old Testament, of people dwelling under their vines and their fig-trees, seems strongly to intimate, that this method anciently obtained much in Judæa; and that vines and fig-trees were what were commonly used in that country. Nor was this management at all to be wondered at; as the ancient patriarchs found it very agreeable to pitch their tents under the shade of some thick tree, their children might naturally be disposed to plant them about their houses. And as it was requisite for them to raise as many eatables as they could, in so very populous a country as that was, it is no wonder they planted fig-trees, whose shade was thickened by vines, about their houses, under which they might sit in the open air, and yet in the cool. This writer mentions another circumstance, in which there is an evident similarity between the ancient Jews and these more eastern people: "But for their houses in their aldeas, or villages, which stand very thick in that country, they are generally very poor and base. All those country dwellings are set up close together; for I never observed any house there to stand single, and alone."

The account the Baron De Tott gives of the Egyptian villages, shows they are shaded in much the same manner. "Wherever the inundation can reach, their habitations are erected on little hills, raised for that purpose, which serve for the common foundation of all the houses which stand together, and which are contrived to take up as little room as possible, that they may save all the ground they can for cultivation. This precaution is necessary, to prevent the water's washing away the walls, which are only of mud. The villages are always surrounded by an infinite number of pointed turrets, meant to invite thither the pigeons, in order to collect the dung. Every village has, likewise, a small wood of palm-trees near it, the property of which is common: these supply the inhabitants with dates for their consumption, and leaves for fabrication of baskets, mats, and other things of that kind. Little causeways, raised, in like manner, above the inundation, preserve a communication during the time it lasts." Palm-trees, according to this, are planted universally about the Egyptian villages; had they been as generally about the Jewish towns, Jericho would hardly have been called the city of palm-trees, by way of distinction from the rest. It appears to have been, in Judæa, rather a peculiarity. But the Jewish towns and houses might be wont to be surrounded by other trees, proper for their use, which probably were vines and fig-trees, which furnished two great articles of food for their consumption, and the cuttings of their vines must have been useful to them for fuel. That plantations of some sort of trees were common about the Jewish towns, may be deduced even from the term קופה, used in their language for a village, which is derived from a root that signifies to cover or hide.—HARMER.

Immediately on entering, I was ushered into the courtyard of the Aga, whom I found smoking under a vine, surrounded by horses, servants, and dogs, among which I distinguished an English pointer.—TURNER.

Ver. 28. Barley also and straw for the horses and dromedaries brought they unto the place where the officers were, every man according to his charge.

Besides provisions for themselves, the Orientals are obliged to carry food for the beasts on which they ride, or carry their goods. That food is of different kinds. They make little or no hay in these countries, and are therefore very careful of their straw, which they cut into small bits, by an instrument which at the same time thrashes out the corn; this chopped straw, with barley, beans, and balls made of bean and barley-meal, or of the pounded kernels of dates, are what they are wont to feed them with. The officers of Solomon are accordingly said to have brought, every man in his month, barley and straw for the horses and dromedaries, 1 Kings iv. 28. Not straw to litter them with, there is reason to think, for it is not now used in those countries for that purpose; but chopped straw for them to eat alone with their barley. The litter they use for them is their own dung, dried in the sun, and brused between their hands, which they heap up again in the morning, sprinkling it in the summer with fresh water to keep it from corrupting. In some other places we read of provender and straw, not barley and straw; because it may be, other things were used for their food anciently, as well as now, besides barley and chopped straw. בֶּלֶעַל beleel, one of the words translated provender, Is. xxx. 24, implies something of mixture, and the participle of the verb from which it is derived is used for the mingling of flour with oil; so the verb in Judges xix. 21, may be as well translated, "he mingled (food) for the asses," וַיִּבְלַע יַעֲקֹב לֶחֶם מִצֶּמֶת, as, he gave them provender, signifying that he mixed some chopped straw and barley together for the asses. And thus also barley and chopped straw, as it lies just after reaping unseparated in the field, might naturally be expressed by the Hebrew word we translate provender, which signifies barley and straw that had been mingled together, and accordingly seems to be so, Job xxiv. 6, "They reap every one his corn in the field"—"Hebrew, mingled corn, or dredge," says the margin. What ideas are usually affixed to secondary translation, I do not know; but Job apparently alludes to the provender, or heap of chopped straw and corn lying mingled together in the field, after having passed under the thrashing instrument, to which he compares the spoils that were taken from the passengers, so early as his time, by those that lived somewhat after the present manner of the wild Arabs, which spoils are to them what the harvest and vintage were to others. To this agrees that other passage of Job where this word occurs, ch. vi. 5, "Will the ox low, in complaint, over his provender?" or fodder, as it is translated in our version; when he has not only straw enough, but mixed with barley.

The accurate Vitringa, in his commentary, has taken notice of that word's implying something of mixture which is translated provender in Is. xxx. 24, but for want of more nicely attending to eastern customs, though he has done it more than most commentators, he has been very unhappy in explaining the cause of it; for he supposes it signifies a mixture of straw, hay, and bran. I have nowhere observed in books of travels, that they give their labouring beasts bran in the East, and hay is not made there; the mixture that is meant, if we are to explain it by the present eastern usages, is chopped straw and barley. But the additional word there translated clean, and in the margin leavened, which, Vitringa observes, is the proper meaning of the word, may be supposed to make the passage difficult. The Septuagint seem to have thought the words signified nothing more than straw mingled with winnowed barley; and if the word translated provender, though originally intended to express mixture, might afterward come to signify uncompound-ed food, as Vitringa supposes, the passage is easily deciphered; for though the word translated clean does commonly signify leavened, or made sour, yet not always; signifying sometimes mere mixing, as in Is. lxiii. 1, where it is used for staining a garment with blood, and so it may signify here, as the Septuagint seem to have understood the passage, chopped straw, leavened or mixed with barley. But there is no necessity of supposing the word translated provender is used in a sense different from its common and ancient meaning, and signifying uncompound-ed meat for cattle; that single word may be understood to mean chopped straw mingled with barley, since we find that barley, when given to beasts of labour, is sometimes mingled, or, to express it poetically, leavened, with a few beans, to which therefore the prophet might refer. The wild Arabs, who are extremely nice in managing their horses, give them no food but very clean barley. The Israelites were not so scrupulous, as appears from the passage I cited relating to the provision made for Solomon's horses, but they may nevertheless think the cleanness of the provender a very great recommendation of it, and seem to have done so, since Isaiah, in the above-mentioned passage, speaks of leavened provender winnowed with the shovel and with the fan. It is not the more important to them, as a good deal of earth, sand, and gravel, are wont, notwithstanding all their precautions, to be taken up with the grain, in their way of thrashing. But though the Israelites were not so scrupulous as the Arabs, giving their beasts of burden straw as well as barley, yet it must have been much more commodious for them in their journeying to have carried barley alone, or balls of bean, or barley-meal, rather than a quantity of chopped straw, with a little other provender of a better kind; and accordingly we find no mention made by Dr. Shaw, of any chopped straw being carried with them to Mount Sinai, but only barley, with a few beans intermixed, or the flour of one or other of them, or both, made into balls with a little water. The Levite's mentioning therefore his having straw, along with other provender, rather conveys the idea of his being a person in mean circumstances, who was not able to feed his asses with pure barley, or those other sorts of provender that eastern travellers are wont to carry with them.—HARMER.

In the East, horses are still fed with barley. Hasselquist observes, that in the plain of Jericho, the Arabians had sown barley for their horses. They are very careful of their straw, which they cut into small bits, by an instrument which at the same time thrashes out the corn: this chopped straw, with barley, beans, and balls made of bean and barley-meal, or of the pounded kernels of dates, are what they usually feed their beasts with.—MALLETT.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 6. Now therefore command thou that they hew me cedar-trees out of Lebanon; and my servants shall be with thy servants: and unto thee will I give hire for thy servants according to all that thou shalt appoint: for thou knowest that there is not among us any that can skill to hew timber like unto the Sidonians.

The Hebrew word אֲרֹז aroz, whence the Chaldee and Syriac אֲרָז arza, and the Arabic and Ethiopic אַרְז arz, and Spanish alerce, unquestionably denotes the cedar; it is thus rendered by the Septuagint and other Greek versions κέδρος, and by the Vulgate cedras; and the inhabitants of mount Lebanon still call it arz. The cedar is a large and noble evergreen tree, and according to Tournefort makes a distinct genus of plants, but it is comprehended by Linnaeus among the junipers.—GREENFIELD.

The cedar grows, it is true, on the mountains of Amanus and Taurus, in Asia Minor, but it does not there attain the height and strength it acquires on mount Lebanon, on which account the cedars of Lebanon have been renowned from the most ancient times. But the cedar woods, which formerly covered a part of this mountain, have long ago vanished. Only on the northeast side is a small wood, consisting of an inconsiderable number of small thick cedars, and eight or nine hundred younger ones. The oldest and largest cedars are distinguished from the younger ones chiefly by this, that the latter grow up straight, and their boughs branch out horizontally from the stem, but hang down a little; and in these two particulars, and in general in their whole form, entirely resemble our European pines and firs; whereas the old cedars have a short and very thick trunk, which divides not far from the root, into three, four, or five large arms, which grow straight up, and are very thick; some of them grow together for about ten feet. "These trees," says Rauwolf, "which remain green during the whole year, have large trunks, which may be some fathoms thick, and as high as our firs; but as they have larger arms, according to which the stem bends, this takes away so much of their perpendicular height. The branches spread out pretty far in such a beautiful equality, that they look as if they had been clipped above, and made even with particular care. It may easily be perceived before you get very near them, that there is a great difference between these and other resinous trees. Otherwise they nearly resemble larch-trees, especially in the leaves, which are small, narrow, and shoot out as close together."

The latest accounts of the cedars of Lebanon are given by Mr. John Henry Mavor, who visited this part in the summer of the year 1813. "I counted," says he, "nine principal cedar-trees, which were distinguished from all the others by their thickness and age, but not by their height: for younger ones exceeded them in this respect. I measured the circumference of the trunk of one of the largest with a cord, about four feet from the ground, and found it ten French ells and a half. A single branch was thirty steps in length to the end, when it divided into small twigs. The trunk of five of the largest consists of three or four divisions, each of which equals in circumference the stem of our largest oaks. The cedar itself, probably, belongs to the class of trees with acerose leaves, but is neither a pine, nor a fir, nor a larch, though the young cedars are like the latter. The broken twigs almost resemble the elder, and the smell puts one in mind of the arbor vitæ. The greatest beauty of these trees consists in their stiff, strong, and far-spreading boughs; and, what no other kind of tree has, the brittleness of the wood, even of the smallest and tenderest twigs, which broke like glass, particularly the old ones. The whole wood, probably, does not contain above eight or nine hundred trees, large and small included. The young and middle-aged ones bore fruit of the size of an egg, which were bright green, with brown rings and spots, and stood upright on the small twigs. This peculiarity of the fruit of the cedar also distinguishes it from other trees of the same genus: in other respects, it has an affinity and resemblance to them, as well by its resinous quality as its form." Hardly any kind of wood unites so many good qualities for building as the cedar: its wood not only pleases the eye by its reddish stripes, and exhales an agreeable smell, but it is hard, and without knots, and is never eaten by worms, and lasts so long, that some persons consider it as imperishable. Hence it was used for rafters and boards, either to cover the houses or floors; it was also employed in building the principal wall; and combined with stones, so that, for instance, after three layers of stones, there followed one of cedar-wood. 1 Kings vi. 36. vii. 12. Ezra vi. 3, 4. Sometimes, too, each division of the wall was built alternately with cedar-wood and stones, so that first a course of wood, and then a course of stones, extended from one division to the other, and so each division nearly resembled a chess-board. The temple at Jerusalem, as well as the palace of Solomon, was built of cedar; and in the latter there was such a quantity of this wood, that it was called, 1 Kings vii. 2. x. 10, The house of the forest of Lebanon. (Rosenmüller.)—BURDER.

Ver. 9. My servants shall bring them down from Lebanon unto the sea; and I will convey them by sea in floats unto the place that thou shalt appoint me, and will cause them to be discharged there, and thou shalt receive them: and thou shalt accomplish my desire in giving food for my household.

Bishop Patrick supposes, "that they conveyed the pieces of timber from the high parts of the mountains to the river Adonis, or to the plain of Biblos." "By floats is probably meant that the pieces of timber were bound together, and so drawn through the rivers and the sea." In exactly the same way, timber is conveyed in all parts of the East. The trees are cut down before the rainy season, all the branches are lopped off, and the trunks are squared on the spot. Notches are then made in the logs, and they are tied together by ropes made of green withes gathered in the forests. If, however, the waters of the rainy season should not reach the spot where they are hewn down, they are dragged singly to the place where it is known that in the wet monsoon they will float. Thus, in passing through remote forests in the dry season, the inexperienced traveller, in seeing numerous trees felled in every direction, and then again, in another place, a large collection bound together like a raft, which is also fastened to trees that are still standing, (to prevent it from being lost when the floods come,) is at a loss to know how it can be got to the river, or to the sea; for he sees no track or path except that which is made by the wild beast: he knows no vehicle can approach the place, and is convinced that men cannot carry it. But let him go thither when the rains have fallen, and he will see in one place men in a little canoe winding through the forest, in another directing a float with some men on it moving gently along; and in the river he sees large rafts sweeping down the stream, with the dexterous steersmen making for some neighbouring town, or the more distant ocean; and then may be seen in the harbour immense collections of the finest timber, which have been brought thither "by sea in floats." Sometimes the rains come on earlier than expected; or the logs may not have been fastened to trees still standing; hence, when the floods come, they naturally move towards the river; and then may be seen noble trees whirling and tumbling along till they reach the sea, and are thus lost to man.—ROBERTS.

Two methods of conveying wood in floats appear to have been practised. The first by pushing single trunks of trees into the water, and suffering them to be carried along by the stream. This was commonly adopted as it regarded firewood. The other was ranging a number of planks close to each other in regular order, binding them together, and steering them down the current. This was probably the most ancient practice. The earliest ships or boats were nothing else than rafts, or a collection of deals and planks bound together. By the Greeks they were called Schedai, and by the Latins, Rates. The ancients ventured out to sea with them on piratical expeditions, as well as to carry on commerce: and after the invention of ships, they were still retained for the transportation of soldiers, and of heavy burdens. Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 56. Strabo, lib. xvi. Scheffer, De Militia Navali Veterum, lib. i. cap. 3. Pitisci, Lexicon Antiquital. Rom. art. Rates. Solomon entered into a contract with Hiram, king of Tyre, by which the latter was to cause cedars for the use of the temple to be cut down on the western side of mount Lebanon, above Tripoli, and to be floated to Jaffa. At present no streams run from Lebanon to Jerusalem; and the Jordan, the only river in Palestine that could bear floats, is at a great distance from the cedar-forest. The wood, therefore, must have been brought along the coast by sea to Jaffa.—BURDER.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 7. And the house, when it was in building, was built of stone made ready before it was brought thither: so that there was neither hammer, nor ax, nor any tool of iron, heard in the house while it was in building.

This passage is illustrated by what D'Arviens remarks of Alexandria in Egypt. "The city gates, which are still standing, have a magnificent appearance, and are so high and broad, that we may infer from them the ancient greatness and splendour of the place. They properly consist only of four square stones; one of which serves as the threshold, two are raised on the sides, and the fourth laid across and resting upon them. I need not say that they are of great antiquity; for it is well known, that for many centuries past such immense stones have not been used in building. It is a matter of surprise how the ancients could raise such heavy masses from the stone quarries, remove them, and set them up. Some are of opinion that these stones were cast, and, probably, only consisted of a heap of small stones, which were united by the finest cement; that at the place where they were wanted, wooden models or moulds were made, in which the cement and stones were mixed together, and when this mass became dry and sufficiently firm, the mould was taken off by degrees, and the stones then polished."—ROSENMÜLLER.

Ver. 18. And the cedar of the house within was carved with knobs and open flowers.

The people of the East are exceedingly profuse in their carved work. See a temple; it is almost from its foundation to its summit a complete mass of sculpture and carved work. Look at their sacred car in which their gods are drawn out in procession, and you are astonished at the labour, taste, and execution displayed by the workmen in carved work: nay, the roof and doors of private dwellings are all indebted to the chisel of the "cunning workman." The pillars that support the verandas, their chests, their couches, (as were those of Solomon,) the handles of different instruments, their ploughs, their vessels, (however rude in other respects,) must be adorned by the skill of the carved workman.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 7. Then he made a porch for the throne where he might judge, even the porch of judgment: and it was covered with cedar from one side of the floor to the other.

It deserves remark, that the eastern floors and ceilings are just the reverse of ours. Their ceilings are of wood; ours of plaster or stucco-work; their floors are of plaster or of painted tiles, ours of wood. This effectually detects a mistake of Kimchi and R. Solomon, who, according to Buxtorf, supposed the floor of the porch of judgment which Solomon built was all of cedar; whereas the sacred writer, 1 Kings vii. 7, undoubtedly meant its covering a-top, its ceiling, was of cedar. Indeed here in the West, where these Jewish Rabbis lived, such places are usually built after the eastern mode, which makes their mistake so much the more strange. Westminster Hall is, I think, paved with stone and ceiled with wood; and such without doubt was the ceiling and the pavement of the porch for judgment which Solomon built, and which was erected in a much hotter climate.—HARMER.

Ver. 10. And the foundation was of costly stones, even great stones, stones of ten cubits, and stones of eight cubits.

In the ruins of Balbec, stones of great magnitude are found. "But what is still more astonishing, is the enormous stones which compose the sloping wall. To the west the second layer is formed of stones which are from twenty-eight to thirty-five feet long, by about nine in height. Over this layer, at the northwest angle, there are three stones, which alone occupy a space of one hundred and seventy-five feet and one half: viz. the first, fifty-eight feet seven inches; the second, fifty-eight feet eleven; and the third, exactly fifty-eight feet; and each of these are twelve feet thick. These stones are of a white granite, with large shining flakes, like gypse. There is a quarry of this kind of stone under the whole city, and in the adjoining mountains, which is open in several places: and, among others, on the right, as we approach the city, there is still lying there a stone, hewn on three sides, which is sixty-nine feet two inches long, twelve feet ten inches broad, and thirteen feet three in thickness." (Volney.)

"The city of Jerusalem is utterly unlike any other place I have ever seen. Its situation upon an immense rock, surrounded by valleys that seem cut out by the chisel; the contrast exhibited between the extreme degree of barrenness and the extreme degree of fertility, which border upon each other here almost every yard, without one shade of mitigated character on either side; the structure of the walls, many of the stones in which are fifteen or sixteen feet long, by four high and four deep, the very size mentioned of the hewn stones of Solomon, 1 Kings vii. 10; the houses, where almost every one is a fortress, and the streets, where almost every one is a covered way, altogether formed an appearance totally dissimilar from that of any other town I have met with either in Europe or Asia." (Carlyle).—BURDER.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 31. If any man trespass against his neighbour, and an oath be laid upon him to cause him to swear, and the oath come before thine altar in this house.

Bishop Patrick alleges, that it was the custom of all nations to touch the altar when they made a solemn oath, calling God to witness the truth of what they said, and to punish them if they did not speak the truth; and he supposes, that Solomon alludes to this practice, in his prayer at the dedication of the temple: "If any man trespass against his neighbour, and an oath be laid upon him, to cause him to swear, and the oath come before thine altar in this house." But the royal suppliant says not one word about touching the altar; but clearly refers to the general practice of standing before it, for his words literally are: And the oath come (למי מברר) before the face of thine altar. In imitation of God's ancient people, many of the surrounding nations, among whom Livy and other celebrated writers of antiquity mention the Athenians, the Carthaginians, and the Romans, were accustomed to stand before the altar when they made oath; but it does not appear they laid their hand upon it, and by consequence, no argument from the sacred text, nor even from the customs of these nations, can be drawn for the superstitious practice of laying the hand upon the gospels and kissing them, instead of the solemn form authorized by God himself, of lifting up the right hand to heaven.—PAXTON.

Ver. 44. If thy people go out to battle against their enemy, whithersoever thou shalt send them, and shalt pray unto the LORD towards the city which thou hast chosen, and towards the house that I have built for thy name.

"By a decree passed in the eighteenth year of the Emperor Adrian, the Jews were forbidden not only to enter into the city of Jerusalem, (then called Ælia), but even to turn their looks towards it; which most probably had a reference to this custom of turning their faces towards the Holy City at their prayers. I observed that Mecca, the country of their prophet, and from which, according to their idea, salvation was dispensed to them, is situated towards the south, and for this reason they pray with their faces turned towards that quarter." (Marius.) "The Mexicans prayed generally upon their knees, with their faces turned towards the east, and, therefore, made their sanctuaries with the door to the west." (Cullen's Mexico.) In a description of the people of the Ganow hills, we find the same custom prevalent. "Their mode of swearing is very solemn: the oath is taken upon a stone, which they first salute, then, with their hands joined and uplifted, their eyes steadfastly fixed to the hills, they call on Mahadeva in the most solemn manner, telling him to witness what they declare, and that he knows whether they speak true or false. They then again touch the stone, with all the appearance of the utmost fear, and bow their heads to it, calling again upon Mahadeva. They also, during their relation, look steadfastly to the hills, and keep their right hand upon the stone. When the first person swore before me, the awe and reverence with which the man swore forcibly struck me: my Mohorric could hardly write, so much was he affected by the solemnity. I understand their general belief to be, that their god resides in the hills; and though this belief may seem inconsistent with an awful idea of the divinity, these people appeared to stand in the utmost awe of their deity, from the fear of his punishing them for any misconduct in their frequent excursions to the hills." (Asiatic Researches.) "An hour before sunrise, the coffeegee having prepared our coffee, retired into a corner of the room, and having, without the least reserve, performed the necessary ablutions, spread his garment on the ground, and began his prayers: he turned himself to the east, and though several persons entered and left the apartment during his devotions, he seemed quite absorbed, and rose, and knelt, and prostrated himself with as much appearance of piety as if he had been praying in the holy temple of Mecca itself." (Macmichel).—BURDER.

Ver. 66. On the eighth day he sent the people away: and they blessed the king, and went unto their tents joyful and glad of heart, for all the goodness that the LORD had done for David his servant, and for Israel his people.

The Hebrew has, for blessed, "thanked." The Tamul translation has, for blessed, "praised." So in Jobna xxii. 33, also in 2 Sam. xxii. 47, and in all other passages where the word occurs, (when used in reference to God,) it is rendered, "praise," or "praised." The word bless, among the Hindoos, is, I think, not used, as in English, to praise, to glorify, but to confer happiness, to convey a benediction, or to show good-will. St. Paul says, "Without all contradiction, the less is blessed of the greater;" and this I believe, joined with greatness, is the only idea the Orientals attach to those who bless others. Hence he who blesses another, must be a superior, either in years, rank, or sanctity. The heathen never bless their gods.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1. And when the queen of Sheba heard of the fame of Solomon concerning the name of the LORD, she came to prove him with hard questions.

The Septuagint has, for hard questions, αἰνιγματῶν, enigmas, riddles. The Hindoos (especially their females) take great delight in riddles, apologies, and fables. By this method they convey pleasure, instruction, or reproof. See them in their marriage feasts, or in their "evenings at home;" how pleasantly they pass their time, in thus puzzling each other, and calling forth the talents of the young.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 4. And when the queen of Sheba had seen all Solomon's wisdom, and the house that he had built, 5. And the meat of his table, and the sitting of his servants, and the attendance of his ministers, and their apparel, and his cup-bearers, and his ascent by which he went up unto the house of the Lord; there was no more spirit in her.

By these words we may understand that this ascent was consecrated to the use of Solomon alone. Thus we are told by Sir George Staunton, in his account of the first presentation of the British embassy, that, "on his entrance into the tent, the emperor of China mounted immediately the throne by the front steps, consecrated to his use alone." He also informs us, that "one highway was reserved for the use of the emperor alone; this was rendered perfectly level, dry, and smooth: cisterns were contrived on the sides of the imperial road, to hold water for sprinkling it occasionally, in order to keep down the dust: parallel to the emperor's, was another road, not quite so broad, nor swept continually with so much care, but perfectly commodious and safe: his was intended for the attendants of his imperial majesty: and upon this the British embassy was allowed to pass. All other travellers were excluded from these two privileged roads, and obliged to make out a path wherever they were able."—BURDEN.

Ver. 8. Happy are thy men, happy are these thy servants, which stand continually before thee, and that hear thy wisdom.

"When the king" (of Persia) "is seated in public, his sons, ministers, and courtiers, stand erect, with their hands crossed, and in the exact place of their rank. They watch the looks of the sovereign, and a glance is a mandate. If he speak to them, you hear a voice reply, and see their lips move, but not a motion nor gesture betrays that there is animation in any other part of their frame." When he places himself at the windows of his palace, his domestics take their station in the court before it, hard by the fountain which plays in the middle, to watch the looks of their lord. A principal part of the regal state in Persia consists in the number of the men who stand before the monarch; and we learn from the address of the queen of Sheba to Solomon, that he was not indifferent to this part of eastern splendour. It is reckoned an act of great humility in the king of Persia, or even in a person of high rank, to walk on foot, this being a part of the service exacted from servants. When a prince or great man goes abroad, he is mounted on a horse, and always attended by a multitude of servants on foot, one bearing his pipe, another his shoes, another his cloak, a fourth his saddle-cloth, and so on, the number increasing with the dignity of the master. These statements impart great force to the remark of the wise man: "I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth."—ΠΑΡΤΟΧ.

Ver. 16. And King Solomon made two hundred targets of beaten gold; six hundred shekels of gold went to one target.

The word tesinnah, used for those martial ensigns of royal dignity, which were carried before King Solomon, and which our version renders targets, 1 Kings x. 16, was supposed by the Septuagint to signify spears or lances: and as the word is to be understood to signify some sharp-pointed weapon, it may be more natural to understand it of a lance, than of a defensive piece of armour with a short sharp-pointed mbo in the middle, considering that shields of gold were also carried before this prince, at solemn seasons. One can hardly find a disposition to admit, that two sorts of things so much alike as targets and shields, should be meant here; and if such similar defensive pieces of armour were hardly meant, the translation of the Septuagint is as natural as any, to say nothing of the authority of so ancient a version, in which, so far as appears by Lambert Bos, all the copies, which frequently disagree in other matters, concur. But whatever we may think of this way of translating the original word, we can hardly suppose such martial ensigns of honour were unknown in the time when this translation was made. It is certain they now appear in the Levant. Thus Windus, in his description of a pompous cavalcade of the emperor of Morocco, tells us, that after several parties of people were passed, "came Muley Mahomet Lariba, one of the emperor's sons; he is alcaid of the stables, or master of the horse: there attended him a guard of horse and foot, at the head of which he rode with a lance in his hand, the place where the blade joins to the wood covered with gold." Soon after which came the emperor himself.

The account of this lance seems to give a clear illustration, of what the Septuagint referred to in their translation of this passage; if not of the original of the Hebrew historian. A comparatively modern prince of Persia seems to have emulated this piece of grandeur of Solomon, and to have even surpassed it, though by means of a different kind of weapon from either of those I have been mentioning. According to d'Herbelot, he had two troops of horsemen, consisting of a thousand each; one troop carrying maces of gold, each of which weighed one thousand drachms, or thousand crowns of gold; the second, maces of silver of the same weight. These two brigades served him for his ordinary guard, and upon extraordinary ceremonies each of these horsemen carried his mace upon his shoulder. One tenth part of the number would have been extremely majestic.—HARMER.

Ver. 18. Moreover, the king made a great throne of ivory, and overlaid it with the best gold.

The throne of Solomon is described as having been extremely magnificent, (1 Kings x. 18,) having twelve lions; but on what part of it these ornamental animals were placed is not easy to determine, as we have no accurate idea of its form and construction. We shall therefore now merely extract a description of the mogul's throne, which we find had divers steps also, and, on the top of its ascent, four lions; wherein it seems to bear a partial resemblance to Solomon's stately seat of majesty. "And further, they told me, that he (the mogul) hath at Agra a most glorious throne within his palace, ascended by divers steps, which are covered with plates of silver; upon the top of which ascent stand four lions, upon pedestals of curious coloured marble: which lions are all made of massy silver, some part of them gilded with gold, and beset with precious stones. Those lions support a canopy of fine gold, under which the mogul sits when he appears in his greatest state and glory."—(Sir Thomas Roe's Voyage.)

Thrones were of different kinds; sometimes they resembled a stool, sometimes a chair, sometimes a sofa, and sometimes they were as large as a bed. One of the thrones of Tippoo Saib was the back of a very large royal tiger, made of gold, studded with precious stones; and that part of his back which was employed as a seat, was covered with fine chintzes, &c. by way of cushions.—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

Ver. 20. And twelve lions stood there on the one side, and on the other, upon the six steps: there was not the like made in any kingdom.

In after ages we read of thrones very glorious and majestic. Athanasius says, that the throne of the Parthian kings was of gold, encompassed with four golden pillars, beset with precious stones. The Persian kings sat in judgment under a golden vine, (and other trees of gold,) the bunches of whose grapes were made of several sorts of precious stones. To this article may be very properly annexed the following account of the famous peacock throne of the Great Mogul. "The Great Mogul has seven thrones, some set all over with diamonds; others with rubies, emeralds, and pearls. But the largest throne is erected in the hall of the first court of the palace; it is, in form, like one of our field-beds, six feet long and four broad. I counted about a hundred and eight pale rubies in collets about that throne, the least whereof weighed a hundred carats; but there are some that weigh two hundred. Emeralds counted about a hundred and forty, that weighed some threescore, some thirty carats. The underpart of the canopy is entirely embroidered with pearls and diamonds, with a fringe of pearls round the edge. Upon the top of the canopy, which is made like an arch with four pines, stands a peacock, with his tail spread, consisting entirely of sapphires, and other proper coloured stones: the body is of beaten gold, encased with numerous jewels; and a great ruby adorns his breast, to which hangs a pearl that weighs fifty carats. On each side of the peacock stand two nose-gays, as high as the bird, consisting of various sorts of flowers, all of beaten gold enamelled. When the king seats himself upon the throne, there is a transparent jewel, with a diamond appendant, of eighty or ninety carats weight, encompassed with rubies and emeralds, so suspended that it is always in his eye. The twelve pillars also that uphold the canopy are set round with rows of fair pearl, and of an excellent water, that weigh from six to ten carats a piece. At the distance of four feet, upon each side of the throne, are placed two umbrellas, the handles of which are about eight feet high, covered with diamonds; the umbrellas themselves being of crimson velvet, embroidered and fringed with pearl. This is the famous throne which Timur began, and Shah Johan finished, and is really reported to have cost a hundred and sixty millions and five hundred thousand livres of our money." (Tavernier.—BURNEA.)

Ver. 21. And all King Solomon's drinking vessels were of gold, and all the vessels of the house of the forest of Lebanon were of pure gold; none were of silver: it was nothing accounted of in the days of Solomon.

The magnificence of Solomon, particularly with respect to his drinking vessels, has not been exceeded by modern eastern princes. They were all of gold, and it should seem of the purest gold, 1 Kings x. 21. The gold plate of the kings of Persia has been extremely celebrated, and is mentioned in Sir J. Chardin's note on this passage of the sacred historian: he observes, that the plate of the king of Persia is of gold, and that very fine, exceeding the standard of ducats, and equal to those of Venice, which are of the purest gold. The vessels of gold, we are told in Olearius, were made by the order of Shah Abbas, esteemed the most glorious of the princes of the Sefi royal family, who died 1629. It seems that he caused seven thousand two hundred marks of gold to be melted upon this occasion; that his successors made use of it whenever they feasted strangers; and that it consisted chiefly of dishes, pots, flagons, and other vessels for drinking. A French mark is eight of their ounces, and is but four grains lighter than an English ounce troy. Abbas then melted on this occasion near thirty-six thousand English troy ounces of the purest gold, or almost forty-one three-fourths Jewish talents. Astonishing magnificence of Persia! Nor have we reason to think that of Solomon was inferior. We may believe, sure, his royal drinking vessels were of equal weight, when the two hundred targets Solomon made, 1 Kings x. 16, weighed but little less than the drinking vessels of Shah Abbas. Sir J. Chardin's way of comparing the glory of Solomon, with that of a most illustrious monarch of Persia of late ages, is perhaps one of the most efficacious methods of impressing the mind with an apprehension of the magnificence of this ancient Israelitish king, and, at the same time, appears to be perfectly just.—HARMER.

Ver. 22. For the king had at sea a navy of Tharshish with the navy of Hiram: once in three years came the navy of Tharshish, bringing gold and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks.

This beautiful bird, which is now familiarly known to perhaps every nation of Europe, does not seem to have found his way into Palestine before the reign of Solomon. That rich and powerful monarch, added to his unexampled wisdom, a taste for natural history; and every three years his fleets returned laden with the most curious and valuable products of distant regions. The elegant shape, the majestic mien, and the splendid plumage of the peacock, rendered him a present not unbefitting the greatest king the world had ever seen; and the servants of Solomon, stimulated probably not more by a sense of duty, than by the inclination to gratify their amiable sovereign, were forward to place it under his eye. "For the king had at sea a navy of Tharshish, with the navy of Hiram: once in three years came the navy of Tharshish, bringing gold and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks." The Hebrew name of this bird is (תרשיש) thochijim, which the Greek interpreters, not understanding, left without explanation; but the Chaldee, the Syriac, and other translators, render it the peacock. The origin of the Hebrew name is unknown; and accordingly various are the conjectures in which the learned have indulged their imaginations, or critical acumen. Bochart imagines it is an exotic term; and changing the Hebrew (תרשיש) thochijim by inversion into (תרשיש) cuthijim, he traces it to a Cushite root, intended to denote the native country of the peacock. Nor is it uncommon for an animal to derive its proper name from the place of its original residence. The pheasant is indebted for her name to the Phasis, a river of Colchus, on the banks of which she first drew the attention of the postdiluvian tribes; and African and Numidian birds are so called from Africa or Numidia, the country where they were hatched, and where they commonly fixed their abode. On the same principle, the peacock himself is everywhere called by the ancients the bird of Media or Persia, in which the land of Cush, or Cuth, was situate, because he came originally from that region. Aristophanes calls the peacock the bird of Persia; Suidas, the bird of Media; and Clemens Pædagogus, the bird of India. Diodorus observes, that Babylonia produces a very great number of peacocks marked with colours of every kind. In the opinion of Bochart, India is the true native country of that bird; but it is frequently mentioned as a native of Persia and Media, because it was first imported from India into these countries, from whence it passed into Judea, Egypt, and Greece, and gradually found its way into the other parts of the globe. Hence the peacocks, which were imported in the fleet of Solomon, probably came from Persia; for in that long voyage of three years, in which they visited Taprobane, it is by no means probable they would always pursue a direct course; but along the various windings of the coast, search for any thing that suited their purpose. It is even probable that they sailed up the Persian gulf, and touched at the renowned isles of the Phœnicians, Tyrrus or Tylus, and Aradus, at no great distance from Persia.

The elegance of the peacock's form, and the brilliancy of his plumage, seem to be the principal reasons which induced the mariners of Solomon to bring him into Palestine, and that the sacred historian so distinctly mentions the circumstance. Nature, according to the remark of Varro, has certainly assigned the palm of beauty to the peacock; but since the introduction of the ape into Palestine, an animal neither distinguished by the elegance of his form, nor the brilliancy of his colour, is mentioned at the same time, the historian might intend to direct the reader's attention, as well to the riches and splendour of Solomon, as to his taste for rare and curious articles of natural history. In the Lesser Asia, and in Greece, the peacock was long held in high estimation, and frequently purchased by the great and the wealthy, at a very great price. We learn from Plutarch, that in the age of Pericles, a person at Athens made a great fortune by rearing these birds, and showing them to the public, at a certain price, every new moon; and to this exhibition, the curious Greeks crowded from the remotest parts of the country. The keeper of these birds, the same author informs us, sold a male and female for a thousand drachms, about thirty-six pounds of our money. Peacocks were very rare in Greece, even in the time of Alexander, who, by the testimony of Ælius, was struck with astonishment at the sight of these birds on the banks of the Indus; and from admiration of their beauty, commanded every person that killed one of them, to be severely punished. At Rome, as the same historian relates, when Hortensius first killed one for supper, he was brought to trial, and condemned to pay a fine. Their eggs, according to Varro, were sold in his time at five denarii, or more than three shillings a piece; and the birds themselves commonly at about two pounds of our money. The same writer affirms, that M. Aufidius Luzzo derived an rearily revenue of more than sixty thousand pieces of silver, which amounts to four hundred and sixty-eight pounds fifteen shillings sterling, from the sale of peacocks; for although their flesh is not better tasted than that of a domestic fowl, they were sold at a much greater price on account of the richness and brilliancy of their plumes. These statements prove, that the peacock was deemed, in remote ages, a present not unworthy of a king.—PAXTON.

The last word tukkipeem, of those paragraphs which describe the imports of Solomon's navy from Tharshish, is dubious: some of the learned have thought it means parrots, the greatest number, peacocks. What led some of the curious to imagine parrots were meant, I do not well know; but there is a passage in Hasselquist, which strongly inclines me to adopt their sentiment; describing the commerce of the people of Ethiopia, he says, the Abyssinians make a journey every year to Cairo, to sell the products of their country, slaves, gold, elephants, drugs, monkeys, parrots, &c. As Solomon's navy is said to have brought gold and silver, elephants' teeth, and apes, and peacocks, and this by the way of the Red Sea, 1 Kings ix. 26, which washes the east of Abyssinia, one would imagine, as many of the other particulars tally with each other, that instead of peacocks, the true translation of the last word is parrots. Religion indeed is not at all concerned in this uncertainty; but it is a matter of curiosity, and as such may, with great propriety, be taken notice of in these papers.—HAMMER.

Ver. 28. And Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and linen yarn: the king's merchants received the linen yarn at a price.

Horses were conducted to foreign markets in strings; a circumstance "favourable to those interpreters, who would refer the whole passage, 1 Kings x. 28, and 2 Chron. i. 16, to horses, instead of linen yarn, which seems rather to break the connexion of the verses." Some are therefore inclined to read, "And Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, even strings of horses, (literally, drawings out—prolongations;) the king's merchants received the strings, i. e. of horses, in commutation, exchange, or barter. And a chariot, or set of chariot horses. (i. e. four,) came up from Egypt for six hundred shekels of silver, and a single horse for one hundred and fifty."—And these he sold again, at a great profit, to the neighbouring kings. As the whole context seems rather applicable to horses than to linen yarn, so this idea, while it strictly maintains the import of the words, preserves the unity of the passage. The Egyptian horses were held in great estimation in Syria and the neighbouring countries. The breed seems to have been introduced into Egypt at a very remote period; for the cavalry of Pharaoh was numerous and completely trained to war, when the people of Israel were delivered from his yoke: "But the Egyptians pursued after them, all the horses and chariots of Pharaoh, and his horsemen, and his army, and overtook them encamping by the sea." The dreadful overthrow which Pharaoh received at the Red Sea, did not prevent his successors from again directing their attention to the rearing of horses for the purpose of war: for the numerous and splendid studs of Solomon were chiefly formed of Egyptian horses; and in the fifth year of his son Rehoboam, Shishak, king of Egypt, invaded Canaan "with twelve hundred chariots, and threescore thousand horsemen." In times long posterior, the prophet Jeremiah addressed the forces of Pharaoh Neco, which the king of Babylon routed near the Euphrates, in these words: "Harness the horses; and get up, ye horsemen, and stand forth with your helmets.—Come up, ye horses; and rage, ye chariots; and let the mighty men come forth." From these passages, it may be certainly inferred, that the strength of the Egyptian armies chiefly consisted in cavalry and chariots of war. The Egyptian warrior adorned the neck of his charger with small bells, which were of great use when he had to engage with enemies mounted on camels, the noise of which these animals cannot endure. In allusion to this custom, which was probably adopted by Solomon, who delighted so much in pomp and show, it is promised, "upon the bells of the horses shall be written, Holiness to the Lord." The Egyptian horses appear to have been much stronger than the Syrian breed, and by consequence, much more useful in the field. On this account, the prophet Isaiah tells the people of Israel, that "the Egyptians were men, and not God, and their horses were flesh, and not spirit." The high estimation in which the Egyptian horses were held, and the eagerness with which the surrounding nations purchased them at exorbitant prices, might be one reason for enacting the law which forbade the chosen people to multiply horses, that they might not idly waste their substance, and especially, that they might not return again into Egypt, the scene of their grievous oppression, even for the purposes of commerce.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 36. And unto his son will I give one tribe, that David my servant may have a light always before me in Jerusalem, the city which I have chosen me to put my name there.

The houses in the East were, from the remotest antiquity, lighted with lamps; and hence it is so common in scripture to call everything which enlightens the body or mind, which guides or retires, by the name of a lamp. These lamps were sustained by a large candlestick set upon the ground. The houses of Egypt, in modern times, are never without lights; they burn lamps all the night long, and in every occupied apartment. So requisite to the comfort of a family is this custom reckoned, or so imperious is the power which it exercises, that the poorest people would rather retrench part of their food than neglect it. If this custom prevailed in Egypt and the adjacent regions of Arabia and Palestine in former times, it will impart a beauty and force to some passages of scripture, which have been little observed. Thus, in the language of Jeremiah, to extinguish the light in an apartment is a convertible phrase for total destruction; and if it was the practice in Judea, as in modern Egypt, which can scarcely be doubted, to keep a lamp continually burning in an occupied apartment, nothing can more properly and emphatically represent the total destruction of a city, than the extinction of the lights. "I will take from them the light of a candle; and this whole land shall be a desolation and an astonishment." Job describes the destruction of a family among the Arabs, and the desolation of their dwellings, in the very language of the prophet: "How oft is the candle of the wicked put out, and how oft cometh their destruction upon them!" Bildad expresses the same idea, in the following beautiful passage: "Yea, the light of the wicked shall be put out, and the spark of his fire shall not shine." "The light shall be dark in his tabernacle, and his candle shall be put out with him." A burning lamp is, on the other hand, the chosen symbol of prosperity, a beautiful instance of which occurs in the complaint of Job: "Oh that I were as in mouths past, as in the days when God preserved me, when his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness." When the ten tribes were taken from Rehoboam, and given to his rival, Jehovah promised to reserve one tribe, and assigns this reason, "that David my servant may have a light always before me in Jerusalem."—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 11. And now whereas my father did lade you with a heavy yoke, I will add to your yoke: my father hath chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions.

It is not easy to know which to admire most, the folly or the tyranny of Rehoboam, who in the very commencement of his reign, threatened to lay aside the whips with which his father had chastised the people of Israel, and rule them with scorpions; it was adding insult to cruelty. Nor is the injurious treatment much alleviated, although the idea of some interpreters were admitted, that the scorpion was the name of a kind of whip in use among the Jews, armed with points like the tail of that animal. The sting of the scorpion occasioned an excruciating pain, although death did not ensue. This is attested by John, in the book of Revelation: "And to them it was given that they should not kill them, but that they should be tormented five months; and their torment was as the torment of a scorpion, when he striketh a man." And so intolerable is the agony, that it is added, "In those days shall men seek death, and shall not find it; and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them." If the Jews used a whip which they called a scorpion, it must have been because it occasioned a similar torment. If these things are properly considered, we shall cease to wonder at the instantaneous revolt of the ten tribes; for it is not easy to conceive an address more calculated to rouse and exasperate the bitter passions of a high-spirited people, than the puerile and wicked speech of Rehoboam.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 2. And he cried against the altar in the word of the LORD, and said, O altar, altar, thus saith the LORD, Behold, a child shall be born unto the house of David, Josiah by name; and upon thee shall he offer the priests of the high places that burn incense upon thee, and men's bones shall be burnt upon thee.

These words were uttered in consequence of the profanation of the altar, and the wickedness of those concerned. Has a man brought or purchased a kid for sacrifice to his deity, and should it have been stolen, he goes to his god to tell his story, and then says, "O Swamy! may the bones and the body of him who stole the kid intended for you, be offered up to you as a sacrifice." Whoever walks upon the place where men's bones have been burnt, becomes impure.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 6. And the king answered and said unto the man of God, Entreat now the face of the LORD thy God, and pray for me, that my hand may be restored me again. And the man of God besought the LORD, and the king's hand was restored him again, and became as it was before.

This is said in reference to the hand of Jeroboam, which had become stiff in consequence of the violence he had offered to the prophet. The face of the Lord was to be entreated. Has a man injured another, he says, "Ah! my lord, forgive me for the sake of the FACE of your SON." Or, does he wish another to intercede for him, he says, "Ah! go, and beseech his face for me." A man, whose name was Veatha-Veyáthar, was once asked by some prophet, "Who is the greatest god, Siva or Vishnoo?" The man then stretched forth his hand towards a temple of Vishnoo, and said, "He is the greatest." Immediately his arm became stiff and withered. The prophet, seeing this, then prayed to Siva, and his hand was restored.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 31. And it came to pass, after he had buried him, that he spake to his sons, saying, When I am dead, then bury me in the sepulchre wherein the man of God is buried; lay my bones beside his bones.

His object in making this request, was no doubt a selfish one; he believed the deceased was a good man, and felt a hope, that if his body were to rest near him it would be protected from insult, and that with him he would share the blessings of the resurrection. Wherever the body or the bones of Hindoo or Mohammedan saints are buried, there will others also wish to be interred. Often, when men think themselves near death, they say, "Take care that you bury me near * * * holy man. Ah! remember you are to put me near to * * * sacred place." The idea seems to be, that the spot being thus sanctified, neither devils nor evil spirits can injure them. Numbers are carried to a great distance to be thus interred.—ROBERTS.

Not far from this is another large mausoleum, built by Shah Suleiman, over the remains of a musullman doctor of the name of Mollah Hossein, who was a native of Con-sori, a large town of Irak Ajem, three days' journey from Ispahan. Around these and such like monuments are, in general, to be seen collections of minor tombs; for it is a received opinion, that those who are buried in the vicinity of a holy personage will meet with his support at the day of resurrection.—MORIER.

Ver. 32. For the saying which he cried by the word of the LORD against the altar in Bethel, and against all the houses of the high places which are in the cities of Samaria, shall surely come to pass.

Leaving Nablous, the road lies along the narrow vale, and, in about three quarters of an hour, conducts the traveller to a copious spring of good water, called Beersheba. This, Dr. Richardson says, is the broadest and best cultivated part of the valley; he saw the natives busily engaged (May) in reaping a scanty crop of barley. Maundrell notices a village on the left of the road (going northward) called Beersaba, deriving its name, no doubt, from this well; and, half an hour farther, another village, which he calls Sherack. After leaving Beersheba, Dr. Richardson's account makes the road ascend. "In about a quarter of an hour," he says, "we reached the top of the hill; and as we wound our way down the other side, had an excellent view of the delightfully situated Sebaste. In a few minutes we passed a ruined aqueduct of Roman architecture, and pitched our tents at the bottom of the hill, nearly opposite to its unworthy successor, a poor village of the same name; having travelled this day about nine hours." This makes the distance from Khan Leben about twenty-seven miles, but allowing for deviations from the direct track, twenty-four miles, and sixteen hours, or forty-eight miles from Jerusalem. Josephus, however, makes it but one day's journey from the capital. It is six miles beyond Napolose; and if the distance of the latter place is correctly given by our authorities, it cannot exceed forty miles. Sebaste is the name which Herod gave to the ancient Samaria, the imperial city of the ten tribes, in honour of Augustus (Sebastos) Cesar, when he rebuilt and fortified it, converting the greater part of it into a cadetel, and erecting there a noble temple. "The situation," says Dr. Richardson, "is extremely beautiful, and strong by nature; more so, I think, than Jerusalem. It stands on a fine, large, insulated hill, compassed all around by a broad deep valley; and when fortified, as it is stated to have been by Herod, one would have imagined that, in the ancient system of warfare, nothing but famine could have reduced such a place. The valley is surrounded by four hills, one on each side, which are cultivated in terraces up to the top, sown with grain, and planted with fig and olive trees, as is also the valley. The hill of Samaria likewise rises in terraces to a height equal to any of the adjoining mountains. The present village is small and poor, and, after passing the valley, the ascent to it is very steep. Viewed from the station of our tents, it is extremely interesting, both from its natural situation, and from the picturesque remains of a ruined convent of good Gothic architecture.

"Having passed the village, towards the middle of the first terrace, there is a number of columns still standing. I counted twelve in one row, besides several that stood apart, the brotherless remains of other rows. The situation is extremely delightful, and my guide informed me, that they belonged to the serai, or palace. On the next terrace there are no remains of solid building, but heaps of stone and lime, and rubbish, mixed with soil, in great profusion. Ascending to the third or highest terrace, the traces of former buildings were not so numerous, but we enjoyed a delightful view of the surrounding country. The eye passed over the deep valley that encompasses the hill of Sebaste, and rested on the mountains beyond, that retreated as they rose with a gentle slope, and met the view in every direction, like a book laid out for perusal on a reading-desk. This was the seat of the capital of the short-lived and wicked kingdom of Israel; and on the face of these mountains the eye surveys the scene of many bloody conflicts and many memorable events. Here those holy men of God, Elijah and Elisha, spoke their tremendous warnings in the ears of their incorrigible rulers, and wrought their miracles in the sight of all the people. From this lofty eminence we descended to the south side of the hill, where we saw the remains of a stately colonnade, that stretches along this beautiful exposure from west to east. Sixty columns are still standing in one row. The shafts are plain, and fragments of Ionic volutes, that lie scattered about, testify the order to which they belonged. These are probably the relics of some of the magnificent structures with which Herod the Great adorned Samaria. None of the walls remain." Mr. Buckingham mentions a current tradition, that the avenue of columns formed a part of Herod's palace. According to his account there were eighty-three of these columns erect in 1816, besides others prostrate; all without capitals. Josephus states, that, about the middle of the city, Herod built "a sacred place, of a furlong and a half in circuit, and adorned it with all sorts of decorations; and herein erected a temple, illustrious for both its largeness and beauty." It is probable that these columns belonged to it. On the eastern side of the same summit are the remains, Mr. Buckingham states, of another building, "of which eight large and eight small columns are still standing, with many others fallen near them. These also are without capitals, and are of a smaller size, and of an inferior stone to the others." "In the walls of the humble dwellings forming the modern village, portions of sculptured blocks of stone are perceived, and even fragments of granite pillars have been worked into the masonry." The Gothic convent referred to by Dr. Richardson, is the ruined cathedral, attributed, like every thing else of the kind in Palestine, to the Empress Helena. It stands east and west, and is about one hundred feet in length, by fifty in breadth.—MODERN TRAVELLER.

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 3. And take with thee ten loaves, and cracknels, and a cruise of honey, and go to him: he shall tell thee what shall become of the child.

When they consulted a prophet, the eastern modes required a present; and they might think it was right rather to present him with eatables than other things, because it frequently happened that they were detained some time, waiting the answer of God, during which hospitality would require the prophet to ask them to take some repast with him. And as the prophet would naturally treat them with some regard to their quality, they doubtless did then, as the Egyptians do now, proportion their presents to their avowed rank and number of attendants. "This custom," (of making presents,) says Mailet, "is principally observed in the frequent visits which they make one another through the course of the year, which are always preceded by presents of fowls, sheep, rice, coffee, and other provisions of different kinds. These visits, which relations and friends make regularly to each other, were in use among the ancient Egyptians; and though they are often made without going out of the same city, yet they never fail of lasting three or four days, and sometimes eight. They carry all their family with them, if they have any; and the custom is, as I have just observed, to send presents beforehand, proportionable to their rank, and the number of their attendants." In other cases, the presents that anciently were, and of late have been made to personages eminent for study and piety, were large sums of money or vestments. Sums of money are presented also to others, by princes and great personages. Sir John Chardin observes, in his MS., on occasion of Joseph's being said to have given Benjamin three hundred pieces of silver, Gen. xlv. 22, that the kings of Asia almost always make presents of this kind to ambassadors, and other strangers of consideration who have brought them presents. So the Calif Mahadi, according to D'Herbelot, gave an Arab that had entertained him in the desert, a vest and a purse of silver: as to vestments, D'Herbelot tells us, that Bokhteri, an illustrious poet of Cufah, in the ninth century, had so many presents made him in the course of his life, that at his death he was found possessed of a hundred complete suits of clothes, two hundred shirts, and five hundred turbans.

D'Arvieux tells us, that when he waited on an Arab emir, his mother and sister, to gratify whose curiosity that visit was made, sent him, early in the morning after his arrival in their camp, a present of pastry, honey, fresh butter, with a basin of sweetmeats of Damascus. Sir John Chardin tells us, in his Travels, of an officer whose business it was to register the presents that were made to his master or mistress; and I have since found the same practice obtains at the Ottoman court: for Egmont and Heyman, speaking of the presents made there on the account of the circumcision of the grand seignior's children, tell us that all these donations, with the time when, and on what occasion given, were carefully registered in a book for that purpose.

When Dr. Perry travelled in Egypt, and visited the temple at Luxor, he says, "We were entertained by the calif here with great marks of civility and favour; he sent us, in return of our presents, several sheep, a good quantity of eggs, bardacks," &c. These bardacks he had described a little before, in speaking of a town called Keene: "Its chief manufactory," he there tells us, "is in bardacks, to cool and refresh their water in, by means of which it drinks very cool and pleasant in the hottest seasons of the year. They make an inconceivable quantity of these, which they distribute to Cairo, and all other parts of Egypt. They send them down in great floats, consisting of many thousands, lashed together in such a manner as to bear the weight of several people upon them. We purchased a good many of them for the fancy, at so inconsiderable a price as twenty pence a hundred; and are really surprised how they could make them for it."—BUDEA.

The presents made to the ancient prophets were not always of the same kind and value; an inhabitant of Baalshalisha "brought the man of God bread of the first-fruits, twenty loaves of barley, and full ears of corn in the husk." The king of Israel sent a present by his wife to the prophet Ahijah, of ten loaves, and cracknels, and a cruise of honey; which, it appears from other statements, was not deemed unworthy of an eastern king. Some commentators are of opinion, that it was a present fit only for a peasant to make, and was designedly of so small value, to conceal the rank of the messenger. But this idea by no means corresponds with the custom of the East; for D'Arvieux informs us, that when he waited on an Arabian emir, his mother and sister sent him a present of pastry, honey, fresh butter, with a basin of sweetmeats, which differs very little from the present of Jeroboam. It was certainly the wish of the king, that his wife should not be recognised by the aged prophet; but the present she carried, though not intended to discover her, was, in the estimation of the Orientals, not unbecoming her rank and condition.—PACTON.

Travellers agree that the eastern bread is made in small, thin moist cakes, must be eaten new, and is good for nothing when kept longer than a day. This, however, admits of exceptions. Dr. Russel of late, and Rawwolf formerly, assure us, that they have several sorts of bread and cakes. Some, Rawwolf tells us, done with yolk of eggs, some mixed with several sorts of seeds, as of sesamm, Romish coriander, and wild garden saffron, which are also strewed upon it: and he elsewhere supposes that they prepare biscuits for travelling. Russel also mentions this strewing of seeds on their cakes, and says they have a variety of rusks and biscuits. To these authors let me add Pitts, who tells us, the biscuits they carry with them from Egypt will last them to Mecca and back again. So the scripture supposes their loaves of bread were very small, three of them being requisite for the entertainment of a single person, Luke xi. 5; that they were generally eaten new, and baked as they wanted them, as appears from the case of Abraham; that sometimes, however, they were made so as to keep several days; so the shew-bread was fit food after having stood before the Lord a week. And that bread for travellers was wont to be made to keep some time, appears from the pretences of the Gibeonites, Josh. ix. 12; and the preparations Joseph made for Jacob's journey into Egypt, Gen. xlv. 23. In like manner, too, they seem to have had then a variety of eatables of this kind, as the Aleppines now have. In particular, some made like those on which seeds are strewed, as we may collect from that part of the present of Jeroboam's wife to the prophet Ahijah, which our translators have rendered cracknels, 1 Kings xiv. iii. Buxtorf indeed supposes the original word nak-kadeem, signifies biscuits, called by this name either because they were formed into little buttons like some of our ginger-bread, or because they were pricked full of holes after a particular manner. The last of these two conjectures, I imagine, was embraced by our translators of this passage, for cracknels, as they are all over England of the same form, are full of holes, being formed into a kind of flourish of lattice-work. I have seen some of the unleavened bread of our English Jews, made in like manner, in a net-work form. Nevertheless, I think it more natural to understand the word of biscuits spotted with seeds; for it is used elsewhere to signify works of gold spotted with studs of silver; and, as it should seem, bread spotted with mould, Josh. ix. 5—12; how much more natural then is it to understand the word of cakes spotted with seeds, which are so common, that not only Rauwolf and Russel speak of them at Aleppo, but Hanway tells us, too, that the cakes of bread that were presented to him at the house of a Persian of distinction, were in like manner sprinkled with the seeds of poppies and other things, than of cracknels, on account of their being full of holes. It is used for things that are spotted we know, never in any other place for a thing full of holes. Our translators then do not appear to have been very happy in the choice of the word cracknels here.—HARMER.

Ver. 6. And it was so, when Ahijah heard the sound of her feet, as she came in at the door, that he said, Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam; why feignest thou thyself to be another? for I am sent to thee with heavy tidings.

This woman disguised herself in order to deceive the prophet, and therefore he addressed her by name, to show that she was known to him. Married women are generally spoken to as the wife of such a person. Supposing a married female to be in a crowd, and a man on the outside wishes to speak to her, he will say, "Come hither, wife of Chinné Tamby;" literally, Chinné Tamby's wife, hither come. "O! Muttoo's wife, where are you?" Should a person have to speak to a female who is walking before him, he will not call her by name, but address her, "Such a one's wife, I wish to speak to you."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 10. Therefore, behold, I will bring evil upon the house of Jeroboam, and will cut off from Jeroboam him that pisseth against the wall, and him that is shut up, and left in Israel, and will take away the remnant of the house of Jeroboam, as a man taketh away dung, till it be all gone.

Sometimes, when a successful prince has endeavoured to extirpate the preceding royal family, some of them have escaped the slaughter, and secured themselves in a fortress or place of secrecy, while others have sought an asylum in foreign countries, from whence they have occasioned great anxiety to the usurper. The word shut up, strictly speaking, refers to the first of these cases; as in the preservation of Joash from Athaliah in a private apartment of the temple. Such appears also to have been the case in more modern times. "Though more than thirty years had elapsed since the death of the Sultan Achmet, father of the new emperor, he had not, in that interval, acquired any great information or improvement. Shut up during this long interval in the apartment assigned him, with some eunuchs to wait on him, the equality of his age with that of the princes who had a right to precede him, allowed him but little hope of reigning in his turn; and he had, besides, well-grounded reasons for a more serious uneasiness." (Baron De Tott.) But when David was in danger, he kept himself close in Ziklag, but not so as to prevent him from making frequent excursions. In latter times, in the East, persons of royal descent have been left, when the rest of a family have been cut off, if no danger was apprehended from them, on account of some mental or bodily disqualification. Blindness saved the life of Mohammed Khodsbendeh, a Persian prince of the sixteenth century, when his brother Ismael put all the rest of his brethren to death.—HARMER.

We find divine anger threatening to "cut off from Jeroboam him who is shut up and left in Israel," 1 Kings xiv. 10. In chap. xxi. 21, the same threat is made against Ahab; vide also 2 Kings ix. 8. This shutting up of the royal family appears sufficiently strange to us; and the rather as we perceive that the sons of David the king enjoyed liberty sufficient, and more than sufficient. The following extracts will throw some light on this subject: "In one of them we find the royal family dwelling together on a mountain, which, though a place of confinement, yet had some extent. In the other, we find them in a palace, which only in name differed from a prison. The crown being hereditary in one family, but elective in the person, and polygamy being permitted, must have multiplied these heirs very much, and produced constant disputes; so that it was found necessary to provide a remedy for the anarchy and effusion of royal blood, which was otherwise inevitably to follow. The remedy was a humane and gentle one; they were confined in a good climate upon a high mountain, and maintained there at the public expense. They are there taught to read and write, but nothing else; 750 cloths for wrapping round them; 3000 ounces of gold, which is 30,000 dollars, or crowns, are allowed by the state for their maintenance. These princes are hardly used, and, in troublesome times, often put to death upon the smallest misinformation.—While I was at Abyssinia, their revenue was so grossly misapplied, that some of them were said to have died with hunger and of cold, by the avarice and hard-heartedness of Michael neglecting to furnish them necessaries. Nor had the king, as far as I could discern, that fellow-feeling one would have expected from a prince rescued from that very situation himself. Perhaps this was owing to his fear of Ras Michael.

"However that be, and however distressing the situation of those princes, we cannot but be satisfied with it, when we look to the neighbouring kingdom of Sennaar or Nubia. There no mountain is trusted with the confinement of their princes, but as soon as the father dies, the throats of all the collateral, and all their descendants that can be laid hold of, are cut; and this is the case with all the black states in the desert west of Sennaar, Dar Four, Sele, and Begirma." (Bruce.) We see now how Athaliah might destroy, not merely an individual, but all the seed royal, (2 Kings xi. 1.) because, if she found access to the palace to accomplish the slaughter of any one, she might easily cut off the whole. This also renders credible the slaughter of Ahab's sons, seventy young persons at one time. They were kept shut up, it seems, in Samaria, where their keepers became their destroyers. How far the same confinement might take place in the instance of the sons of Gideon, (Judges ix. 2, 5,) we cannot determine; but it should appear, that at least they were kept in one place of abode, whether that place were the mansion or the tower of their father.—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

CHAPTER XV.

Ver. 2. Three years reigned he in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom.

It has been conjectured by Mr. Barnh, that the phrase, "and his mother's name was," &c. when expressed on a king's accession to the throne, at the beginning of his history, does not always refer to his natural mother, but that it is a title of honour and dignity, enjoyed by one of the royal family, denoting her to be the first in rank. This idea appears well founded from the following extracts: "The Oloo Kani is not governess of the Crimea. This title, the literal translation of which is, great queen, simply denotes a dignity in the harem, which the khan usually confers on one of his sisters; or if he has none, on one of his daughters, or relations. To this dignity are attached the revenues arising from several villages, and other rights." (Baron De Tott.) "On this occasion the king crowned his mother Malacotawit, conferring upon her the dignity and title of iteghé, i. e. as king's mother, regent and governess of the king when under age." (Bruce's Travels.)—BURDEA.

Ver. 18. And King Asa sent them to Ben-hadad, the son of Tabrimon, the son of Hezion, king of Syria, that dwelt at Damascus, saying, 19. There is a league between me and thee, and between my father and thy father: behold, I have sent unto thee a present of silver and gold; come and break thy league with Baasha, king of Israel, that he may depart from me.

I will not push my remarks on the presents of the East any further here, excepting the making this single observation more, that the sending presents to princes to induce them to help the distressed, has been practised in these countries in late times, as well as in the days of Asa, of whom we read, that he "took all the silver and the gold that were left in the treasures of the house of the Lord, and the treasures of the king's house, and delivered them into the hand of his servants: and king Asa sent them to Benha-dad the son of Tabrimon, the son of Hezion, king of Syria, that dwelt at Damascus, saying, There is a league between me and thee, and between my father and thy father: behold, I have sent unto thee a present of silver and gold; come and break thy league with Baasha, king of Israel, that he may depart from me." To us it appears strange, that a present should be thought capable of inducing one prince to break with another, and engage himself in war; but as it was anciently thought sufficient, so we find in the Gesta Dei per Francos, that an eastern nobleman, that had the custody of a castle called Hasarth, quarrelling with his master, the prince of Aleppo, and finding himself obliged to seek for foreign aid, sent presents to Godfrey of Bouillon, to induce him to assist him. What they were we are not told: but gold and silver, the things Asa sent Benhadad, were frequently sent in those times to the crusade princes, and might probably be sent on this occasion to Godfrey.—

CHAPTER XVI.

Ver. 34. In his days did Hiel the Bethelite build Jericho: he laid the foundation thereof in Abiram his first-born, and set up the gates thereof in his youngest son Segub, according to the word of the LORD, which he spake by Joshua the son of Nun.

See on Judges 11. 30, 31.

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 1. And Elijah the Tishbite, who was of the inhabitants of Gilead, said unto Ahab, As the LORD God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word.

The latter rain falls in the middle or towards the end of April, from which, if there be three months to the harvest, as the prophet asserts, it must fall in the middle or towards the end of July. But at present in Syria, barley-harvest commences about the beginning of May, and that, as well as the wheat-harvest, is finished by the twentieth of the same month. In Judea the harvest is still more early. The rain, therefore, which God threatens to withhold from his people, must have commonly fallen in the first part of February. That a quantity of snow descends at Jerusalem at this time, which is of great importance to the succeeding harvest, by making the fountains to overflow a little afterward, is confirmed by the authority of Dr. Shaw. It is no real objection to this view, that the prophet threatens to withhold the rain; for the great difference of temperature in Palestine, may be the cause that it snows in the mountainous districts, while it rains in other parts of the same country. By the moderate quantity of rain or snow which falls in the month of February, the reservoirs of water on which the cities of Palestine chiefly depend, are filled, and the prospect of a fruitful and plentiful year is opened. Of so great importance to the subsistence and comfort of that people are these rains, that upon their descent, they make similar rejoicings with the Egyptians upon the cutting of the Nile. The prophet evidently refers to both these circumstances; to the succeeding harvest, in these words: "the piece or field upon which it rained not, withered;" to the state of the cisterns in these: "so two or three cities wandered into one city to drink water, but they were not satisfied." Hence, Mr. Harmer, who treats Jerome on this occasion with undue severity, is wrong in supposing that the inspired writer refers to the single circumstance of filling their cisterns with water. He refers to both, and this Jerome distinctly notices: "God suspended the rain," says that father, "not only to punish them with want of bread, but also with thirst; for in those countries in which they then resided, excepting a few fountains, they had only cistern-water; so that if the divine anger suspended the rains, there was more danger of perishing by thirst than by famine." Jerome certainly committed a mistake when he referred the words of Amos to the latter rain; but he understood as certainly the true extent of the threatening.

The former and the latter rains were, in the days of Elijah, suspended for three years and six months. But when the prophet said to Ahab, "As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word;" he could not mean, there shall be no rain at all for three years; for long before their termination, the whole population of Israel must have miserably perished. It is not uncommon among the Orientals, to express a great deficiency by an absolute negative. Thus Philo affirms, that in Egypt they have no winter; by which, according to his own explanation, he meant no hail, no thunder, no violent storms of wind, which constitute an eastern winter. Pliny in like manner affirms there are no rains, no thunders, no earthquakes in that country; while Maillet, who quotes him, asserts that he had seen it rain there several times, and that there were two earthquakes in Egypt during his residence. His idea therefore, is very plausible, that Pliny meant only to state the rare occurrence of these phenomena; that it seldom feels the power of the earthquake, and when it does, suffers but little damage; that it very seldom rains or thunders, although on the seacoast the rains and thunders are often very violent; but it does not rain there as in other parts of the world. This account of the rain of Egypt is confirmed by the testimony of two English travellers. When Pits was at Cairo, the rain descended in torrents, and the streets having no kennels to carry off the water, it reached above the ankles, and in some places much higher. In Upper Egypt it rained and hailed almost a whole morning, when Dr. Pococke was there in the month of February; and the following night it also rained very hard. These authentic statements unfold the true meaning of the prophet's assertion, "that Egypt has no rain;" he must be understood in the same qualified sense as Pliny and other writers. In the same manner, the words of Elijah to Ahab must be interpreted; they only mean, that the dew and the rain should not fall in the usual and necessary quantities. Such a suspension of rain and dew was sufficient to answer the corrective purposes of God, while an absolute drought of three years' continuance, must have converted the whole country into an uninhabitable waste. But such a destruction is not intimated in the scriptures; and, we may conclude from the inspired narrative, did not take place. That guilty people were certainly reduced in the righteous judgments of God to great straits; but still they were able to subsist until his fierce anger passed away, and mercy returned to bless their afflicted habitations.—

PAXTON.

Ver. 4. And it shall be, that thou shalt drink of the brook; and I have commanded the ravens to feed thee there.

It is a singular circumstance, that the raven, an unclean bird, and one too of very gross and impure dispositions, was chosen by Jehovah to provide for his servant Elijah, when he concealed himself, by the divine command, from the fury of Ahab. So improbable is the story in the ear of reason, that morose and voracious ravens should become caterers for the prophet, that some interpreters have maintained that the original word denotes merchants or Arabians, or the inhabitants of the city Arbo: according to this interpretation, the promise would run, "I have commanded the Arabs, or the Orebim, to nourish thee." But it is easy to show that these opinions have no foundation in scripture and reason. The prophet Ezekiel indeed describes the merchants of Tyre by the phrase עֲרָבִים מֵעִיר אַרְבֵי מַעְרֹבָה, "thy merchants who transact thy business;" but the word orebim, (עֲרָבִים) by itself, never signifies merchants. Nor had God said in general, I have commanded the merchants, but I have commanded the merchants of this or that place, to nourish thee. The situation of the place in which the miracle happened, refutes the other opinions; for in the neighbourhood of Jordan, where Elijah concealed himself, were no Arabs, no Orebim, and no city which bore the name of Arbo. Besides, the Arabs are not called in Hebrew (עֲרָבִים) orebim, but (עֲרָבִים) arabim, and the inhabitants of Arbo, if any city of that name existed, according to the genius of the Hebrew language, must have been called (עֲרָבִים אַרְבֹּיִם) arabojim, not orebim. Add to this, Elijah was commanded to hide himself there; but how could he hide himself, if the inhabitants of the city or encampment knew of his retreat, as they must have done, if his daily subsistence depended upon their bounty. The place of his retreat must have been discovered in a very short time to Ahab, who sought him with great industry in every direction. The solemn declaration of Obadiah to the prophet, when he went by the divine command to show himself to the king, proves how impossible it was for him to remain concealed in the inhabited part of the country: "As the Lord thy God liveth, there is no nation or kingdom whither my lord hath not sent to seek thee; and when they said, He is not there, he took an oath of the kingdom and nation, that they found thee not." Hence these ha-rebim were not merchants, nor human beings of any station or employment, but true ravens; and so the term has been rendered by the whole Christian church, and by many Jewish writers, particularly by their celebrated historian, Josephus.

These voracious and impure animals received a commandment from their Maker to provide for his prophet by the brook Cherith, near its confluence with the Jordan. The record is couched in these terms: "Get thee hence and turn thee eastward, and hide thyself by the brook Cherith, that is before Jordan: and it shall be that thou shalt drink of the brook; and I have commanded the ravens to feed thee there." In the history of providence, such commands are by no means uncommon; the locust, the serpent, and the fishes of the sea, have all in their turn received the charge to do the will of their Almighty Creator. Thus he promised to Solomon at the dedication of the temple: "If I command the locusts to devour the land—if my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves, and pray, and seek my face, and turn from their wickedness; then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land." The marine serpent that lurks in the deepest caverns of the ocean, in like manner hears his voice, and submits to his authority; for Jehovah directed the prophet to address his guilty countrymen in these memorable terms: "Though they be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea, thence will I command the serpent, and he shall bite them." Nor was the great fish which he prepared to swallow up the refractory prophet, less prompt in its obedience: "And the Lord spake unto the fish, and it vomited out Jonah upon the dry land." His providence extends its powerful influence even to inanimate objects: "I, even my hands, have stretched out the heavens, and all their hosts have I commanded." And David, in the Spirit, complained of his ancestors, that "they believed not in God, and trusted not in his salvation: though he had commanded the clouds from above, and opened the doors of heaven." Even the furious billows of the sea dare not pass the line which his finger has traced, without his permission: "I made the cloud the garment thereof, and thick darkness a swaddling band for it, and brake up for it my decreed place, and set bars and doors, and said, Hitherto shalt thou come, but no farther; and here shall thy proud waves be stayed." The inanimate and irrational parts of creation, properly speaking, cannot receive and execute the commands of the Almighty; they are only passive instruments employed by him in his providential dispensations, to produce certain effects. To command the ravens then, is to make use of them in providing for the necessities of his servant; to impart for a time an instinctive care to supply him with food, to which they were by nature entire strangers, and which they ceased to feel when the end was accomplished. A command to sustain the destitute seer, after the brook of which he drank was dried up, was addressed in a very different manner to the widow of Zarephath. It was couched in words addressed to her understanding and heart, while the secret power of Jehovah inclined her to yield a prompt and efficacious obedience. On this occasion, a number of ravens were employed, because the service of one was not sufficient to supply the prophet with daily food. But the circumstance entirely accords with the native instincts of that bird; for the ravens go in quest of their prey in troops, and share in common the spoils of the chase. Following, therefore, the instincts of their nature, which received for a time a peculiar direction, by the miraculous interposition of Jehovah, a number of ravens associated together, in order to supply the wants of Elijah, whom his country had abandoned to the rage of an impious and cruel monarch: "And they brought him bread and flesh in the morning, and bread and flesh in the evening, and he drank of the brook." The Septuagint, in many copies, read the passage, "They brought bread in the morning, and flesh in the evening;" but the common reading is entitled to the preference. It gives a striking display of divine goodness, that when the whole resources of Israel were exhausted by a long and severe famine, the prophet of the Lord was miraculously and abundantly supplied with nutritious food twice every day. The ravens brought it in the evening and in the morning, which were the stated hours of repast among the Jews and other oriental nations.

The Hebrew writers eagerly inquire where the ravens found the provisions to supply the wants of Elijah; and, as may be supposed, very different are the opinions they advance; but on this question, which is of little importance, no certainty can be obtained. The scriptures are silent on the subject, and we have no other means of information. It was enough for the prophet, that his winged providers regularly supplied his necessities; and it is sufficient to excite our admiration of the power and goodness of God, and our confidence in his providential care, without attempting to discover what the divine wisdom has seen meet to conceal. On another occasion, an angel was sent from heaven to supply the exhausted prophet with bread and water in the desert; which, in the eye of reason, may seem to be a more becoming messenger of the King of glory, than a raven. But "the ways of God are not as our ways, nor his thoughts as our thoughts;" he did not think it beneath his dignity at this time, to employ the ravens in the same office; and he perhaps intended to teach us, that all creatures are equally subject to his authority, and fit for his purpose. When he gives the commandment, a raven is as successful in his service, according to the range of its faculties, as an angel; and we must not presume to refuse or slight his aid, how mean soever the agent he condescends to employ. The Jewish legislator placed the raven in the list of unclean birds, which imparted pollution to every thing they touched; but the same God who gave the law, had a right to repeal or suspend it; and that he did suspend it for a time in favour of his persecuted servant, cannot be reasonably denied. Nor was this a singular instance of divine clemency; for the observance of ceremonial institutions often yielded to urgent necessity. The Jews were forbidden to touch a dead carcass; but Samson was allowed, for a special purpose, to eat of the honey which he found in the dead lion. The priests only were permitted by the law to eat the shew-bread; yet David and his men were justified by our Lord himself in using the consecrated leaves, when no other could be procured.

Many are the reasons assigned by different writers, for the employment of ravens on this occasion; but they are so trifling, or so fanciful, that it is unnecessary to state them; the true reason perhaps was to convince the dejected prophet, that although his nation had forsaken him, the God whom he served continued to watch over him with unceasing care; and that he would employ the most unpromising means, and counteract the most powerful instincts, rather than suffer him to want the necessities of life. And when he saw those voracious birds, the cravings of whose appetite are seldom entirely satisfied, part of their own accord, with their favourite provision, morning and evening, for many days, and bring it themselves to the place of his retreat; he could not mistake or disregard the secret influence under which they acted. The brook Cherith, on whose border the miracle was wrought, is supposed to be the same as the river Kana, mentioned in the sixteenth and seventeenth chapters of Joshua, which watered the confines of Ephraim and Benjamin. This brook derived its name Kana, from the reeds, which, in great abundance, clothed its banks; among which the prophet found a secure retreat from the persecution of his enemies. Its other name, Cherith, may be traced to the verb Charah, which the Greek interpreters render to feed because on its margin the prophet was fed by the ravens. Were this conjecture true, the name must have been given by anticipation; for which no satisfactory reason can be assigned. It is, more natural to suppose, that, as the verb commonly signifies to dig, arx sometimes to rush on with violence, the name Cherith alludes to the violent rapidity of the stream at certain seasons of the year, or to the deep pits which, like many other torrents in those regions, it excavates in its furious course. The particular situation of this brook is more distinctly marked by the sacred historian, who says, it "is before Jordan." This phrase seems to mean, that it flowed into the Jordan; and from the second clause of the verse we may infer, that its course lay on the west side of the river, because it is said by God to Elijah, "Get thee hence, and turn thee eastward, and hide thyself by the brook Cherith, that is before Jordan:" for Elijah must have been on the west side of Jordan, when he was commanded to go eastward to a stream that flowed to the Jordan on that side.—PAXTON.

Some suppose ravens to be a mistranslation, and that the promise referred to a people who were to feed the prophet. The following quotation from the Scanda Purāna does not negative the opinion but it shows, in a remote period, that birds were supposed on some special occasions to depart from their usual habits. In the relation of the events of great antiquity among the heathen, much of fable must be expected but there is often a glimmering ray of light in the obscurity, pointing to circumstances which assist the mind in its attainment of truth. In the town of Kanche (Conjeveram) it is said, "Of the birds, there is a sathaka bird which takes food to the gods, a swan which gives precious stones, a parrot which repeats science, and a cock which crows not in time of trouble."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 12. And she said, As the LORD thy God liveth, I have not a cake, but a handful of meal in a barrel, and a little oil in a cruise: and, behold, I am gathering two sticks, that I may go in and dress it for me and my son, that we may eat it, and die.

So said the widow of Zarephath to the prophet Elijah. How often do we see females, just before the time of boiling their rice, strolling about in search of a few sticks to make it ready. All their fires are made of wood, (or dried cows' dung,) and in a country where there is so much jungle, and so little rain, they seldom trouble themselves before the moment they require it. But the widow said that she was gathering two sticks; and it is not a little singular to find that the Hindoos often use the same number when it refers to many things. "Well, Venasi, what are you looking for?" "I am looking for two sticks to prepare my rice." "Child, go fetch me trendu-taddi, two sticks, to make ready my curry." "Alas! I cannot find two sticks to make the water hot." "My lord, I only ask for two mouthfuls of rice." "Ah! sir, if you will allow me to repeat two words in your ear, I shall be satisfied." "Good, have you any thing more to say?" "No, sir." "Then I have not two words for that," (meaning, he does not object.) Any person who has been in the East, will recognise, in these quotations, a figure of speech he has heard a thousand times.—ROBERTS.

The corn which they reserve for daily use, they keep in long earthen jars; because, when kept in sacks or barrels, it is liable to be eaten by worms. This is confirmed by Norden, who tells us, that when he was travelling in Upper Egypt, one of the natives opened a great jar, in order to show him how they preserved their corn there. In some regions of the East Indies, the paddy, or rice in the husk, is also preserved in large earthen jars, that are kept in the house; or in small cylindrical stores, which the potters make of clay; the mouth is covered with an inverted pot; and the paddy is drawn out of a hole at the bottom, as it is wanted. It seems to have been in one of these earthen jars that the woman of Zarephath kept her corn, of which she had only enough left, when the prophet Elijah applied to her for a morsel of bread, to make a handful of meal. In our translation, the original term (רֶזֶק) chad is rendered barrel; but a barrel, properly speaking, it could not be, because a vessel of that sort is never used for holding corn in these regions. Neither could it be a chest, although this is often used in the East for preserving corn; because the Hebrew term is quite different. In the second book of Kings it is stated, that "Jehoiada the priest took (רֶזֶק) aron a chest, and bored a hole in the lid of it, and set it beside the altar." The same word is employed by Moses, to denote a coffin; but most generally, to signify the chest, or ark of the testimony, on which the cherubim stood, in the holy of holies. This term, among the Hebrews, therefore, properly signified a chest made of wood; never a vessel for holding water. But (רֶזֶק) chad they commonly used to signify a jar or pitcher for holding water; which was made of earth, never of wood. It is the same word in the original, which the sacred historian employs, to denote the vessels in which Gideon's army concealed their torches, and which they broke with a clashing terrific noise, when they blew with their trumpets. Both these circumstances suppose they were vessels of earth, which are employed in the East for the double purpose of preserving corn and holding water. The (רֶזֶק) chad was also the vessel with which Rebecca went out to fetch water from the well; which, in our translation, is rendered pitcher. But the Orientals never carried a barrel to the fountain, nor drew water with a wooden vessel. Hence, the barrel in which the woman of Zarephath kept her corn, was in reality an earthen jar. The four barrels of water, then, which Elijah commanded his attendants to pour on the sacrifice, should have been translated four jars or pitchers; for the original word is the same in all these instances.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Ver. 5. And Ahab said unto Obadiah, Go into the land, unto all fountains of water, and unto all brooks: peradventure we may find grass to save the horses and mules alive, that we lose not all the beasts. 6. So they divided the land between them, to pass throughout it: Ahab went one way by himself, and Obadiah went another way by himself.

See on Est. 8. 10.

Brooks were generally the most likely places to find grass in a time of drought, though far from being places where they might be certain of succeeding; for in such seasons, herbaceous animals generally stop near fountains of water, and feed in the vicinity, till all the grass be consumed. Thus travellers are often greatly disappointed, who naturally expect to find grass where they find water; but on reaching the spot they find that the game has consumed every blade of grass. However, as the cattle could not graze long where there was no water, it was the wisest method Ahab could pursue. The circumstance shows the simplicity of ancient manners, that a king and one of his principal governors should go at the head of such expeditions. It is the same in Africa at this present time; for no king there, nor any of his principal chiefs, would think they were at all lessening their dignity by engaging in an expedition either in search of water or grass. Indeed, it would be viewed by the people as one of the most important affairs in which their rulers could be engaged, and, did they succeed, few things would be likely to render them more popular.—AFRICAN LIGHT.

It appears there had not been rain for three years and six months, which must have had a fatal effect on vegetation. What would England (situated in a temperate climate) be under such circumstances? In droughts in the East, which have lasted from six to ten months, how often have we seen men, like Obadiah, going along in marshy places, or by the sides of tanks, in search of grass for their cattle? See the poor fellow with a basket, made of the leaves of the palm-irah, on his back, a little instrument (which works like a Dutch hoe) in his hand; he strolls from fountain to brook, and no sooner does he see a green patch of verdure, than he runs with eagerness to the spot! Perhaps he meets another in search of the same thing, when each declares he had the first view. They set to work, snarling at each other, and dealing out all kinds of abuse, till they have cleared the place of every green blade. Wherever there is a stream or an artificial watercourse, there the eye is refreshed with delightful verdure; but look a few yards from the place, and you see the withered herbage, apparently gone beyond recovery, but which, in a few hours, would start into fresh life, if visited by showers. The effect of rain is like enchantment on the scene, and the English stranger is often reminded of the green fields of his own native land.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 9. And he said, What have I sinned, that thou wouldest deliver thy servant into the hand of Ahab, to slay me?

Obadiah asked this question of Elijah, when the prophet wished him to go and tell Ahab, his bitter enemy, "Behold, Elijah is here." Thus, a person requested to do any thing which implies danger or difficulty, asks, Enna-pollā ppo-sey-thaue? "What evil or sin have I done?" The question is also asked, when a man is visited with affliction, "What evil has he done?"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 10. As the LORD thy God liveth, there is no nation or kingdom whither my lord hath not sent to seek thee: and when they said, He is not there, he took an oath of the kingdom and nation, that they found thee not.

People in England would be astonished and appalled at the frequency and nature of the oaths of the heathen. A man's assertion or affirmation, in common conversation, is seldom believed. Thus, men may be heard in the streets, in the fields, or bazaars, and children in the schools or the play-grounds, say, "Swear you will do this; now take an oath you have not done it." Then they swear by the temple, or its lamp, by their parents, or children, and appeal to their deities for a confirmation of the assertion.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 19. Now therefore send, and gather to me all Israel unto Mount Carmel, and the prophets of Baal four hundred and fifty, and the prophets of the groves four hundred, which eat at Jezebel's table.

We are not, I apprehend, to suppose that these eight hundred and fifty prophets, or even the four hundred of the groves, ate at the royal table, where Jezebel herself took her refectory; for though I am sensible it is not unusual in the East for servants to eat at the same table where their masters have eaten, after their masters have done; and that several hundreds eat in the palaces of the eastern princes; yet it could never be thought necessary by Jezebel to have four hundred chaplains in waiting at once at court. I should think the words mean, that these four hundred prophets of the groves fed daily at a common table, in or near the temple of that idol which they served, and which was provided for at the expense of Jezebel, living there in a kind of collegiate way, as the prophets of JEHOVAH appear to have done. Their business was, I suppose, to sing the praises of the idols they worshipped; and to watch from time to time in their temples, under the pretence of receiving oracular answers to the inquiries of those that came to consult them; and, it may be, to teach the worshippers in what form of words to address the deity they served.—HARMER.

Ver. 27. And it came to pass at noon, that Elijah mocked them, and said, Cry aloud; for he is a god: either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked.

In the hottest part of the day the Orientals retire to rest on their bed, till the cool of the evening summons them again to active life. "The heathens," says Mr. Blunt, "assigned all the properties and habits of man to their gods, and among the number, that of reposing at midday. Hence was it unlawful to enter the temples at that hour, lest their slumbers should be disturbed. The goatherd ventured not to play upon his pipe at noon, for fear of awakening Pan. Hence, too, the peculiar force of the derision with which Elijah addressed the priests of Baal: And it came to pass at noon, that Elijah mocked them, and said, Cry aloud; for he is a god—peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked." Accordingly we read that these priests did not despair of rousing their god, and inducing him to declare himself, 'till the time of evening sacrifice.' At that hour the period allowed for repose had terminated: and when he still continued deaf to their cries, then, and not till then, their cause became altogether hopeless.—PAXTON.

The margin has, for "talking," "meditateth," and for "pursuing," "hath a pursuit." This keen and ingenious sarcasm relates, I doubt not, to their god, as having been accustomed sometimes to sleep, to talk, to go on a journey, or to join in the pursuit. That the Baal-peor of Assyria, and the Siva-lingam of India, are the same, is certain.

And is it not interesting to know that those things which are attributed to Baal are also attributed to Siva? "Either he is talking." The margin has, for "talking," "meditateth." Dr. A. Clarke says, "Perhaps the word should be interpreted as in the margin, he meditateth, he is in a profound reverie, he is making some godlike projects, he is considering how he may keep up his credit in the nation." Siva was once absorbed in a profound meditation: to him the time appeared only as a moment, but to the world as ages. Universal nature, for want of his attention, was about to expire. Women had ceased to bear, and all things were out of course. The gods and men became alarmed, and their enemies began to oppress them. All were afraid to disturb him in his meditations, till Cama, the god of love, agreed to stand before him: when Siva, being aroused from his reverie, sent fire from his frontal eye, which destroyed the intruder.

"Or he is pursuing." The Hebrew has this, "hath a pursuit:" on which Dr. A. Clarke says, "he may be taking his pleasure in hunting." Siva is described as taking great pleasure in the chase; and in the month of September, his image and that of Pārvati, his wife, are taken from the temple, put into a kead-agam, or ear, and carried on men's shoulders to enjoy the pleasures of the chase!

"Or he is in a journey." Siva is represented as taking long journeys, and sometimes for very creditable purposes. "Peradventure he sleepeth." Siva often did this, especially when he took the form of a coolly; for, after he had performed his task, he fell asleep under the tree called the Konda Maram. Thus the prophet mentioned four things, in some of which their god was engaged, and consequently, could not attend to their requests. But it was manifestly improper, if he were thus occupied, for them to disturb him; yet Elijah said, "Cry aloud," let him hear you; he is no doubt a god.

When a holy person before the temple, or in any sacred place, is meditating, not one will presume to disturb him: how, then, could they interrupt their deity? When engaged in pleasure, whether of the chase or any other amusement, no one dares to interfere with the great man; and yet Baal was to be called from his pleasures. It is improper to interrupt those that are on a journey. They have an object in view, and that must first be accomplished. No one will disturb a person when he is asleep—to them it seems to be almost a sin to awake a man from his slumbers. Where is your master? "Nittari," asleep; and then you may walk off till another day. Yet, improper as it was to interfere with Baal in his engagements, the sarcastic prophet said, "Cry aloud," "And they cried aloud, and cut themselves— with knives." Here, also, the devotees may be seen cutting themselves with knives till the blood stream from their bodies, or suspended with hooks in their flesh from a pole, or with their tongue cut out, or practising other cruelties on themselves, for the expiation of their sins, or the glory of their gods.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 28. And they cried aloud, and cut themselves, after their manner, with knives and lancets, till the blood gushed out upon them.

If we look into antiquity, we shall find that nothing was more common in the religious rites of several nations, than this barbarous custom. To this purpose we may observe, that (as Plutarch de Superstitione tells us) the priests of Bellona, when they sacrificed to that goddess, besmeared the victim with their own blood. The Persian magi used to appease tempests, and allay the winds, by making incisions in their flesh. They who carried about the Syrian goddess, cut and slashed themselves with knives, till the blood gushed out. This practice remains in many places at the present time, and frequent instances of it may be met with in modern voyages and travels.—BURNE.

There has been no little supposition and conjecture, for what reason the priests of Baal "cut themselves, after their manner, with knives, and with lancets, till the blood gushed out upon them." 1 Kings xviii. 28. This seems, by the story, to have been after Elijah had mocked them, (or, at least, while he was mocking them,) and had worked up their fervour and passions to the utmost height. Mr. Harmer has touched lightly on this, but has not set it in so clear a view as it seems to be capable of, nor has he given very cogent instances. It may be taken as an instance of earnest entreaty, of conjuration, by the most powerful marks of affection: q. d. "Dost thou not see, O Baal! with what passion we adore thee!—how we give thee most decisive tokens of our affection? We shrink at no pain, we decline no disfigurement, to demonstrate our love for thee; and yet thou answerest not! By every token of our regard, answer us! By the freely dowing blood we shed for thee, answer us!" &c. They certainly demonstrated their attachment to Baal; but Baal did not testify his reciprocal attachment to them, in proof of his divinity, which was the article in debate between them and Elijah. Observe, how readily these still bleeding cuttings would identify the priests of Baal at the sub-sequent slaughter; and how they tended to justify that slaughter; being contrary to the law that ought to have governed the Hebrew nation, as we shall see presently. As the demonstration of love, by cuttings made in the flesh, still maintains itself in the East, a few instances may be at least amusing to European lovers, without fear of its becoming fashionable among us. "But the most ridiculous and senseless method of expressing their affection, is their singing certain amorous and whining songs, composed on purpose for such mad occasions; between every line whereof they cut and slash their naked arms with daggers: each endeavouring, in their emulative madness, to exceed the other by the depth and number of the wounds he gives himself. [A lively picture this, of the stazing, leaping, and self-slashing priests of Baal!] Some Turks, I have observed, when old, and past the follies which possessed their youth, show their arms, all gashed and scarred from wrist to elbow; and express a great concern, but greater wonder, at their past simplicity." The "oddness of the style invited me to render some of the above named songs into English:

Could I dear ray of heavenly light,
Who now behind a cloud dost shine,
Obtain the blessing of thy sight,
And taste thy influence all divine;

'Thus would I shed my warm heart's blood,
As now I gash my venous arm:
Wouldst thou, but like the son, think good
To draw it upward by some charm.'

Another runs thus:

'O lovely charmer, pity me!
See how my blood does from me fly!
Yet were I sure to conquer thee,
Witness it, Heaven! I'd gladly die.'" (AARON HILL'S Travels.)

This account is confirmed by De la Motraye, who gives a print of such a subject. Lest the reader should think that this love, and its tokens, are homages to the all-subduing and distracting power of beauty only, we add Pitts' account of the same procedure: "It is common for men there to fall in love with boys, as it is here in England to be in love with women; and I have seen many, when they have been drunk, give themselves deep gashes on their arms, with a knife, saying, 'It is for the love I bear to such a boy!' and I assure you, I have seen several, who have had their arms full of great cuts, as tokens of their love," &c. (Pitts' Account of Mohammedism.) This custom of cutting themselves is taken, in other places of scripture, as a mark of affection: so Jer. xlviii. 37, "Every head shall be bald, every beard clipped, and upon all hands, cuttings; and upon the loins, sackcloth:" as tokens of excessive grief for the absence of those thus regarded. So, chap. xvi. ver. 6, "Both the great and the small shall die in the land: they shall not be buried, neither shall men lament for them, nor cut themselves;" in proof of their affection, and expression of their loss; "nor make themselves bald for them," by tearing their hair, &c. as a token of grief. So, chap. xli. 5, "There came from Samaria fourscore men, having their beards shaven, and their clothes rent, and having cut themselves, with offerings to the house of the Lord." So, chap. xlvii. 5, "Baldness is come upon Gaza; Ashkelon is cut off, with the residue of her valleys; how long wilt thou cut thyself?" rather, perhaps, how deep, or to what length wilt thou cut thyself? All these places include the idea of painful absence of the party beloved. Cuttings for the dead had the same radical idea of privation. The law says, Lev. xix. 28, and Deut. xiv. 1, "Ye are the children of the Lord your God; ye shall not cut yourselves, nor make any baldness between your eyes, for the dead;" i. e. restrain such excessive tokens of grief; sorrow not as those without hope, if for a dead friend; but if for a dead idol, as Calmet always takes it, then it prohibits the idolatrous custom, of which it also manifests the antiquity. Mr. Harmer has anticipated us, in referring "the wounds in the hands" of the examined prophet, Zech. xiii. 6, to this custom;—the prophet denies that he gave himself these wounds in token of his affection to an idol; but admits that he had received them in token of affection to a person. It is usual to refer the expression of the apostle, Gal. vi. 17, "I bear in my body the marks (stigmata) of the Lord Jesus," to those imprinted on soldiers by their commanders; or to those imprinted on slaves by their masters; but would there be any degradation of the apostle if we referred them to tokens of affection towards Jesus? q. d. "Let no man take upon him to [molest, fatigue,] trouble me by questioning my pretensions to the apostleship, or to the character of a true lover of Jesus Christ, as some among you Galatians have done; for I think my losses, my sufferings, my scars, received in the fulfilment of my duty to him, are tokens sufficiently visible to every man who considers them of my regard to him, for whose sake I have borne, and still bear them: I shall therefore write no more in vindication of my character, in that respect, however it may be impugned."—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

Ver. 33. And he put the wood in order, and cut the bullock in pieces, and laid him on the wood, and said, Fill four barrels with water, and pour it on the burnt-sacrifice, and on the wood.

See on I Kings 17. 12.

Ver. 41. And Elijah said unto Ahab, Get thee up, eat and drink; for there is a sound of abundance of rain.

It is as common in the East to say there is the sound of rain, as it is in England to say there is an appearance of rain. Sometimes this refers to thunder, as the precursor; and at other times to a blowing noise in the clouds, which indicates rain is at hand. In the vicinity of a hill or tall trees, the sound is the loudest; and it is worthy of notice, that Elijah was in the neighbourhood of Mouni Carmel.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 42. So Ahab went up to eat and to drink. And Elijah went up to the top of Carmel; and he cast himself down upon the earth, and put his face between his knees.

David's posture, mentioned I Chron. xvii. 16, in all probability was not unlike that of Elijah, which, was one of most earnest supplication. I remember being present in the supreme court at Matura, when the prisoners were brought up to receive their sentences; and when a Cingalese woman, on hearing her son's condemnation to suffer death, rushed through the crowd, and presenting herself before the bench, in the very posture ascribed to Elijah, entreated, in the most heart-rending manner, that his life might be spared.—CALLAWAY.

Who, in the East, has not seen the natives thus sitting on the earth, with their faces between their knees? Those engaged in deep meditation, in a long train of reasoning, when revolving the past, or anticipating the future, when in great sorrow or fatigue, as coolies after a journey, may be seen seated on the ground with the face between the knees. "This morning, as I passed the garden of Chinnan, I saw him on the ground with his face between his knees; I wonder what plans he was forming: it must have been something very important to cause him thus to meditate." "Kandan is sick or in trouble, for he has got his face between his knees." "The man threatens to trouble you."—"He trouble me! I shall never put my face between my knees on his account." "Alas! poor woman, she must have a cruel husband, for she has always her face between her knees." Elijah went "to the top of Carmel," to meditate on the past and the future: there he was, after the display of God's majesty in the fire from heaven, in the destruction of the priests, and in the certain anticipation of rain, with "his face between his knees."—ROBERTS.

The devout posture of some people of the Levant greatly resembles that of Elijah. Just before the descent of the rain, "he cast himself down upon the earth, and put his face between his knees." Chardin relates that the dervises, especially those of the Indies, put themselves into this posture, in order to meditate, and also to repose themselves. They tie their knees against their belly with their girdle, and lay their heads on the top of them, and this, according to them, is the best posture for recollection.—HARMER.

Ver. 44. And it came to pass at the seventh time, that he said, Behold, there ariseth a little cloud out of the sea, like a man's hand. And he said, Go up, say unto Ahab, Prepare thy chariot, and get thee down, that the rain stop thee not.

That is, says Bp. Patrick, Elijah saw such abundance of rain coming as would cause floods, and render the way impassable, if Ahab did not make haste home; and accordingly, in a very short space of time that little cloud spread itself, and with a great thickness covered the face of the sky.

When Elijah's servant reported to his master, that he saw a little cloud arising out of the sea like a man's hand, he commanded him to go up and say unto Ahab, prepare thy chariot, and get thee down, that the rain stop thee not. This circumstance was justly considered as the sure indication of an approaching shower, for it came to pass, in the mean while, that the heaven was black with clouds and wind, and there was a great rain. Mr. Bruce has an observation, which greatly corroborates this relation. He says, "there are three remarkable appearances attending the inundation of the Nile: every morning, in Abyssinia, is clear, and the sun shines; about nine, a small cloud, not above four feet broad, appears in the east, whirling violently round as if upon an axis; but arrived near the zenith, it first abates its motion, then loses its form, and extends itself greatly, and seems to call up vapours from all opposite quarters. These clouds having attained nearly the same height, rush against each other with great violence, and put me always in mind of Elijah's foretelling rain on mount Carmel. The air, impelled before the heaviest mass, or swiftest mover, makes an impression of its own form in the collection of clouds opposite, and the moment it has taken possession of the space made to receive it, the most violent thunder possible instantly follows, with rain; and after some hours the sky again clears."—BUNNEN

Ver. 45. And it came to pass in the mean while, that the heaven was black with clouds and wind, and there was a great rain. And Ahab rode out, and went to Jezreel.

See on 2 Kings 3. 16, 17.

Ver. 46. And the hand of the LORD was on Elijah: and he girded up his loins, and ran before Ahab to the entrance of Jezreel.

See the man who has to run a race, or take a journey; he girds up his loins with a long robe or shawl. Elijah, therefore, thus prepared himself to run before the chariot of the king. Great persons have always men running before them, with an ensign of office in their hands. Elijah probably did this in consequence of the wonderful event that had taken place: fire having come from heaven, Baal's priests having been destroyed, the rain having descended, and the proud king his enemy having been reconciled, he ran before, as the priest of the Lord, to show from whom the blessings had come.—ROBERTS.

Hanway tells us, that Nadir Shah, when he removed his camp, was preceded by his running footmen, and these by his chanters, who were nine hundred in number, and frequently chanted moral sentences, and encomiums on the Shah, occasionally proclaiming his victories also.

The like practice obtained among the inhabitants of Mount Libanus, in the time of Pope Clement VIII. for Dandini, the pope's nuncio to the Maronites, says, "We were always accompanied with the better sort of people, who walked on foot before our mules, and out of the respect they bore to the pope, and in honour to us, they would sing certain songs, and spiritual airs, which they usually sung as they marched before the patriarch, and other persons of quality." It was not confined, according to this account, to mean persons; but persons of figure went before him in procession with songs.

We are willing to suppose, that Elijah's running before Ahab's chariot to the gates of Jezreel, was not unworthy his prophetic character; but as the idea of the mob's running before a royal coach will present itself to some minds, when they read this passage, so commentators are not very happy in explaining this piece of the history of Elijah. Bishop Patrick supposes he ran before Ahab like one of his footmen, in which he showed his readiness to do the king all imaginable honour, and that he was far from being his enemy: would it however have become Becket, the Archbishop of Canterbury, to have run before the horse of Henry II. to show he was not his enemy? or even Friar Peiko before Henry VIII. to do him all imaginable honour? But if Ahab had chanters running before him, like Nadir Shah, it does not appear at all contrary to the rules of decorum, for one brought up to celebrate the divine praises, to put himself at the head of them, to direct them, in singing praise to him that was then giving them rain, and to intermingle due encomiums on the prince that had permitted the extermination of the priests of Baal; or if he had none such, yet if it had been practised in those times, and was thought graceful and becoming a prince, nothing forbade Elijah's doing it alone: and perhaps what is said concerning the singers of the contemporary king of Judah, 2 Chron. xx. 21, 22, may enable us to guess, whether or not it was a practice totally unknown at that time. The expression of the divine historian, that the hand of the Lord was upon him, perfectly agrees to this thought, for it appears, from 2 Kings iii. 15, that it signifies enabling a prophet to prophesy, and consequently we are rather to understand these words, of God's stirring him up to the composing, and singing of some proper hymns on this occasion, than the mere enabling him to run with greater swiftness than his age would otherwise have permitted him to do, in which sense alone, I think, commentators have understood that clause.—HARMER.

CHAPTER XIX.

Ver. 4. But he himself went a day's journey into the wilderness, and came and sat down under a juniper-tree: and he requested for himself that he might die; and said, It is enough; now, O LORD, take away my life; for I am not better than my fathers.

The juniper is mentioned more than once in our translation of the scriptures; but the opinions of learned men are much divided, concerning the shrub or tree to which the inspired writers allude. The gadha or gadhat, a species of tree very like the tamarisk, which grows in the sandy deserts, resembles, in more than one instance, the juniper in our translation. It flourishes in the burning wild; its wood is extremely proper to burn into charcoal, which has the property of long retaining fire; on which account, it is carried into the cities and sold for fuel. The camel is very fond of its leaves, although they frequently affect him with pains in his bowels; and under its shade, the wolf so commonly lurks, that it has become a proverb among the Arabs, "The wolf is near the gadha." But from these circumstances it cannot be determined with certainty, whether the gadha of the roving Arab be the same with the juniper. The Hebrew word for the plant to which we give the name of juniper, is rothem, from the verb ratham, to bind or tie, on account of the toughness or tenacity of its twigs. In Parkhurst, it is the genista, or Spanish broom, which eminently possesses the character of tenacity. So great is their flexibility, that the Italians still weave them into baskets. The genista, it must be granted, affords but a poor shelter to the weary traveller from the intense heat of an oriental sky; while the prophet Elijah, exhausted with a long and precipitate flight, found a refreshing shade under the spreading branches of the rothem. But the remark applies with equal, if not greater force, to the juniper, which in this country never rises above the stature of an humble shrub. The words of the inspired writer are by no means inconsistent with this circumstance: "But Elijah went a day's journey into the wilderness, and came and sat down under a juniper-tree.—And as he lay and slept under the juniper-tree, behold, then an angel touched him and said unto him, Arise and eat." The passage seems to import that the prophet, unable to proceed, embraced the shelter of a genista, which, according to Bellonius, grows in the desert, for want of a better; as the prophet Jonah was glad to screen himself from the oppressive heat of the sun under the frail covert of a gourd. But in reality, the genista, in the oriental regions, interposed with considerable effect between the parched wanderer and the scorching sunbeam.

The roots of the rothem, or juniper, as we translate the term, were used in the days of Job for food, by the poorest of the people: "For want and famine they were solitary: fleeing into the wilderness, in former time desolate and waste. Who cut up mallows by the bushes, and juniper-roots, (ve shoresh rethamim,) for their meat." But this circumstance determines nothing; for neither the roots of juniper, nor of genista, nor of any other tree in those deserts, can afford a salutary nourishment to the human body: nor can any modern instance be found, of the roots of juniper or genista being used for food. Job only says that it was done in times of extreme want, when the famished poor were frequently compelled to prolong their miserable existence by the use of the most improper substances. It is certain that the shoots, the leaves, the bark, and the roots of other shrubs and trees, have been eaten among many nations, in times of scarcity and famine. Thus, for instance, Herodotus informs us, that when the routed army of Xerxes was fleeing from Greece, such of them as could not meet with better provision, were compelled by hunger to eat the bark and leaves, which they stripped off all kinds of trees. The hungry Laplander devours the tops and bark of the pine; and even in Sweden, the poor in many places are obliged to grind the bark of birch-trees to mix with their corn, to make bread in unfavourable seasons. The royal Psalmist taints the coals of the rethamim as affording the fiercest fire of any combustible matter that he found in the desert, and therefore the fittest punishment for a deceitful tongue; "What shall be given unto thee, or what shall be done to thee, thou false tongue? Sharp arrows of the mighty, with coals of juniper;" the wrath of God, like a keen and barbed arrow from the bow of the mighty, shall pierce the strongest armour, and strike deep into the hardest heart, and like the fierce and protracted flame of the juniper, shall torment the liar with unutterable anguish. Now, if it be the property of juniper long to retain the fire, or to emit a vehement flame, it is not less the characteristic of genista: for according to Geigerus, as quoted by Parkhurst, the Spanish genista, or rethama, lignis aliis vehementius scintillet, ardeat, ac stridat, sparkles, burns, and crackles more vehemently than any other wood. The people of Israel in their journeys through the wilderness, came to a place called Rithma, probably from the great quantity of rethamim growing there. In traversing the same inhospitable wilds, Thevenot and his fellow-travellers were compelled to gather broom for warming themselves and boiling their coffee. This greatly corroborates the opinion of Parkhurst, that the rothem of the Old Testament is not properly the juniper, but Spanish broom; but although his opinion is extremely probable, our imperfect acquaintance with the natural history of those remote countries, renders it impossible to reach a satisfactory conclusion.

The shade of rothem, (whether it be translated the juniper, or the genista) is supposed by some writers of great eminence to be noxious. This circumstance is mentioned only for the purpose of vindicating the prophet Elijah, from the imputation of wishing to put an end to his existence, when he fled for his life into the wilderness. He went on that occasion a day's journey into the wilderness of Beer-sheba; and sitting down under a juniper-tree, fatigued with his journey, and oppressed with grief, he fell asleep, after having requested God that he might die.

Grotius imagines, that the prophet rested under the shade of the juniper, because he was now become careless of his health; and he cites a passage from Virgil, as a proof that the shadow of this tree is noxious.

"Soleo esse gravis cantantibus umbra; Juniperi gravis umbra; nocent et frugibus umbræ" Ecl. x. l. 75.

But his conclusion will not follow; because Virgil evidently means, that the shades of evening are hurtful; not the shade of the juniper, except by night, when the shade of every tree is thought by natural historians to be injurious to health. If the shade of the juniper were noxious, it would be noxious to every one, and not merely to singers.

And how could it be hurtful to the fruits? They do not grow under it, and are there not exposed to its deleterious influence. It is easy to see how the shades of evening are hurtful to the fruits; but how the shade of the juniper should be noxious to them, is quite inconceivable. The poet, indeed, expressly mentions the danger of reposing under the shade of that tree; but the true reason seems to be this: the juniper being an evergreen, and its leaves growing very close, extends in the evening a more damp and chilly shade, than perhaps any other tree in that part of Italy. So little afraid were the Orientals of its noxious qualities, that some of their most magnificent cities were imbosomed in a grove of juniper-trees. This is an incontestible proof that they did not find their effluvia deadly, nor even injurious to health.

Another commentator of considerable celebrity, supposes, on the contrary, that Elijah reposed himself under the juniper-tree, for the more effectual preservation of his health; the shade of it being, according to him, a protection from serpents; and alleges, that it was the custom of the people in that part of the world, to guard themselves by such precautions against the bite of these venomous reptiles. But this opinion seems to be no less visionary than the allegation of Grotius. Travellers often recline beneath the shade of a spreading tree; but in all their narratives, the reason assigned by Peter Martyr is never once mentioned. According to Dioscorides, the glowing embers of juniper wood, not the shade of the living tree, possessed the power of driving away those unwelcome visitants. The most obvious reason is in this, as in most instances, the best: Elijah flying into the wilderness from the rage of Jezebel, became oppressed with the burning heat of the day, and the length of the road, and cast himself down under the shade of the first shrub that he found. Or, if it was in his power to make a choice, he preferred the juniper for the thickness of its covert, without any apprehension of its possessing either a deleterious quality, or the power of defending him from the bite of the serpent; he chose it merely for its shade, where, under the watchful and efficacious protection of Jehovah, his own God, and the God of his people, he sunk into quiet repose. To suppose that he repaired to the shade of the juniper with the view of ruining his health, and shortening his days, is quite inconsistent with every trait in the character, and every action in the life of that holy man. So far from harbouring the horrible idea of suicide, although certainly tired of life, he prayed to his God to remove him from the disgusting scene of idolatry and oppression, into his immediate presence; a sure proof he neither expected nor desired that favour from the noxious exhalations of the juniper. To this may be added, that the question is not yet decided, whether it was a juniper, or what particular species of tree it really was, under whose friendly covert the weary and afflicted prophet sought repose.—PAXTON.

Ver. 18. Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him.

Things which have been sent to the temples to be presented to idols, are, when returned, kissed by the people. Should a priest give arca-nuts, beetel leaves, or cakes, which have been presented to the gods, the person receiving them kisses them. When a devotee has touched the feet of a priest, he kisses his hands.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 19. So he departed thence, and found Elisha the son of Shaphat, who was ploughing with twelve yoke of oxen before him, and he with the twelfth: and Elijah passed by him, and cast his mantle upon him.

The natives use the ox for the plough and all other agricultural purposes. It is no disgrace for a great man to follow the plough; and, generally speaking, the master is the first to commence the operations of the season. The first day is always settled by a soothsayer, or a book of fate. "Elijah passed by him, and cast his mantle upon him." By this act Elisha was invested with the sacred office; but it is probable there would be other ceremonies, and a more pointed a dress, and extended conversation than that recorded in the verse. When a Bramin is invested with the sacred office, both in the first, second, and third initiations, he is always covered with a yellow mantle, and in such a way as to prevent him from seeing any object. The sacred string also is put over his right shoulder, (and worn like a soldier's belt,) which indicates his office. Elisha said, "Let me, I pray thee, kiss my father and my mother, and then I will follow thee." And Elijah "said unto him, Go back again; for what have I done to thee?" The answer of Elijah is certainly not very easy to be understood. The Hebrew has, instead of "go back again," "go, return;" this makes good sense, especially when the conjunction is added, "go, and return." The Tamul version has it also in that way. The same translation has, instead of "for what have I done to thee?" "what I have done to thee think;" literally, "I to thee what have done, think." I have called thee according to the Divine command; now thou askest to take leave of thy father and mother: take care thou art not led aside from thy calling; "go, and return." THINK ON WHAT I HAVE DONE TO THEE.—ROBERTS.

Among the Persians, the principal khalifas or teachers consider the sacred mantle as the symbol of their spiritual power. Though the khirka or mantle was in general only transferred to a beloved pupil, at the death of his master, some superior saints were deemed possessed of a power, even while living, to invest others with the sacred and mysterious garment. "When the khalifa or teacher of the sooties dies, he bequeaths his patched garment, which is all his worldly wealth, to the disciple whom he esteems the most worthy to become his successor, and the moment the latter puts on the holy mantle, he is vested with the power of his predecessor." (Malcolm).—BURDER.

Ver. 26. Therefore their inhabitants were of small power, they were dismayed and confounded; they were as the grass of the field, and as the green herb, as the grass on the house-tops and as corn blasted before it be grown up.

"The sam wind, as described to me by an old inhabitant of the Dashtistan, commits great ravages in this district, particularly at Dashtiarjan, hurtful to vegetation. It blows at night, from about midnight to sunrise, comes in a hot blast, and is afterward succeeded by a cold one. About six years ago there was a sam during the summer months, which so totally burnt up all the corn, then near its maturity, that no animal would eat a blade of it, or touch any of its grain. The image of corn blasted before it be grown up, was most probably taken from the circumstance now mentioned." (Morier.) Sir R. K. Porter however says, that the samiel, though hostile to human life, is so far from being prejudicial to the vegetable creation, that a continuance of it tends to ripen the fruits. These accounts may be reconciled by observing, that the former relates to the corn, and the latter to fruit, and that it may refer to its gradual approach rather than its sudden attack. If any unfortunate traveller, too far from shelter, meets the blast, he falls immediately, and in a few minutes his flesh becomes almost black, while both it and his bones at once arrive at so extreme a state of corruption, that the smallest movement of the body would separate the one from the other.—BURDER.

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 7. And Isaiah said, Take a lump of figs: and they took and laid it on the bile, and he recovered.

Whatever the disorder was with which Hezekiah was afflicted, the remedy prescribed was a softening plaster, designed to ripen the bile, and to prepare it for receiving such assistance as to discharge it with ease and certainty. We have an instance of a similar proceeding, and with the same design, in regard to the plague, related by Pitts of himself. "The plague reigned among us;—soon after we got ashore at Algiers, I was seized with it, but, through the divine goodness, escaped death. It rose under my arm, and the bile which usually accompanies the plague, rose on my leg. After it was much swollen, I was desirous to have it lanced, but my patrolon told me it was not soft enough. There was a neighbour, a Spaniard slave, who advised me to roast an onion, and apply a piece of it dipped in oil to the swelling, to mollify it; which accordingly I did. The next day it became soft, and then my patrolon had it lanced, and, through the blessing of my good God, I recovered."—BURDER.

Ver. 10. And Ben-hadad sent unto him, and said, The gods do so unto me, and more also, if the dust of Samaria shall suffice for handfuls for all the people that follow me.

It is an interesting fact, that this figure of speech, in reference to the dust not being sufficient to fill the hands of the numerous hosts of Benhadad, is in common use at this day. In the story called Asuramea-thaiya-kathi, it was said by the inhabitants of certain countries, who were expecting an invasion from a king who had already conquered the "eight quarters,"—"We had better at once give up our possessions: why attempt to resist such hosts? the dust of the country will not be sufficient to furnish a handful for each of the soldiers. Ovuru-pud-de-mau-kavumo? i. e. for every one will there be a handful of dust?" The people of the village of Sandarippi ask, "Why do the inhabitants of Batticotta hate and despise us? If we all go against them, will their country afford a handful of earth for each of us?" The people of the two large villages of Batticotta and Sandarippi often meet to play at rude games, when the latter are generally the conquerors, which has led to great animosity. Hence the proverb, "Take up the stalk of a cocoa-nut leaf, and the Batticottians run;" and hence the saying respecting the handfuls of earth. Benhadad said, "The gods do so unto me, and more also." This form of imprecation or prayer is very common. "If I do not ruin that fellow, then the gods do so to me." "If I kill not that wretch, then may the gods kill me." If, therefore, the dust of Samaria be sufficient to fill the hands of each of my soldiers, then may my dominions be subject to the same fate.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 12. And it came to pass, when Ben-hadad heard this message, as he was drinking, he and the kings in the pavilions, that he said unto his servants, Set yourselves in array: and they set themselves in array against the city.

The word shapheer, which we translate pavilion, may, it is very likely, excite the notion of something superior to a common tent; so our translators use that term to express the superb tent of a king of Babylon, Jer. xliii. 10, "He (Nebuchadnezzar) shall spread his royal pavilion over them." A mere English reader will be surprised, perhaps, when he is told that the word succoth, translated pavilions, 1 Kings xx. 12, 16, signifies nothing more than booths; and more still, if he is told that the sacred historian might, possibly, precisely design to be so understood, when describing the places in which kings were drinking. That the word signifies those slight temporary defences from the heat which are formed by the setting up the boughs of trees, is visible by what is said Jonah iv. 5, and Neh. viii. 16; and we know that the common people of the East frequently sit under them; but it may be thought incredible that princes should make use of such, as the term, precisely taken, seems to imply. "And it came to pass, when Benhadad heard this message, as he was drinking, he and the kings in the pavilions," 1 Kings xx. 12. "But Benhadad was drinking himself drunk in the pavilions, he and the kings, the thirty and two kings that helped him," v. 16. In the margin our translators have put the word tents; but that there is nothing incredible in the account, if we should understand the prophetic historian as meaning booths, properly speaking, will appear, if we consider the great simplicity of ancient times, and the great delight the people of the East take in verdure, and in eating and drinking under the shade of trees; especially after reading the following paragraph of Dr. Chandler's Travels in the Lesser Asia: "While we were employed on the theatre of Miletus, the Aga of Suki, son-in-law, by marriage, to Elez Oglu, crossed the plain towards us, attended by a considerable train of domestics and officers, their vests and their turbans of various and lively colours, mounted on long-tailed horses, with showy trappings and furniture. He returned after hawking to Miletus; and we went to visit him, with a present of coffee and sugar; but we were told that two favourite birds had flown away, and that he was vexed and tired. A couch was prepared for him beneath a shed, made against a cottage, and covered with green boughs, to keep off the sun. He entered as we were standing by, and fell down on it to sleep, without taking any notice of us." A very mean place, a European would think, to be prepared for the reception of an aga that made so respectable a figure, and in a town which, though ruined, still had several cottages, inhabited by Turkish families. It does not appear incredible then, that Benhadad, and the thirty-two petty kings that attended him, might actually be drinking wine beneath such green sheds, as a Turkish aga, of considerable distinction, chose to sleep under, rather than in an adjoining cottage, or rather than under a tent, which he otherwise might have carried with him, to repose under when he chose to rest himself. Oriental manners are very different from those in the West.—HARMER.

Ver. 27. And the children of Israel were numbered, and were all present, and went against them: and the children of Israel pitched before them like two little flocks of kids; but the Syrians filled the country.

A flock of goats is fewer in number than a flock of sheep, because the former are given to wander and separate, while the latter, more gregarious in their temper, collect into one place. This is the reason, says Bochart, that the sacred writer compares the small army of the Israelites to a flock of goats rather than to a flock of sheep. While seven is always used by the Hebrews to denote a sufficient or complete number, two is constantly employed to signify a few, or very few. Thus the widow woman said to the prophet, "As the Lord thy God liveth, I have not a cake, but a handful of meal in a barrel, and a little oil in a cruise: and behold, I am gathering two sticks, that I may go in and dress it for me and my son, that we may eat it and die." The phrase is used in the same sense by the prophet concerning the reduced state of his people: "Yet gleanings grapes shall be left in it; as the shaking of an olive-tree, two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough." Another prophet uses it in relation to the return of a small number of the captives to their own land: "I will take you; one of a city and two of a family, and I will bring you to Zion." And Hosea encourages his people to repentance with the promise, "After two days will he revive us: in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight," or, within a very short time he will deliver them from their enemies. The sacred historian accordingly compares the armies of Israel opposed to the Syrians to "two little flocks of kids;" two, because they were few in number; little flocks, as goats from their roaming disposition always are; flocks of kids, feeble and timid, without resources and without hope. A more complete and glowing picture of national weakness, even the pen of inspiration never drew.—PAXTON.

Ver. 28. And there came a man of God, and spake unto the king of Israel, and said, Thus saith the LORD, Because the Syrians have said, The LORD is God of the hills, but he is not God of the valleys; therefore will I deliver all this great multitude into thy hand, and ye shall know that I am the LORD.

That there were many gods who had each their particular charge and jurisdiction, that some presided over whole countries, while others had but particular places under their tuition and government, and were some of them gods of the woods, others of the rivers, and others of the mountains, was plainly the doctrine of all heathen nations. Pan was reckoned the god of the mountains, for which reason he was styled ὄρειβας, mountain traverser; and in like manner, the Syrians might have a conceit that the god of Israel was a god of the mountains, because Canaan, they saw, was a mountainous land; the Israelites delighted to sacrifice on high places; their law, they might have heard, was given on the top of a mountain; their temple stood upon a famous eminence, as did Samaria, where they had so lately received a signal defeat; for their further notion was, that the gods of the mountains had a power to inject a panic fear into any army, whenever they pleased. Nay, that they did not offily assist with their influence, but actually engaged themselves in battle in behalf of their favourites, is a sentiment as old as Homer.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 30. But the rest fled to Aphek, into the city; and there a wall fell upon twenty and seven thousand of the men that were left. And Ben-hadad fled, and came into the city, into an inner chamber.

See on ch. 22. 25.

In regard to this passage, we are not to suppose that this wall, or castle, or fort, (as it may be rendered,) fell upon every individual one, much less that it had killed every man it fell on: it is sufficient to justify the expression, that it fell upon the main body of these seven and twenty thousand, and that it killed some and maimed others, (for the scripture does not say that it killed all,) as is usual in such cases. Let us suppose then, that these Syrians, after their defeat on the plains of Aphek, betook themselves to this fenced city, and despairing of any quarter, mounted the walls, or retired into some castle, with a resolution to defend themselves to the last; and that the Israelitish army coming upon them, plied the walls or the castle on every side so warmly with their batteries, that down they came at once, and killing some, wounding others, and making the rest disperse for fear, did all the execution that the text intends.

Thus we may account for this event in a natural way; but it is more reasonable to think that God, upon this occasion, wrought a miracle; and either by some sudden earthquake or violent storm of wind, overturned these walls, or this fortress, upon the Syrians. And indeed, if any time was proper for his almighty arm to interpose, it was at such a time as this, when these blasphemous people had denied his sovereign power and authority in the government of the world, and thereby in some measure obliged him, in vindication of his own honour, to give them a full demonstration of it, and to show that he was the God of the plains as well as of the mountains; that he could as effectually destroy them in strongholds as in the open field, and make the very walls, wherein they trusted for defence, the instruments of their ruin.

This Aphek, or Apacha, (as it is called by profane authors,) was situated in Libanus, upon the river Adonis, between Heliopolis and Biblos, and in all probability is the same that Paul Lucas, in his voyage to the Levant, speaks of, as swallowed up in a lake of Mount Libanus, about nine miles in circumference, wherein there are several houses, all entire, to be seen under water. The soil about this place (as the ancients tell us) was very bituminous, which seems to confirm their opinion, who think that subterraneous fires consumed the solid substance of the earth, whereon the city stood, so that it was subdued and sunk at once, and a lake was soon formed in its place.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 31. And his servants said unto him, Behold now, we have heard that the kings of the house of Israel are merciful kings: let us, I pray thee, put sackcloth on our loins, and ropes upon our heads, and go out to the king of Israel; peradventure he will save thy life.

The vanquished foe, in testimony of his submission, hung his sword from his neck, when he came into the presence of his conqueror. When Bagdat was taken by the Turks, in the year 1638, the governor's lieutenant and principal officer was sent to the grand vizier, with a scarf about his neck, and his sword wreathed in it, which is accounted by them a mark of deep humiliation and perfect submission, to beg for mercy in his own and his master's name. His request being granted, the governor came and was introduced to the grand seignior, and obtained, not only a confirmation of the promise of life that had been made him, but also various presents of considerable value. These circumstances forcibly recall to our minds the message of Benhadad, after his signal defeat, to the king of Israel; the passage runs in these terms: "And his servants said unto him, Behold now, we have heard that the kings of the house of Israel are merciful kings; let us, I pray thee, put sackcloth on our loins, and ropes upon our heads, and go out to the king of Israel; peradventure he will save thy life. So they girded sackcloth on their loins, and put ropes on their heads, and came to the king of Israel, and said, Thy servant Benhadad saith, I pray thee, let me live. And he said, Is he yet alive? he is my brother." The servants of Benhadad succeeded in obtaining a verbal assurance that his life should be spared; but a surer pledge of protection was to deliver a banner into the hand of the suppliant. In the year 1099, when Jerusalem was taken by the crusaders, about three hundred Saracens got upon the roof of a very lofty building, and earnestly begged for quarter, but could not be induced by any promise of safety to come down, till they had received the banner of Tancred, one of the chiefs of the crusaders, as a pledge of life. This they reckoned a more powerful protection than the most solemn promise; although in this instance their confidence was entirely misplaced; for the faithless zealots who pretended to fight for the cross, put every man of them to the sword.—PAXTON.

Ver. 34. And Ben-hadad said unto him, The cities which my father took from thy father I will restore; and thou shalt make streets for thee in Damascus, as my father made in Samaria. Then said Ahab, I will send thee away with this covenant. So he made a covenant with him, and sent him away.

When the king of Syria had obtained security for his life, and assurance of being restored in peace to his throne, he promised in return for such great and unexpected favours, to restore the cities which his father had taken from Israel, and to permit Ahab to make streets in Damascus for himself, as his father had made in Samaria. This extraordinary privilege of making streets in Damascus, has exceedingly puzzled commentators. Some of them suppose the word houtsoth signifies market-places, where commodities were sold, the duties on which should belong to Ahab; others imagine he meant courts of justice, where the king of Israel should have the prerogative of sitting in judgment, and exercising a jurisdiction over the Syrians; others think they were a sort of piazzas, of which he should receive the rents; one class of interpreters understand by the word, fortifications or citadels; another class attempt to prove, that palaces are meant, which Ahab should be permitted to build as a proof of his superiority. The privileges which we know, from the faithful page of history, were actually granted to the Venetians for their aid, by the states of the kingdom of Jerusalem, during the captivity of Baldwin II., may perhaps explain, in a more satisfactory manner, these words of Benhadad. The instrument by which these privileges were secured, is preserved in the history of William, bishop of Tyre, the historian of the crusades, from which it appears, they were accustomed to assign churches, and to give streets in their towns and cities, with very ample prerogatives in these streets, to the foreign nations who lent them the most effectual assistance. The Venetians had a street in Acre, with full jurisdiction in it; and in what this consisted, we learn from the deed of settlement just mentioned; they had a right to have in their streets an oven, a mill, a bath, weights, and measures for wine, oil, and honey; they had also a right to judge causes among themselves, together with as great a jurisdiction over all those who dwelt in their street, of what nation soever they might be, as the kings of Jerusalem had over others. The same historian informs us, that the Genoese also had a street in that city, with full jurisdiction in it, and a church, as a reward for their services, together with a third part of the dues of the port. In the treaty of peace granted by Bajazet, emperor of the Turks, to Emanuel, the Greek emperor, it was stipulated that the latter should grant free liberty to the Turks to dwell together in one street of Constantinople, with the free exercise of their own religion and laws, under a judge of their own nation. This humiliating condition the Greek emperor was obliged to accept; and a great number of Turks, with their families, were sent out of Bithynia to dwell in Constantinople, where a mosque was built for their accommodation. It is not improbable, that the same kind of privileges that were granted to the Venetians, the Genoese, and the Turks, had been granted to the father of Benhadad, by the king of Israel, and were now offered to Ahab in Damascus, in the distressed state of his affairs. The Syrian monarch promised to give his conqueror a number of streets in his capital city, for the use of his subjects, with peculiar rights and privileges, which enabled him to exercise the same jurisdiction there as in his own dominions.—PAXTON.

Mr. Harmer has remarked, that "the proposal of Benhadad, as to the making and possession of streets in Damascus, was better relished by Ahab, than understood by commentators;" some of whom have guessed that this expression meant the erection of markets, or of courts of judicature, or of piazzas, or of citadels and fortifications, &c. Mr. Harmer then proceeds to narrate the privileges granted to the Venetians, in recompense for their aid, by the states of the kingdom of Jerusalem; and he observes, that it was customary to assign churches; and to give streets, in their towns, to foreign nations, &c. His instances, however, are rather instances of rewards for services performed, than proofs of such terms as conditions of peace: probably, therefore, it will not be disagreeable to the reader to see a passage still more applicable to the history of Benhadad, than any of those are which Mr. Harmer has produced; it occurs in Knolles's "History of the Turks," p. 206. "Baiazet having worthily relieved his besieged citie, returned againe to the siege of Constantinople, laying more hardly vnto it than before, building forts and bulwarks against it on the one side towards the land; and passing ouer the strait of Bosphorus, built a strong castle vpon that strait ouer against Constantinople, to impeach so much as was possible, all passage therunto by sea. This straight siege (as most write) continued also two yerres, which I suppose by the circumstance of the historie, to haue been part of the aforesaid eight yerres. Emanuel, the besieged Emperor, wearied with these long wars, sent an ambassador to Baiazet, to intreat with him a peace; which Baiazet was the more willing to hearken vnto, for that he heard newes, that Tamerlane, the great Tartarian Prince, intended shortly to warre upon him. Yet could this peace not be obtained, but vpon condition that the Emperor should grant free libertie for the Turks to dwell together in one street of Constantinople, with free exercise of their own religion and lawes, vnder a iudge of their own nation; and further, to pay vnto the Turkish king a yeerely tribute of ten thousand ducats. Which dishonourable conditions the distressed Emperor was glad to accept of. So was this long siege broken vp, and presently a great sort of Turks with their families were sent out of Bithynia, to dwell in Constantinople, and a church there built for them: which not long after was by the Emperor pulled downe to the ground, and the Turks againe driuen out of the citie, at such time as Baiazet was by the mighty Tamerlane ouerthrowne and taken prisoner." The circumstances of these two stories are so much alike, that it merely now remains to notice the propriety with which our translators have chosen the word streets, rather than any other proposed by commentators.—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver. 2. And Ahab spake unto Naboth, saying, Give me thy vineyard, that I may have it for a garden of herbs, because it is near unto my house: and I will give thee for it a better vineyard than it; or, if it seem good to thee, I will give thee the worth of it in money.

Our first parents had for their residence a beautiful garden, which may have had some influence upon their immediate descendants, in giving them a predilection for such situations. People in England will scarcely be able to appreciate the value which the Orientals place on a garden. The food of many of them consists of vegetables, roots, and fruits; their medicines, also, being indigenous, are most of them produced in their gardens. Hence they have their fine fruit trees, and the constant shade; and here they have their wells and places for bathing. See the proprietor, in his undress walking around his little domain; his fence er wall is so high no one can overlook him: he strolls about to smoke his shag, to pick up the fruit, and cull the flowers; he cares not for the world; his soul is satisfied with the scenes around him. Ahab wished to have Naboth's garden; but how could he part with "the inheritance" of his "fathers?" There was scarcely a tree which had not some pleasing associations connected with it: one was planted by the hand of a beloved ancestor, another in memory of some great event; the water he drank, and the fruit he ate, were from the same sources as those which refreshed his fathers. How then could he, in disobedience to God's command, and in violation of all those tender feelings, give up his garden to Ahab? To part with such a place is, to the people of the East, like parting with life itself.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 4. And he laid him down upon his bed, and turned away his face, and would eat no bread.

Thus acted the puissant monarch, because he could not get Naboth's garden. See the creature in the shape of a man pouting his lip, and throwing himself on his bed, and refusing to eat food, because he could not gain his wishes. The domestics brought refreshment, but their lord would not take it; and, therefore, they went to queen Jezebel, to communicate the sorrowful intelligence; and she immediately went to his majesty and inquired, "Why is thy spirit so sad, that thou eatest not bread?" and he told his mournful story. How often do we see full-grown men acting in a similar way, when disappointed in their wishes: go near them, and they avert their faces; offer them food, they will not eat; and, generally speaking, their friends are so weak as, at any expense, to gratify their wishes.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 7. And Jezebel's wife said unto him, Dost thou now govern the kingdom of Israel? arise, and eat bread, and let thy heart be merry: I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite.

I do not find any statute that prohibited an Israelite from exchanging his inheritance; nor was there, indeed, in such exchange, unless when it transferred a person to a different tribe, any thing contrary to the intention of the law, which was to prevent his latest posterity from ever being altogether denuded of their land. Perhaps, therefore, it was a piece of mere crossness in Naboth to refuse, in such uncourteous terms, not only to sell, but even to exchange his vineyard with King Ahab, I Kings xxi. 7. At the same time, it is impossible to vindicate the despotic measure, to which the barbarous wife of this too obsequious monarch had recourse in order to obtain it; for certainly Naboth was not obliged to exchange his vineyard, unless he chose.—MICHAELIS.

Ver. 8. So she wrote letters in Ahab's name, and sealed them with his seal, and sent the letters unto the elders and to the nobles that were in his city dwelling with Naboth.

At this day, in the East, not a female in ten thousand is acquainted with the art of writing; and I think it probable that Ahab's affectionate queen did not write the letters with her own hand, but that she caused it to be done by others. It is not unlikely that the state of female education, in modern times, is precisely the same as that of antiquity; for I do not recollect any female in the scriptures, excepting Jezebel, who is mentioned as being concerned in the writing of letters. The talented Hindoo female, Aiviya, has left wonderful memorials of her cultivated mind; and I doubt not, when female education shall become general in the East, from them will be furnished many an Aiviya, to bless and adorn the future age.—ROBERTS.

The very ancient custom of sealing despatches with a seal or signet, set in a ring, is still retained in the East. Pococke says, "in Egypt they make the impression of their name with their seal, generally of cornelian, which they wear on their finger, and which is blacked when they have occasion to seal with it." Hanway remarks, that "the Persian ink serves not only for writing, but for subscribing with their seal; indeed, many of the Persians in high office could not write. In their rings they wear agates, which serve for a seal, on which is frequently engraved their name, and some verse from the Koran." Shaw also has a remark exactly to the same purpose.—BUONAI.

Ver. 10. And set two men, sons of Belial, before him, to bear witness against him, saying, Thou didst blaspheme God and the king.

Princes never want instruments to execute their pleasure; and yet it is strange, that among all these judges and great men, there should be none that abhorred such a villany. It must be considered, however, that for a long while they had cast off all fear and sense of God, and prostituted their consciences to please their king: nor dare they disobey Jezebel's commands, who had the full power and government of the king, (as they well knew,) and could easily have taken away their lives, had they refused to condemn Naboth.—STACKHOUSE.

Ask any judge, any gentleman in the civil service of India, whether men may not be had in any village to swear any thing for the fraction of a shilling? Jezebel would not find it difficult to procure agents to swear away the life of Naboth the Jezreelite.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 13. And I will stretch over Jerusalem the line of Samaria, and the plummet of the house of Ahab; and I will wipe Jerusalem as a man wipeth a dish, wiping it, and turning it upside down.

The Vulgate renders this clause, Delebo Jerusalem, sicut deleri solent tabule: I will blot out Jerusalem as tablets are wont to be blotted out. It is a metaphor taken from the ancient method of writing. They traced their letters with a stile on boards, thinly spread over with wax: for this purpose one end of the stile was sharp, the other end blunt and smooth; with this they could rub out what they had written, and so smooth the place, and spread back the wax, as to render it capable of receiving any other words. Thus the Lord had written down Jerusalem, never intending that its name or memorial should be blotted out; but now the stile is turned, and the name Jerusalem is no longer to be found.—BURDER.

Ver. 15. And it came to pass, when Jezebel heard that Naboth was stoned, and was dead, that Jezebel said to Ahab, Arise, take possession of the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite, which he refused to give thee for money: for Naboth is not alive, but dead.

As Naboth, according to verse 10, was executed as a blasphemer and a traitor, his property did not go to his relations, but to the king. Even now, in the Turkish empire, and in Persia, the property of great men who are executed, falls to the public treasury, or the governors of the province seize upon it. The chans now enrich themselves with the confiscated property of criminals, and other fines, which formerly fell to the royal treasury, says Gmelin, in his Travels through Persia and Northern Persia.—BURDER.

Ver. 19. Thus saith the Lord, In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine.

There is a great dispute among the learned, as to the accomplishment of this prophecy. At the first it was no doubt intended to be literally fulfilled, but upon Ahab's repentance, (as we find below,) the punishment was transferred from him to his son Jehoram, in whom it was actually accomplished; for his dead body was cast into the portion of the field of Naboth the Jezreelite, for the dogs to devour, 2 Kings ix. 25. Since Ahab's blood therefore was licked by dogs, not at Jezreel, but at Samaria, it seems necessary that we should understand the Hebrew word, which our translation renders, in the place where, not as devoting the place, but the manner in which the thing was done; and so the sense of the passage will be, that as dogs licked, or in like manner, as dogs licked Naboth's blood, even so shall they lick thine, observe what I say, even thine.— STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 23. And of Jezebel also spake the LORD, saying, The dogs shall eat Jezebel by the wall of Jezreel.

This, to an English ear, sounds very surprising; that during the time of a single meal, so many dogs should be on the spot, ready to devour, and should so speedily despatch this business, in the very midst of a royal city, close under the royal gateway, and where a considerable train of people had so lately passed, and, no doubt, many were continually passing; this, to an English reader, appears extremely unaccountable; but we find it well accounted for by Mr. Bruce, whose information the reader will receive with due allowance for the different manners and ideas of countries; after which, this rapid devouring of Jezebel will not appear so extraordinary as it has hitherto done. "The bodies of those killed by the sword were heven to pieces, and scattered about the streets, being denied burial. I was miserable, and almost driven to despair, at seeing my hunting-dogs twice let loose by the carelessness of my servants, bringing into the courtyard the heads and arms of slaughtered men, and which I could no way prevent, but by the destruction of the dogs themselves: the quantity of carrion, and the stench of it, brought down the hyenas in hundreds from the neighbouring mountains; and as few people in Gondar go out after it is dark, they enjoyed the streets to themselves, and seemed ready to dispute the possession of the city with the inhabitants. Often, when I went home late from the palace, and it was this time the king chose chiefly for conversation, though I had but to pass the corner of the market-place BEFORE THE PALACE, had lanterns with me, and was surrounded with armed men, I heard them grunting by twos and threes, so near me as to be afraid they would take some opportunity of seizing me by the leg. A pistol would have frightened them, and made them speedily run, and I constantly carried two loaded at my girdle; but the discharging a pistol in the night would have alarmed every one that heard it in the town, and it was not now the time to add any thing to people's fears. I at last scarcely ever went out, and nothing occupied my thoughts but how to escape from this bloody country, by way of Sennaar, and how I should best exert my power and influence over Yasine, at Ras el Feel, to pave my way, by assisting me to pass the desert, into Albara. The king, missing me at the palace, and hearing I had not been at Ras Michael's, began to inquire who had been with me? Ayto Confu soon found Yasine, who informed him of the whole matter. Upon this I was sent for to the palace, where I found the king, without anybody but menial servants. He immediately remarked, that I looked very ill, which, indeed, I found to be the case, as I had scarcely ate or slept since I saw him last, or even for some days before. He asked me, in a condoling tone, what ailed me? That besides looking sick, I seemed as if something had ruffled me, and put me out of humour. I told him, that what he observed was true: that coming across the market-place, I had seen Za Mariam, the Ras's doorkeeper, with three men bound, one of whom he fell a-hacking to pieces in my presence, and upon seeing me running across the place, stopping my nose, he called me to stay till he should come and despatch the other two, for he wanted to speak with me, as if he had been engaged about ordinary business; that the soldiers, in consideration of his haste, immediately fell upon the other two, whose cries were still remaining in my ears; that the hyenas, at night, would scarcely let me pass in the streets, when I returned from the palace; and the dogs fled into my house to eat pieces of human carcases at their leisure." (Travels, vol. iv., page 81, &c.)

Without supposing that Jezreel was pestered with hyenas, like Gondar, though that is not incredible, we may now easily admit of a sufficiency of dogs, accustomed to carnage, which had pulled the body of Jezebel to pieces, and had devoured it before the palace gate, or had withdrawn with parts of it to their hiding-places. But perhaps the mention of the head, hands, and feet, being left on the spot, indicates that it had not been removed by the dogs, but was eaten where it fell (as those parts adjoined the members most likely to be removed,) so that the prophecy of Elijah was literally fulfilled: "In the portion of Jezreel, shall dogs eat Jezebel." This account illustrates also the readiness of the dogs to lick the blood of Ahab, I Kings xxii. 38, in perfect conformity to which is the expression of the prophet Jeremiah, xv. 3, "I will appoint over them . . . the sword to slay, and the dogs to tear, and the fowls of the heaven, and the beasts of the earth, [the hyenas of Mr. Bruce, perhaps,] to devour and destroy." Mr. Bruce's account also explains the mode of execution adopted by the prophet Samuel, with regard to Agag, king of the Amalekites, whom Samuel thus addresses:—"In like manner [literally, in like procedure as—i. e. in the same identical mode of execution] as thy sword has made women barren, so shall thy mother be rendered barren [childless] among women." I Sam. xv. 33. If these words do not imply that Agag had ripped up pregnant women, they at least imply that he had heved many prisoners to death! for we find that "Samuel caused Agag to be heved in pieces before the face of the Lord [probably not before the residence of Saul, but before the tabernacle, &c.] in Gilgal," directing that very same mode of punishment (hitherto, we suppose, unadopted in Israel) to be used towards him, which he had formerly used towards others. The character of the prophet Samuel has been vilified for cruelty on account of this history, with how little reason let the reader now judge; and compare a similar retributive act of justice on Adonibezek, Judges i. 7.—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

Ver. 27. And it came to pass, when Ahab heard those words, that he rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his flesh, and fasted, and lay in sackcloth, and went softly.

See the man who goes into the presence of a superior; he takes off his sandals, and walks softly—he has a timid air, and you cannot hear his foot tread on the ground. When a dutiful son goes to his father, or a devotee into the presence of a sacred personage, he walks in the same way. Has a proud, boasting man, been humbled, the people say, "Ah! ah! he can now walk mitha-vaka," i. e. softly. "What! the proud Mutto walk softly; whoever expected that?"—ROBERTS.

Going softly seems to have been one of the many expressions of mourning commonly used among the eastern nations. That it was in use among the Jews appears from the case of Ahab; and by mistake it has been confounded with walking barefoot. It seems to have been a very slow, solemn manner of walking, well adapted to the state of mourners labouring under great sorrow and dejection of mind.—BURDER.

CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 11. And Zedekiah the son of Chenannah made him horns of iron; and he said, Thus saith the LORD, With these shalt thou push the Syrians, until thou have consumed them.

The Indian soldier wears a horn of steel on the front of his helmet, directly over the forehead. In Abyssinia the headdress of the provincial governors, according to Mr. Bruce, consists of a large broad fillet bound upon their forehead, and tied behind their head. In the middle of this rises a horn, or conical piece of silver, zilt, about four inches long, much in the shape of our common candle extinguishers. This is called kirn, a slight corruption of the Hebrew word keren, a horn, and is only worn in reviews, or parades after victory. The crooked manner in which they hold the neck when this ornament is on their forehead, for fear it should fall forward, seems to agree with what the Psalmist calls speaking with a stiff neck: "Lift not your horn on high; speak not with a stiff neck:" for it perfectly shows the meaning of speaking in this attitude, when the horn is held exact like the horn of a unicorn. An allusion is made to this custom in another passage: "But my horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of a unicorn." To raise the horn was to clothe one with authority, or to do him honour; to lower it, cut it off, or take it away, to deprive one of power, or to treat him with disrespect. Such were the "horns of iron" which Zedekiah made for himself, when he presumed, in the name of Jehorah, to flatter his prince with the promise of victory over his enemies: "Thus saith the Lord, with these" military insignia "shalt thou push the Syrians until thou hast consumed them." They were military ornaments, the symbols of strength, and courage, and power.—PAXTON.

Ver. 16. And the king said unto him, How many times shall I adjure thee that thou tell me nothing but that which is true in the name of the LORD?

In England, this solemn appeal is never made but in cases of extremity; but in the East, the most trititious circumstance will induce a person to say, Umi-ani-uddukrain, "By thy oath;" or, "I impose it upon thee."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 25. And Micaiah said, Behold, thou shalt see in that day, when thou shalt go into an inner chamber to hide thyself.

"In one of the halls of the seraglio at Constantinople," says De la Motraye, "the eunuch made us pass by several little chambers, with doors shut, like the cells of monks or nuns, as far as I could judge by one that another eunuch opened, which was the only one I saw; and by the outside of others. Asa Firally Bashaw, being summoned by his friends, came out of a little house near the towers, where he had been long hidden in his harem, which, had it been suspected by the mufti, he had not denied his fetfa to the emperor, for seizing his person, even there. The harems are sanctuaries, as sacred and inviolable for persons pursued by justice for any crime, debt, &c. as the Roman Catholic churches in Italy, Spain, Portugal, &c. Though the grand seignior's power over his creatures is such, that he may send some of his eunuchs even there to apprehend those who resist his will. The harems of the Greeks are almost as sacred as those of the Turks; so that the officers of justice dare not enter without being sure that a man is there, contrary to the law: and if they should go in and not find what they look for, the women may punish, and even kill them, without being molested for any infringement of the law: on the contrary, the relations would have a right to make reprisals, and demand satisfaction for such violence."

Those who have not seen the cells of monks, or nuns, in foreign countries, may conceive of a long gallery, or other spacious apartment, as a large hall, &c. into which the doors of the cells open: these cells consist of one room to each person, but frequently of two rooms, one of which is used for sleeping in; the other for less retired purposes, conversation, &c. Agreeably to this, it appears, that in the East also, we must first pass through a long hall, or gallery, before we can enter the peculiar abode of any particular woman of the harem. We may first apply this mode of dwelling to a circumstance threatened by the prophet Micaiah, to his opponent Zedekiah, 1 Kings xxii. 25, "Thou shalt go into an inner chamber to hide thyself." Our translators have put in the margin, "from chamber to chamber." The Hebrew is, cheder be cheder, "chamber within chamber," which exactly agrees with the description extracted; but it is new to consider this threat as predicting that Zedekiah should fly for shelter to a harem, [as we find Assan Firally Bashaw had done:] that his fear should render him, as it were, effeminate, and that he should seek refuge where it was not usual for a man to seek it; where the "officers of justice," nor even those of conquerors, usually penetrated. There is an additional disgrace, a sting in these words, if this be the intention of the speaker, stronger than what has hitherto been noticed in them. Is not something similar related of Benhadad, 1 Kings xx. 30, "He fled," and was so overcome with fear, that he hid himself in "a chamber within chamber?" As it is very characteristic of braggarts and drunkards (see verses 16, 18, &c.) to be mentally overwhelmed when in adversity, may we not suppose that Benhadad was now concealed in the harem? Following circumstances do not militate against this supposition. That the word cheder means a woman's chamber, appears from Judges xv. 1 where Samson says, "I will go to my wife into her chamber," (חֵדֶרָהּ).—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

Ver. 43. And he walked in all the ways of Asa his father; he turned not aside from it, doing that which was right in the eyes of the LORD: nevertheless the high places were not taken away; for the people offered and burnt incense yet in the high places.

Many of old worshipped upon hills and on the tops of high mountains; imagining that they thereby obtained a nearer communication with heaven. Strabo says that the Persians always performed their worship upon hills. Some nations, instead of an image, worshipped the hill as the deity. In Japan most of their temples are at this day upon eminences; and often upon the ascent of high mountains, commanding fine views, with groves and rivulets of clear water: for they say, that the gods are extremely delighted with such high and pleasant spots. (Kämpfer's Japan.) This practice, in early times, was almost universal; and every mountain was esteemed holy. The people who prosecuted this method of worship enjoyed a soothing infatuation, which flattered the gloom of superstition. The eminences to which they retired were lonely and silent, and seemed to be happily circumstanced for contemplation and prayer. They who frequented them were raised above the lower world, and fancied that they were brought into the vicinity of the powers of the air, and of the deity who resided in the higher regions. But the chief excellence for which they were frequented was, that they were looked upon as the peculiar places where God delivered his oracles.—BURDEN.

Ver. 48. Jehoshaphat made ships of Tharshish to go to Ophir for gold; but they went not: for the ships were broken at Ezion-geber.

"Suez, which was the Arsinoe of the ancients, is situated at the top of the Red Sea: it stands surrounded by the desert, and is a shabby, ill-built place; the ships anchor a league from the town, to which the channel that leads is very narrow, and has only nine or ten feet depth of water; for which reason, the large ships that are built here must be towed down to the road, without mast, guns, or any thing in them; there are eight of them lying here, which have not been to Juddah this year; one of them is at least twelve hundred tons burden, being as lofty as a hundred gun ship, though not longer than a frigate; so that you may judge of the good proportions they observe in the construction of their ships; the timber of which they are all built is brought from Syria by water, to Cairo, and from thence on camels. This fleet sails for Juddah every year, before the Hodge; stays there two or three months, and returns loaded with coffee: this is so material an article in the diet of a Mussulman, that the prayers and wishes of them all are offered up for its safety: and I believe, next to the loss of their country, the loss of their coffee would be most severely felt by them. The greatest part of it is sent to Constantinople, and other parts of Turkey, but a small quantity going to France and Italy." (Major Rooke, p. 73.)—BURDEN.

THE SECOND BOOK OF KINGS.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 2 And Ahaziah fell down through a lattice in his upper chamber that was in Samaria, and was sick: and he sent messengers, and said unto them, Go, inquire of Baal-zebul, the god of Ekron, whether I shall recover of this disease.

In the eastern countries the roofs of the houses were flat, and surrounded with a battlement, to prevent falling from them, because it was a customary thing for people to walk upon them, in order to take the air. Now in this battlement we may suppose that there were some wooden lattices for people to look through, of equal height with the parapet wall, and that Ahaziah negligently leaning on it, as it was rotten and infirm it broke down, and let him fall into the court, or garden, belonging to his house. Or there is another way wherein he might fall. In these flat roofs there was generally an opening, which served instead of a sky light to the house below, and this opening might be done over with lattice-work, which the king, as he was carelessly walking, might chance to step upon and slip through. Nor is there any absurdity in supposing such lattice-work in a king's palace, when the world was not arrived to that height of art and curiosity that we find in it now.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 3. Is it not because there is not a God in Israel, that ye go to inquire of Baal-zebul, the god of Ekron?

We, perhaps, may be a good deal surprised to find, that the driving away of flies should be thought by the inhabitants of the country about Ekron so important, that they should give a name to the idol they worshipped, expressive of that property, (Baal-zebul, lord of the fly;) more especially when this was not the only quality ascribed to him, but it was supposed the power of predicting such momentous matters as the continuance of the life of great princes, or their approaching death, did also belong to him; but possibly a passage in Vinisauf may lessen this astonishment. Vinisauf, speaking of the army under our Richard the First, a little before he left the Holy Land, and describing them as marching on the plain not far from the seacoast, towards a place called Ybelin, which belonged to the knights hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem, pretty near Hebron, says, "The army stopping a while there, rejoicing in the hope of speedily setting out for Jerusalem, were assailed by a most minute kind of fly, flying about like sparks, which they called cincinnatiæ. With these the whole neighbouring region round about was filled. These most wretchedly infested the pilgrims, piercing with great smartness the hands, necks, throats, foreheads, and faces, and every part that was uncovered, a most violent burning tumour following the punctures made by them, so that all that they stung looked like lepers." He adds, "that they could hardly guard themselves from this most troublesome vexation, by covering their heads and necks with veils." What these fireflies were, and whether they shone in the dark, and for that reason are compared to sparks flying about, or whether they were compared to them on the account of the burning heat they occasioned, as well as a swelling in the flesh of all they wounded, I shall not take upon me to determine. I would only observe, Richard and his people met with them in that part of the country, which seemed to be of the country which was not very far from Ekron, and which seemed to be of much the same general nature—a plain not far from the seacoast.

Can we wonder, after this recital, that those poor heathen who lived in and about Ekron, derived much consolation from the supposed power of the idol they worshipped, to drive away the cincinnatiæ of that country, which were so extremely vexatious to these pilgrims of the 12th century, and occasioned them so much pain. Lord of the fly, lord of these cincinnatiæ, must have appeared to them a very pleasing, a very important title.

I will only add, that Sandys, in his travels in the same country, but more to the northward, speaks of the an appearing as if full of sparkles of fire, borne to and fro with the wind, after much rain and a thunderstorm, which appearance of sparkles of fire he attributes to infinite swarms of flies that shone like glow-worms; but he gives not the least intimation of their being incommoded by them. What this difference was owing to, it is quite beside the design of these papers to inquire; whether its being about two months earlier in the year, more to the northward, or immediately after much rain and a thunderstorm, was a cause of the innoxiousness of these animals when Sandys travelled, and even whether the appearance Sandys speaks of, was really owing to insects, or to any effect of electricity, I leave to others to determine.—HARME.

Ver. 4. Now, therefore, thus saith the LORD, Thou shalt not come down from that bed on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die. And Elijah departed.

This expression may be illustrated by what Shaw says of the Moorish houses in Barbary, (Travels, p. 209.) which, after having observed that their chambers are spacious, of the same length with the square court on the sides of which they are built, he adds, "at one end of each chamber there is a little gallery raised three, four, or five feet above the floor, with a balustrade in the front of it, with a few steps likewise leading up to it. Here they place their beds; a situation frequently alluded to in the holy scriptures, which may likewise illustrate the circumstance of Hezekiah's turning his face, when he prayed, towards the wall, (i. e. from his attendants.)" 2 Kings xx. 2, that the fervency of his devotion might be the less taken notice of and observed. The like is related of Ahab, (1 Kings xxi. 4.) though probably he did this, not upon a religious account, but in order to conceal from his attendants the anguish he was in for his late disappointment.—BURDEA.

Ver. 8. And they answered him, He was a hairy man, and girt with a girdle of leather about his loins. And he said, It is Elijah the Tishbite.

See on Matt. 3. 4.

Ver. 15. And the angel of the LORD said unto Elijah, Go down with him; be not afraid of him. And he arose, and went down with him unto the king.

See on 1 Sam. 17. 51.

Ver. 16. Therefore thou shalt not come down off that bed on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die.

At one end of each chamber is a little gallery, raised three or four feet above the floor, with a balustrade in front, to which they go up by a few steps. Here they place their beds; a situation frequently alluded to in the holy scriptures. Thus Jacob addressed his undutiful son, in his last benediction: "Thou wentest up to thy father's bed,—th-went up to my couch." The allusion is again involved in the declaration of Elijah to the king of Samaria: "Now, therefore, thus saith the Lord, Thou shalt not come down from that bed on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die." And the Psalmist sware unto the Lord, and vowed unto the mighty God of Jacob, "Surely I will not come into the tabernacle of my house, nor go up into my bed,—until I find out a place for the Lord." This arrangement may likewise illustrate the circumstance of Hezekiah's "turning his face to the wall, when he prayed," that the greatness of his sorrow, and the fervour of his devotion, might, as much as possible, be concealed from his attendants. The same thing is related of Ahab, although we have no reason to think it was upon a religious account, but in order to conceal from those about him the anguish he felt for his late disappointment; or, perhaps, by so great a show of sorrow, to provoke them to devise some means to gratify his wishes: "And he laid him down upon his bed, and turned away his face, and would eat no bread."—PAXTON.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 3. And the sons of the prophets that were at Bethel came forth to Elisha, and said unto him, Knowest thou that the Lord will take away thy master from thy head to-day? And he said, Yea, I know it; hold ye your peace.

The expression in the text is, "Knowest thou, that the Lord will take away thy master from thy head to-day?" where the sons of the prophets allude to their manner of sitting in their school: for the scholars used to sit below their masters' feet, and the masters above over their heads, when they taught them; and therefore the sense of the words is, that God would deprive Elisha of his master Elijah's instructions, viz. by a sudden death. For it does not appear that they had any notion of his translation; so far from this, that they desired leave to send out some to seek for him, "if peradventure the spirit of the Lord had taken him up, and cast him upon some mountain, or into some valley," ver. 16.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 11. And it came to pass, as they still went on, and talked, that, behold, there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, and parted them both asunder; and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven.

The Hindoos believe their supreme god Siva sends his angels, with a green chariot, to fetch the souls of those who are devoted to him; that there are occasionally horses, but at other times none. "The holy king Tirru-Sangu (i. e. divine chank) was taken to heaven, body and soul, without the pain of dying." When a man, as a heathen, is very regular in his devotions; or when he reproves others for vice, or neglect of duty, it is often scornfully asked, "What! are you expecting the green chariot to be sent for you?" meaning, "Do you, by your devotions, expect to go to heaven in the chariot of Siva without the pain of dying?" Does a man act with great injustice, the person who finds him out asks, "Will you get the green chariot for this?" Has a heathen embraced Christianity, he is asked the same question. "Charity, charity," says the beggar at your door, "and the green chariot will be sent for you."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 12. And Elisha saw it, and he cried, My father, my father! the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof. And he saw him no more: and he took hold of his own clothes, and rent them in two pieces.

The words of Elisha upon this occasion are, "My father, my father!" (so they called their masters and instructors,) "the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof." The expression alludes to the form of the chariot and horses that he had just then beheld, and seems to imply, "That Elijah, by his example, and counsel, and prayers, and power with God, did more for the defence and preservation of Israel, than all their chariots and horses, and other warlike provisions;" unless we may suppose, that this was an abrupt speech, which Elisha, in the consternation he was in, left unfinished, and so the sacred history has recorded it.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 19. And the men of the city said unto Elisha, Behold, I pray thee, the situation of this city is pleasant, as my lord seeth: but the water is naught, and the ground barren.

Margin, "causing to miscarry." If the latter reading is allowed to be more just than the former, we must entertain a different idea of the situation of Jericho than the textual translation suggests. There are actually at this time cities where animal life of certain kinds pines, and decays, and dies; and where that posterity which should replace such loss is either not conceived; or, if conceived, is not brought to the birth; or if brought to the birth, is fatal in delivery to both mother and offspring. An instance of this kind occurs in Don Ulloa's Voyage to South America. He says of the climate of Porto Bello, that "it destroys the vigour of nature, and often untimely cuts the thread of life." And of Sennaar, Mr. Bruce says, that "no horse, mule, ass, or any beast of burden, will breed or even live at Sennaar, or many miles about it. Poultry does not live there; neither dog nor cat, sheep nor bullock, can be preserved a season there. They must go all, every half year, to the sands. Though every possible care be taken of them, they die in every place where the fat earth is about the town, during the first season of the rains." He further mentions, that the situation is equally unfavourable to most trees.—BURDEN.

Ver. 20. And he said, Bring me a new cruise, and put salt therein. And they brought it to him.

The Hebrew, tjelachit (תְּלַחִית) is used to denote a vessel of some capacity; a vessel to be turned upside down, in order that the inside may be thoroughly wiped, (2 Kings xxi. 13.) "I will wipe Jerusalem, as a man wipeth a dish, turning it upside down." This implies, at least, that the opening of such a dish be not narrow but wide; that the dish itself be of a certain depth; yet that the hand may readily reach to the bottom of it, and there may freely move, so as to wipe it thoroughly, &c. This vessel was capable also of bearing the fire, and of standing conveniently over a fire; for we read, 2 Chron. xxx. 13. "The priests, &c. boiled parts of the holy offerings in pans (tjelachit), and distributed them speedily among the people." Meaning, perhaps, that this was not the very kind of boiler which they would have chosen, had time permitted a choice; but that haste, and multiplicity of business, made them use whatever first came to hand, that was competent to the service. This application of these vessels, however, shows that they must have been of considerable capacity and depth; as a very narrow or a very small dish, would not have answered the purpose required. [Or, was this speedy distribution of these viands, because they were best eaten hot?] A kind of dish or pan, which appears to answer these descriptions, is represented in the French work, entitled Estampes du Levant, in the hands of a confectioner of the grand seigneur's seraglio, who is carrying a deep dish, full of heated viands, (recently taken off the fire,) upon which he has put a cover, in order that those viands may retain their heat and flavour. His being described on the plate as a confectioner, leads to the supposition that what he carries are delicacies; to this agrees his desire of preserving their heat; and the shape of the vessel is evidently calculated for standing, &c. over a fire. Moreover, from its form it may easily be rested on its side, for the purpose of being thoroughly wiped; and a dish used to contain delicacies, is most likely to receive such attention; for the comparison in the text referred to, evidently implies some assiduity and exertion to wipe from the dish every particle inconsistent with complete cleanliness. This dish, we suppose, is of earth, or china;—that is, of porcelain, rather than of metal.

We are now prepared to see the import of Elisha's direction to the men of Jericho, (2 Kings ii. 20.) "Bring me a new tjelachit"—one of the vessels used in your cookery—in those parts of your cookery which you esteem the most delicate: a culinary vessel, but of the superior kind; "and put salt therein," what you constantly mingle in your food, what readily mixes with water; and this shall be a sign to you, that in your future use of this stream, you shall find it salubrious, and fit for daily service in preparing, or accompanying, your daily sustenance. There is a striking picture of sloth, sketched out very simply, but very strongly, by the sagacious Solomon, (Prov. xix 21,) repeated almost verbatim, chap. xxvi. 15:

A slothful n hideth his hand in the tjelachit:
But will not re bring it to his mouth.

A slothful man hideth his hand in the tjelachit.—but
It grieveth him to bring it again to his mouth.

Meaning, he sees a dish, deep and capacious, filled with confectionary, sweetmeats, &c. whatever his appetite can desire in respect to relish and flavour; of this he is greedy. Thus excited, he thrusts his hand—his right hand—deep into the dish, loads it with delicacies; but, alas! the labour of lifting it up to his mouth is too great, too excessive, too fatiguing: he therefore does not enjoy or taste what is before him, though his appetite be so far allured as to desire, and his hand be so far exerted as to grasp. [This is the customary mode of conveying food to the mouth in the East, where knives and forks are not in use.] He suffers the viands to become cold, and thereby to lose their flavour; while he debates the important movement of his hand to his mouth, if he does not rather totally forego the enjoyment, as demanding too vast an action! Surely this picture of sloth is greatly heightened by this notion of the tjelachit. It seems to be sufficiently striking, that two words, rendered by our translators lap, or bosom, (Prov. xvi. 33, chik, and the word before us,) should both signify vases, or vessels. The first denotes, the lot-vase, used for containing the lot-pebbles, &c. to be drawn out by the hand; the other a dish for meat; neither of them referring to any part of the person, as our version seems to imply; which reads,

A slothful man hideth his hand in his bosom,
And will not bring it to his mouth again.

The powerful picture of sloth, painted by Solomon, gives occasion to enlarge somewhat further on the manner of eating among the Arabs; a manner that seems sufficiently rude to us, but which those who practise it insist is more natural and convenient, and not less cleanly than our own. "Extending their forefinger and thumb, (of the right hand always—the left hand is reserved for less honourable uses,) they say," observes D'Arvieux, "God made this fork before you made your steel ones." Mr. Jackson says, "The Moors are, for the most part, more cleanly in their persons than in their garments. They wash their hands before every meal, which, as they use no knives or forks, they eat with their fingers: half a dozen persons sit round a large bowl of cuscusoe, and, after the usual ejaculation (Bismillah!) in the name of God! each person puts his hand to the bowl, and taking up the food, throws it, by a dexterous jerk, into his mouth, without suffering his fingers to touch his lips. However repentant this may be to our ideas of cleanliness, yet the hand being always washed, and never touching the mouth in the act of eating, these people are by no means so dirty as Europeans have sometimes hastily imagined. They have no chairs or tables in their houses, but sit crosslegged on carpets and cushions; and at meals, the dish or bowl of provisions is placed on the floor." (Account of Morocco, p. 155.)

That a thorough sluggard should practise this "dexterous jerk of the hand," is not likely to have entered into the contemplation of the royal sage, in the passages illustrated above: and to say truth, the latter observation seems to be couched in terms much stronger than the former: "The sluggard musters up just strength enough to plunge his hand into the bowl; but this mighty effort exhausts him, he finds his weariness (782) too great, too excessive, to bring it up to his mouth, loaded though it be with the delicacies of the table." There is a force in the word rendered hide or plunge, which should not be disregarded.—The sluggard buries deeply his hand:—it being customary with such characters to grasp at all, and more than all, which they can hold. Perhaps the action of a less polite class than that principally alluded to by Mr. Jackson, may best illustrate this reflection. We shall therefore add the following from Major Rooke's Travels in Arabia: "On my first going on board, I sat down with the Nokedah and his officers to supper, the floor being both our tables and chairs, on which we seated ourselves in a circle, with a large bowl of rice in the middle, and some fish and dates before each person: here I likewise found that knives and forks were useless instruments in eating, and that nature had accommodated us with what answered the same purpose: we plunged our hands into the bowl, rolled up a handful of rice into a ball, and conveyed it to our mouths in that form; our repast was short, and to that succeeded coffee and washing; and on their parts prayer, in which they were very frequent and fervent."—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

Ver. 23. And he went up from thence unto Bethel: and as he was going up by the way, there came forth little children out of the city, and mocked him, and said unto him, Go up, thou bald-head; go up, thou bald-head.

Some suppose this alludes to the head being uncovered. I was not a little astonished in the East, when I first heard a man called a bald-head, who had a large quantity of hair on his head: and I found, upon inquiry, it was an epithet of CONTEMPT! A man who has killed himself is called "a bald-headed suicide!" A stupid fellow, "a bald-headed dunce." Of those who are powerless, "What can those bald-heads do?" Hence the epithet has often been applied to the missionaries. Is a man told his wife does not manage domestic matters well, he replies, as if in contempt of himself, "What can a bald-head do? must he not have a wife of the same kind?" Let a merchant, or any other person, who is going on business, meet a man who is REALLY bald, and he will assuredly refuse to attend to the business; and pronounce, if he dare, some imprecations on the object of his hatred. Sometimes he will repeat the proverb, "Go, thou bald-head, pilferer of a small fish, and sucker of bones cast away by the goldsmith." Call a man a mottivan, i. e. bald-head, (which you may do, though he have much hair,) and then abuse, or sticks or stones, will be sure to be your portion. Thus the epithet implies great scorn, and is given to those who are WEAK OF MEAN.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 23. And he went up from thence unto Bethel, and as he was going up by the way, there came forth little children out of the city, and mocked him, and said unto him, Go up, thou bald-head; go up, thou bald-head. 24. And he turned back, and looked on them, and cursed them in the name of the LORD. And there came forth two she-beasts out of the wood, and tare forty and two children of them.

Bethel, it is well known, was one of the cities where Jeroboam had set up a golden calf, a place strangely addicted to idolatry, and whose inhabitants had no small aversion to Elisha, as being the servant and successor of one, who had been a professed enemy to their wicked worship, and himself no less an opposer of it. It is reasonable to suppose, therefore, that the children (if they were children, for the word naarim may signify grown youths as well) who mocked Elisha, were excited and encouraged thereunto by their parents; and therefore the judgment was just, in God's punishing the wickedness of these parents by the death of their children, who, though they suffered in this life, had the happiness to be rescued from the danger of an idolatrous education, which might have been of fatal tendency both to their present and future state. In the mean time it must be acknowledged, that the insolence of these mockers (whether we suppose them children or youths) was very provoking, inasmuch as they ridiculed, not only a man whose very age commanded reverence, but a prophet likewise, whose character, in all ages, was accounted sacred, nay, and even God himself, whose honour was struck at in the reproaches against his servant, and that too in one of his most glorious and wonderful works, his assumption of Elijah into heaven: For, "Go up, thou bald-head, go up, thou bald-head," (besides the bitterness of the contempt expressed in the repetition of the words,) shows that they made a mere jest of any such translation; and therefore, in banter, they bid Elijah go up, whither, as he pretended, his friend and master was gone before. These provocations, one would think, were enough to draw an imprecation from the prophet; but this imprecation did not proceed from any passion or private resentment of his own, but merely from the command and commission of his God; who, for the terror and caution of other profane persons and idolaters, as well as for the maintenance of the honour and authority of his prophets, "confirmed the word which had gone out of his servant's mouth."

The Life is to be said of the destruction which Elijah called down from heaven upon the two captains and their companies, who came to apprehend him—that he did this, not out of any hasty passion or revenge, but purely in obedience to the Holy Spirit, wherewith he was animated, and in zeal for the honour and glory of God, in the person of his prophet, were grossly abused.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 34. And there came forth two she-bears out of the wood, and tare forty and two children of them.

These furious animals were she-bears, which, it is probable, had been just deprived of their young; and now following the impulse of their outraged feelings, they rushed from the wood to revenge the loss. But it is evident their native ferocity was overruled and directed by divine providence, to execute the dreadful sentence pronounced by the prophet in his name. They must, therefore, be considered as the ministers of God, the Judge of all the earth, commissioned to punish the idolatrous inhabitants of Bethel and their profligate offspring, who probably acted on this occasion with their concurrence, if not by their command. He punished in a similar way the heathen colonies planted by the king of Assyria in the cities of Samaria, after the expulsion of the ten tribes: "They feared not the Lord; therefore the Lord sent lions among them, which slew some of them." When he punished the youths of Bethel, (for so the phrase little children signifies in Hebrew,) by directing against them the rage of the she-bears, he only did what Moses had long before predicted, and left on record for their warning: "And if ye walk contrary unto me, and will not hearken unto me, I will bring seven times more plagues upon you, according to your sins. I will also send wild beasts among you, which shall rob you of your children." Bethel had been long the principal seat of idolatry, and its attendant vices; and to all their aggravated crimes, its inhabitants now added rude and impious mockery of a person whom they knew to be a prophet of the Lord, reviling with blasphemous tongues the Lord God of Elijah, and his now glorified servant. Baldness was reckoned a very great deformity in the East; and to be reproached with it, one of the grossest insults an Oriental could receive. Cesar, who was bald, could not bear to hear it mentioned in jest. It is one of the marks of disgrace which Homer fixes upon Thersites, that he had only a few straggling hairs on his pyramidal head. Their crime, therefore, justly merited the severest punishment.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 4. And Mesha king of Moab was a sheepr-master, and rendered unto the king of Israel a hundred thousand lambs, and a hundred thousand rams, with the wool.

This was a prodigious number indeed; but then we are to consider that these countries abound with sheep, inso-much that Solomon offered a hundred and twenty thousand at the dedication of the temple, 2 Chron. vii. 5, and the Reubenites drove from the Hagarens a hundred and fifty thousand, 1 Chron. v. 7. For, as Bochart observes, their sheep frequently brought forth two at a time, and sometimes twice a year. The same learned man remarks, that in ancient times, when people's riches consisted in cattle, this was the only way of paying tribute. It is observed by others likewise, that this great number of cattle was not a tribute, which the Moabites were obliged to pay the Israelites every year, but on some special occasion only, upon the accession of every new king, for instance, when they were obliged to express their homage in this manner, to make satisfaction for some damages that the Israelites should at any time suffer from their invasions or revolts.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 11. And one of the king of Israel's servants answered and said, Here is Elisha the son o. Shaphat, which poured water on the hands o. Elijah.

We read, Elisha "went after Elijah, and ministered unto him;" which simply means he was his servant. The people of the East use their fingers in eating, instead of a knife and fork, or spoon; and consequently after, (as well as before,) they are obliged to wash their hands. The master, having finished his meal, calls a servant to pour water on his hands. The domestic then comes with a little brass vessel filled with water, and pours it on the hands and fingers till he hears the word potham, enough.—ROBERTS.

There is a description of Elisha the prophet, by a part of his office when servant to Elijah, which appears rather strange to us. "Is there not here a prophet of the Lord?" says King Jehoshaphat; he is answered, "Here is Elisha ben Shaphat, who poured water on the hands of Elijah," (2 Kings iii. 11.) i. e. who was his servant and constant attendant. So Pitts tells us: "The table being removed, before they rise (from the ground whereon they sit,) a slave, or servant, who stands attending on them with a cup of water to give them drink, steps into the middle with a basin, or copper pot of water, something like a coffee-pot, and a little soap, and lets the water run upon their hands one after another, in order as they sit." Such service it appears Elisha performed for Elijah: what shall we say then to the remarkable action of our Lord, "who poured water into a basin, and washed his disciples' feet," after supper? Was he indeed among them as one who serveth? On this subject, says D'Ohsson, "Ablution, Abdesth, consists in washing the hands, feet, face, and a part of the head; the law mentions them by the term—the three parts consecrated to ablu-tion." . . . The mussulman is generally seated on the edge of a sofa, with a pewter or copper vessel lined with tin placed before him upon a round piece of red cloth, to prevent the carpet or mat from being wet: a servant, kneeling on the ground, pours out water for his master; another holds a cloth destined for these purifications. The person who purifies himself begins by baring his arms as far as the elbow. As he washes his hands, mouth, nostrils, face, arms, &c., he repeats the proper prayers. . . . It is probable that Mohammed followed on this subject the book of Leviticus." It is well known that we have an officer among ourselves, who, at the coronation, and formerly at all public festivals, held a basin of water for the king to wash his hands in, after dinner; but it is not equally well known, that Cardinal Wolsey, one time, when the Duke of Buckingham held the basin for Henry VIII., after the king had washed, put his own hand into the basin: the duke resenting this intrusion, let some of the water fall on the habit of the cardinal, who never forgave the action, but brought the duke to the block, in consequence of his resentment.—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

Ver. 15. But now bring me a minstrel. And it came to pass, when the minstrel played, that the hand of the Lord came upon him.

The music of great men in civil life, has been sometimes directed to persons of a sacred character, as an expression of respect, in the East; perhaps the playing of the minstrel before the prophet Elisha is to be understood, in part, at least, in something of the same manner. When Dr. Richard Chandler was at Athens, the archbishop of that city was upon ill terms with his Vaiwode, and the Greeks in general siding with the Vaiwode, the archbishop was obliged to withdraw for a time; but some time after, when Chandler and his fellow-travellers were at Corinth, they were informed that the archbishop was returned to Athens: that the Bey or Vaiwode had received him kindly, and ordered his musicians to attend him at his palace; and that a complete revolution had happened in his favour. Here we see a civil magistrate, who had been displeased with a great ecclesiastic, sent his musicians to play at his archiepiscopal palace, in honour of him to whom this magistrate was now reconciled. Elisha might require that a like honour should be done to him, and through him to the God whom he served, who had been sadly neglected and affronted in former times by the king of Israel. The propriety of it will appear in a still stronger light, if we should suppose, that Elisha commanded the minstrel to sing, along with his music, a hymn to JEROMAH, setting forth his being a God that gave rain, that preserved such as were ready to perish, the giver of victory, and whose power was neither limited to his temple, nor to the Jewish country sacred to him, but equally operative in every place. The coming of the spirit of prophecy upon Elisha, enabling him to declare a speedy copious fall of rain in that neighbourhood, and a complete victory over their enemies, immediately upon the submissive compliance of this idolatrous prince with the requisition of the prophet, and such a hymn in praise of the God of Israel, seems to me full as natural an interpretation, as the supposing he desired the minstrel to come in order to play some soft composing tune, to calm his ruffled spirits, and to qualify him for the reception of the influences of the spirit of prophecy. Was a warm and pungent zeal against the idolatries of Jehoram a disqualifying disposition of soul? and if it were, was mere music the happiest mode of inviting the divine influences? Yet after this manner, I think, it has been commonly explained. Singing was, and is, so frequently joined with the sound of musical instruments in the East, that I apprehend no one will think it strange, that I suppose the minstrel sung as well as played in the presence of Elisha: and when it is recollected that their songs are very frequently extemporaneous, it is natural to suppose the prophet required something to be sung, suitable both to his character and to the occasion.—HARMER.

Ver. 16. And he said, Thus saith the LORD, Make this valley full of ditches: 17. For thus saith the LORD, Ye shall not see wind, neither shall ye see rain; yet that valley shall be filled with water, that ye may drink, both ye, and your cattle, and your beasts.

A shower of rain in the East, is often preceded by a whirlwind, which darkens the sky with immense clouds of sand from the loose surface of the desert. To this common phenomenon, the prophet alludes, in his direction to the king of Israel, who was marching with his army against Moab, and was ready to perish in the wilderness for want of water; "Thus saith the Lord, Make this valley full of ditches. For thus saith the Lord, Ye shall not see wind, neither shall ye see rain; yet that valley shall be filled with water, that ye may drink, both ye, and your cattle, and your beasts." If a squall had not commonly preceded rain, the prophet would not have said, Ye shall not see wind.—FAXTON.

Ver. 19. And ye shall smite every fenced city, and every choice city, and shall fell every good tree, and stop all wells of water, and mar every good piece of land with stones.

Commentators take no pains, that I know of, to account for that part of the punishment of the king of Moab's rebellion, Ye shall mar every good piece of land with stones; though it does not appear very easy to conceive how this was to be done to any purpose, and indeed without giving as much trouble, or more, to Israel, to gather these stones, and carry them on their lands, as to the Moabites to gather them up again, and carry them off. I would therefore propose it to the learned to consider, whether we may not understand this of Israel's doing that nationally, and as victors, which was done by private persons very frequently in these countries in ancient times, by way of revenge, and which is mentioned in some of the old Roman laws, I think, cited by Egmont and Heyman, who, speaking of the contentions and vindictive temper of the Arabs, tell us, they were ignorant, however, whether they still retained the method of revenge formerly common among them, and which is called οσπελισμος, mentioned in Lib. ff. Digest. de extraord. criminib. which contains the following account. In provincia Arabia, &c. That is, "in the province of Arabia, there is a crime called οσπελισμος, or fixing of stones; it being a frequent practice among them, to place stones in the grounds of those with whom they are at variance as a warning, that any person who dares to till that field, should infallibly be slain, by the contrivance of those who placed the stones there." This malicious practice, they add, is thought to have had its origin in Arabia Petræa. If the Israelites, as victors, who could prescribe what laws they thought proper to the conquered, placed such stones in the best grounds of the Moabites, as interdicting them from tillage, on pain of their owners being destroyed, they without much trouble effectually marred such fields as long as their power over Moab lasted, which had before this continued some time, and by the suppression of this rebellion might be supposed to continue long. As it was an ancient practice in these countries, might it not be supposed to be as ancient as the times of Elisha, and that he referred to it? Perhaps the time to cast away stones, and the time to gather stones together, mentioned by the royal preacher, Eccles. iii. 5, is to be understood in like manner, of giving to nations with which there had been contests, the marks of perfect reconciliation, or continuing upon them some tokens of displeasure and resentment. If we suppose the latter part of the verse is exegetical of the former, which the learned know is very common in the Hebrew poetry, it will better agree with this explanation, than with that which supposes, that the casting away of stones, means the demolishing of houses, and the gathering them together, the collecting them for building; since the casting away of stones answers to embracing, in the latter part of the verse, not to the refraining from embracing. It may be supposed indeed that a transposition might be intended, such a one as appears in the eighth verse; but it is to be observed, that the eighth verse finishes this catalogue of different seasons, and there is no transposition in the other particulars. To which may be added, that this explanation makes the casting away of stones, and gathering them together, of the fifth verse, precisely the same thing with the breaking down and building up of the third: the supposing a greater variety of thought here will be no dishonour to the royal poet.—HARMER.

Ver. 27. Then he took his eldest son, that should have reigned in his stead, and offered him for a burnt-offering upon the wall. And there was great indignation against Israel: And they departed from him, and returned to their own land.

In great distress, several persons, like the king of Moab, have offered their own children upon their altars. Eusebius and Lactantius mention several nations who used these sacrifices. Cesar says of the Gauls, that when they were afflicted with grievous diseases, or in time of war, or great danger, they either offered men for sacrifices, or vowed they would offer them. For they imagined God would not be appeased, unless the life of a man were rendered for the life of a man.—BURDER.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1. Now there cried a certain woman of the wives of the sons of the prophets unto Elisha, saying, Thy servant my husband is dead; and thou knowest that thy servant did fear the LORD: and the creditor is come to take unto him my two sons to be bondmen.

This was a case in which the Hebrews had such power over their children, that they might sell them to pay what they owed; and the creditor might force them to it. Huet thinks that from the Jews this custom was propagated to the Athenians, and from them to the Romans.—BURDER.

The Jewish law looked upon children as the proper goods of their parents, who had power to sell them for seven years, as their creditors had to compel them to do it, in order to pay their debts; and from the Jews this custom was propagated to the Athenians, and from them to the Romans. The Romans indeed had the most absolute control over their children. By the decree of Romulus they could imprison, beat, kill, or sell them for slaves; but Numa Pompilius first moderated this, and the emperor Diocletian made a law, that no free persons should be sold upon account of debt. The ancient Athenians had the like jurisdiction over their children, but Solon reformed this cruel custom; as indeed it seemed a little hard, that the children of a poor man, who have no manner of inheritance left them, should be compelled into slavery, in order to pay their deceased father's debts; and yet this was the custom, as appears from this passage, wherein the prophet does not pretend to reprove the creditor, but only puts the woman in a method to pay him.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 13. Let us make a little chamber, I pray thee, on the wall; and let us set for him there a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick; and it shall be when he cometh to us, that he shall turn in thither.

To most of these houses a smaller one is annexed, which sometimes rises one story higher than the house; and at other times it consists of one or two rooms only, and a terrace; while others that are built, as they frequently are, over the porch or gateway, have, if we except the ground-floor, which they want, all the conveniences that belong to the house itself. They communicate with the gallery of the house by a door, and by another door, which opens immediately from a privy stair, with the porch or street, without giving the least disturbance to the house. In these back-houses, as they may be called, strangers are usually lodged and entertained; and to them likewise the men are wont to retire from the hurry and noise of their families, to be more at leisure for meditation and amusement; and at other times, they are converted into wardrobes and magazines. This annexed building is in the holy scriptures named (עֲוֵן) aliah; and we have reason to believe, that the little chamber which the Shunamite built for the prophet Elisha, whither, as the text informs us, he retired at his pleasure, without breaking in upon the private affairs of the family, or being in his turn interrupted by them in his levitations, was a structure of this kind. It is thus described by the Shunamite herself: "Let us make a little chamber, I pray thee, on the wall; and let us set for him there a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick; and it shall be, that when he cometh to us, that he shall turn in thither. The internal communication of this chamber with the Shunamite's house, may be inferred, as well from its being built upon the wall which enclosed her dwelling, as from her having so free access to it, and at the second invitation, standing in the door, while the prophet announced to her the birth of a son.—PAXTON.

They did not then among the ancients sit universally as the modern inhabitants of the East now do, on the ground or floor, on some mat or carpet; they sometimes sat on thrones, or seats more or less like our chairs, often raised so high as to require a footstool. But it was considered as a piece of splendour, and offered as a mark of particular respect. It was doubtless for this reason that a seat of this kind was placed, along with some other furniture, in the chamber which the devout Shunamite prepared for the prophet Elisha, 2 Kings iv. 10, which our version has very unhappily translated a stool, by which we mean the least honourable kind of seat in an apartment; whereas the original word meant to express her respect for the prophet by the kind of seat she prepared for him. The word is כִּסֵּא kissa, the same that is commonly translated throne. The candlestick is, in like manner, to be considered as a piece of furniture, suitable to a room that was magnificently fitted up, according to the mode of those times, a light being kept burning all night long in such apartments. So a lamp was kept burning all night, in the apartment in which Dr. Richard Chandler slept, in the house of a Jew, who was vice-consul for the English nation, at the place where he first landed, when he proposed to visit the curious ruins of Asia Minor. Further, we are told by De la Roque, in the account given of some French gentlemen's going to Arabia Felix, page 43, 44, that they found only mats in the house of the captain of the port of Aden, where they were honourably received, which were to serve them for beds, chairs, and tables; so in the evening they brought them tapers without candlesticks, the want of which they were to supply as well as they could, which was but indifferently.—HARMER.

Ver. 20. And when he had taken him, and brought him to his mother, he sat on her knees till noon, and then died.

The heat, in eastern countries, is often so excessive, as to prove fatal to many people. To this cause it is to be attributed the death of the child at Shunem, in the days of Elisha. Egmont and Heyman (vol. i. p. 333) found the air about Jericho extremely hot, and say that it destroyed several persons the year before they were there. The army of King Baldwin IV. suffered considerably from this circumstance near Tiberias. The heat at the time was so unusually great, that as many died by that as by the sword. After the battle, in their return to their former encampment, a certain ecclesiastic, of some distinction in the church and in the army, not being able to bear the vehemence of the heat, was carried in a litter, but expired under mount Tabor.—(HARMER.) The child of the Shunamite here spoken of, had gone to the reapers in the field, (v. 12,) where he suddenly complained of headache, (v. 19,) and soon after died. Probably he had a sun-stroke, which was very natural in the great heat which prevails in those countries at harvest-time. Monconys, speaking of himself, says, "Towards evening, the sun had struck with such force on my head, that I was seized with a violent fever, and obliged to go to bed." Werli Von Zember relates the same of himself and his companions. "After we had been obliged to remain a long time in this court, exposed to the heat of the sun, we almost all became ill, with dreadful headache, giddiness, and fever, so that some even lost their senses." Von Stammer says, "When we came into the desert, between the mountains, I was seized with a very severe inflammatory fever; I was unable to remain any longer on the camel, but was forced to lie down on the ground, and became so ill, that they scarcely thought I was alive."—ROSENNULLER.

Ver. 22. And she called unto her husband, and said, Send me, I pray thee, one of the young men, and one of the asses, that I may run to the man of God, and come again.

The saddle ass retaining the characteristic perverseness of his kind, is apt to become restive under his rider, which, in cases that require haste, renders it necessary to accelerate his speed by means of the goad. This, according to Pococke, is commonly done for persons of rank by a servant on foot. This method of travelling seems to have been quite common in Palestine; for the Shunamite's husband expressed neither surprise nor hesitation, when she asked for "one of the young men, and one of the asses, that she might run to the man of God." The acknowledged inability of the ass to carry both the servant and his mistress, the custom of having an attendant, whose business it was to drive the animal forward, and the eager impatience of the bereaved mother, which required the utmost speed, sufficiently prove that she rode the ass herself, while the servant attended her on foot, or mounted perhaps on a camel, which persons in his condition often used on a journey. "And she said to her servant, Drive, (or lead), and go forward; slack not riding for me, except I bid thee." Put him to the utmost speed, without regarding the inconveniences I may suffer. The pronoun thy, it has been thought, is very improperly supplied in our translation, as it lends one to suppose that the servant himself was the rider. But although no mention is made of the circumstance, it is not perfectly clear that the servant was not mounted on this occasion. The phrase, cease not to ride, (עָבַד) or cease not riding, naturally suggests that he was mounted. The ass which the Shunamite saddled, was a strong animal, as the name given him by the inspired writer imports; and if we may believe Maillet, the asses in Egypt and Syria have nothing of that indolence and heaviness which are natural to ours; therefore, if the servant was not furnished with a camel, or was not a running footman by profession, of which we have no proof, the ass must have soon left him far behind, and rendered his services of no use. When the inspired writer says the Shunamite saddled her ass, he uses a phrase which often occurs in the sacred writings, and seems to comprehend any requisite for the convenience. If the rider and the proper management of the animal.—PAXTON.

Ver. 23. And he said, Wherefore wilt thou go to him to-day? it is neither new moon nor sabbath. And she said, It shall be well.

Peter Della Vallé assures us, that it is now customary in Arabia to begin their journeys at the new moon. When the Shunamite proposed going to Elisha, her husband dissuaded her by observing that it was neither new moon nor sabbath.—BURDER.

Ver. 24. Then she saddled an ass, and said to her servant, Drive, and go forward; slack not thy riding for me, except I bid thee.

See on Judg. 10. 4.

Where travellers are not so numerous as in caravans, their appearance differs a good deal from that of those who journey among us. To see a person mounted and attended by a servant on foot, would seem odd to us; and it would be much more so to see that servant driving the beast before him, or goading it along; yet these are eastern modes. So Dr. Pococke, in his account of Egypt, tells us that the man, the husband, I suppose he means, always leads the lady's ass there; and if she has a servant, he goes on one side; but the ass-driver follows the man, goads on the beast, and when he is to turn, directs his head with a pole. The Shunamite, when she went to the prophet, did not desire so much attendance, only requesting her husband to send her an ass, and its driver, to whom she said, "Drive, and go forward, slack not thy riding for me, except I bid thee." 2 Kings iv. 24. It appears from the eastern manner of the women's riding on asses, that the word is rightly translated drive, rather than lead; and this account of Dr. Pococke we also explain why she did not desire two asses, one for herself, and the other for the servant that attended her. Solomon might refer to the same, when he says, "I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth," Eccl. x. 7. My reader, however, will meet with a more exact illustration of this passage in its proper place.—HARMER.

Ver. 29. Then he said to Gehazi, Gird up thy loins, and take my staff in thy hand, and go thy way: if thou meet any man, salute him not; and if any salute thee, answer him not again: and lay my staff upon the face of the child.

The rod, or staff, in the scriptures, is mentioned as an emblem of authority over inanimate nature, over man, and the diseases to which he was subject, and also as an instrument of correction for the wicked. The Lord commanded Moses, "Take thy rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the waters of Egypt, upon their streams, upon their rivers, and upon their ponds, and upon all their pools of water, that they may become blood." The magicians of the heathen king had their rods also, by which they performed many wonderful things. I see no reason to doubt that the staff of Elisha was of the same nature, and for the same purposes, as the "rod of God," which did such wonders in the hands of Moses. Gehazi, though he had the emblem of his master's office, could not perform the miracle: and no wonder; for the moment before he received the command from Elisha, he showed his evil disposition to the mother of the dead child; for when she caught the prophet "by the feet," to state her case, he went "near to thrust her away."

The rou-mulle-pirambu (i. e. a cane with one knot) is believed to possess miraculous power, whether in the hand of a magician or a private individual. It is about the size of the middle finger, and must have only one knot in its whole length. "A man bitten by a serpent will be assuredly cured, if the cane or rod be placed upon him: nay, should he be dead, it will restore him to life!" "Yes, sir, the man who has such a stick need fear neither serpents nor evil spirits." A native gentleman known to me has the staff of his umbrella made of one of these rods, and great satisfaction and comfort has he in this his constant companion. "The sun cannot smite him by day, neither the moon by night; the serpents and wild beasts move off swiftly; and the evil spirits dare not come near to him."—REBERTS.

This command to salute no one, naturally calls to mind that which Jesus gave to the seven disciples—Luke x. 4. Salute no one by the way. It is explained by the custom of the East. Serious and taciturn as the natives of the East usually are, they grow talkative when they meet an acquaintance and salute him. This custom has come from Asia with the Arabs, and spread over the north coast of Africa. A modern traveller relates the reciprocal salutations with which those are received who return with the caravans. "People go a great way to meet them; as soon as they are perceived, the questioning and salutation begin, and continue with the repetition of the same phrases: 'How do you do? God be praised that you are come in peace! God give you peace! How fares it with you?' The higher the rank of the person returning home, the longer does the salutation last."—BURDER.

Elisha's enjoining Gehazi not to salute any that he met, or to return the salutation of such, evidently expresses the haste he would have him make to recover the child, and bring him back to life. For the salutations of the East often take up a long time. "The manner of salutation, as now practised by the people of Egypt, is not less ancient. The ordinary way of saluting people, when at a distance, is bringing the hand down to the knees, and then carrying it to the stomach. Marking their devotedness to a person by holding down the hand; as they do their affection by their after raising it up to their heart. When they come close together afterward, they take each other by the hand in token of friendship. What is very pleasant, is to see the countrypeople reciprocally clapping each other's hands very smartly, twenty or thirty times together, in meeting, without saying any thing more than Salamat aiche halcom; that is to say, How do you do? I wish you good health. In this form of complimenting must be acknowledged to be simple, it must be admitted to be very affectionate. Perhaps it marks out a better disposition of heart than all the studied phrases which are in use among us, and which politeness almost always makes use of at the expense of sincerity. After this first compliment many other friendly questions are asked, about the health of the family, mentioning each of the children distinctly, whose names they know," &c. If the forms of salutation among the ancient Jewish peasants took up as much time as those of the modern Egyptians that belong to that rank of life, it is no wonder the prophet commanded his servant to abstain from saluting those he might meet with, when sent to recover the child of the Shunamite to life: they that have attributed this order to haste have done right; but they ought to have shown the tediousness of eastern compliments.—HARMER.

Salutations at meeting, are not less common in the East than in the countries of Europe; but are generally confined to those of their own nation, or religious party. When the Arabs salute each other, it is generally in these terms: Salam aleikum, peace be with you; laying, as they utter the words, the right hand on the heart. The answer is, Aleikum essalam, with you be peace; to which aged people are inclined to add, "and the mercy and blessing of God." The Mohammedans of Egypt and Syria never salute a Christian in these terms; they content themselves with saying to them, "Good-day to you," or, "Friend, how do you do?" Niebuhr's statement is confirmed by Mr. Bruce, who says, that some Arabs, to whom he gave the salam, or salutation of peace, either made no reply, or expressed their astonishment at his impudence in using such freedom. Thus it appears, that the Orientals have two kinds of salutations; one for strangers, and the other for their own countrymen, or persons of their own religious profession. The Jews in the days of our Lord, seem to have generally observed the same custom; they would not address the usual compliment of "Peace be to you," to either heathens or publicans; the publicans of the Jewish nations would use it to their countrymen who were publicans, but not to heathens; though the more rigid Jews refused to do it either to publicans or heathens. Our Lord required his disciples to lay aside the moroseness of Jews, and cherish a benevolent disposition towards all around them: "If ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? Do not even the publicans so?" They were bound by the same authority, to embrace their brethren in Christ with a special affection, yet they were to look upon every man as a brother, to feel a sincere and cordial inter-rest in his welfare, and to express, at meeting, their benevolence, in language corresponding with the feelings of their hearts. This precept is not inconsistent with the charge which the prophet Elisha gave to his servant Gehazi, not to salute any man he met, nor return his salutation; for he wished him to make all the haste in his power to restore the child of the Shunamite, who had laid him under so many obligations. The manners of the country rendered Elisha's precautions particularly proper and necessary, as the salutations of the East often take up a long time.—PAXTON.

Ver. 39. And one went out into the field to gather herbs, and found a wild vine, and gathered thereof wild gourds his lapful, and came and shred them into the pot of pottage: for they knew them not.

Their common pottage in the East is made by cutting their meat into little pieces, and boiling them with rice, flour, and parsley, all which is afterward poured into a proper vessel. This in their language is called Shoorba. Parsley is used in this Shoorba, and a great many other herbs, in their cookery. These are not always gathered out of gardens, even by those that live in a more settled way than the Arabs: for Russel, after having given a long account of the garden stuff at Aleppo, tells us, that besides those from culture, the fields afford bugloss, mallow, asparagus, which they use as potherbs, besides some others which they use in salads. This is the more extraordinary, as they have such a number of gardens about Aleppo, and will take off all wonder from the story of one's going into the fields, to gather herbs, to put into the pottage of the sons of the prophets, 2 Kings iv. 39, in a time when indeed Ahab, and doubtless some others, had gardens of herbs, but it is not to be supposed things were so brought under culture as in later times.—HARMER.

Ver. 39. And one went out into the field to gather herbs, and found a wild vine, and gathered thereof wild gourds his lapful, and came and shred them into the pot of pottage: for they knew them not. 40. So they poured out for the men to eat: and it came to pass, as they were eating of the pottage, that they cried out and said, O thou man of God, there is death in the pot: and they could not eat thereof.

In the vales near Jordan, in the neighbourhood of Jericho, not far from the Dead Sea, is found, growing in great abundance, the vine of Sodom, a plant, from the fields around that devoted city, which produces grapes as bitter as gall, and wine as deadly as the poison of a serpent. This deleterious fruit is mentioned by Moses in terms which fully justify the assertion: "For their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah; their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter, their wine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps." It is probably the wild vine, a species of gourd, which produces the coloquintida, a fruit so excessively bitter that it cannot be eaten; and when given in medicine, proves a purgative so powerful, as to be frequently followed by exoriation of the vessels, and hemorrhage. It seems therefore to have been early, and not without reason, considered as poisonous. It was of this wild vine the sons of the prophets ate; and its instantaneous effect, together with their knowledge of its violent action, easily accounts for their alarm. Another species of wild vine, but of a milder character, which grows in Palestine, near the highways and hedges, is the Labrusca. Its fruit is a very small grape, which becomes black when ripe; but often it does not ripen at all. These are the wild grapes to which the prophet compares the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and men of Judah: "And he looked that it should bring forth grapes, and it brought forth wild grapes." They are also the sour grapes to which another inspired prophet alludes, when he predicts the destroying judgments that were coming upon his rebellious people: "In those days they shall say no more, The fathers have eaten a sour grape, and the children's teeth are set on edge.—Every man that eateth the sour grape, his teeth shall be set on edge."—PAXTON.

Ver. 42. And there came a man from Baal-shalisha, and brought the man of God bread of the first-fruits, twenty loaves of barley, and full ears of corn in the husk thereof: and he said, Give unto the people, that they may eat.

See on 1 Kings 14. 3.

The margin has, instead of in the husk, "in his scrip or garment." I think the marginal reading is better than the text. In what was the man to carry the ears of corn? In what may be seen every day—"in his scrip or garment." In the mantle (like a scarf) the natives carry many things: thus the petty merchant takes some of his ware, and the traveller his rice.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 6. And he brought the letter to the king of Israel, saying, Now, when this letter is come unto thee, behold, I have therewith sent Naaman my servant to thee, that thou mayest recover him of his leprosy.

Schultens observes that, "the right understanding of this passage depends on the custom of expelling lepers, and other infectious persons, from camps or cities, and reproachfully driving them into solitary places; and that when these persons were cleansed and readmitted into cities or camps, they were said to be recollects, gathered again from their leprosy, and again received into that society from which they had been cut off."—BURDER.

Ver. 11. But Naaman was wroth, and went away, and said, Behold, I thought, He will surely come out to me, and stand and call on the name of the LORD his God, and strike his hand over the place, and recover the leper.

Naaman thought that the prophet would effect his cure sooner and more certainly if he touched him with his hand, and, as it were, invigorated him by an effusion of his healing power. Then, as in later times, those who effected such miraculous cures were accustomed to touch the patient. Thus, Jan Moquet says, "when the sick were brought to the sheik of the Arabian Sants, (religions,) he touched either their right arm or foot, or stroked their breast and forehead, after money had been offered him." Among all nations superstition considers the touch as the principal requisite of a miraculous cure. Hans Egede, in his Greenland Mission, says, "A Greenland man and woman requested me to blow upon their sick child, or to lay my hands upon it; they hoped that it would recover. Many more sick Greenlanders begged the same favour from me, because they considered me as a prophet, whom they believed able to cure the sick in a supernatural manner."—ROSENMCLEER.

When they consulted a prophet, the eastern modes required a present; and they might think it was right rather to present him with enables than other things, because it frequently happened that they were detained there some time, waiting the answer of God, during which time hospitality would require the prophet to ask them to take some repast with him. And as the prophet would naturally treat them with some regard to their quality, they doubtless did then, as the Egyptians do now, proportion their presents to their avowed rank and number of attendants. The present of Jeroboam's wife was that of a woman in affluent circumstances, though it by no means determined her to be a princess. That made to the prophet Samuel, was the present of a person that expected to be treated like a man in low life; how great then must be his surprise, first to be treated with distinguished honour in a large company, and then to be anointed king over Israel!

But though this seems to have been the original ground of presenting common eatables to persons who were visited at their own houses, I would by no means be understood to affirm they have always kept to this, and presented eatables what they expected to stay with them and take some repast, and other things when they did not. Accuracy is not to be expected in such matters: the observation, however, naturally accounts for the rise of this sort of presents. In other cases, the presents that anciently were, and of late have wont to be made to personages eminent for study and piety, were large sums of money, or vestments: so the present that a Syrian nobleman would have made to an Israelitish prophet, with whom he did not expect to stay any time, or indeed to enter in his house, "Behold, I thought, He will certainly come out to me, and stand, and call on the name of the Lord his God, and strike his hand over the place, and recover the leper," consisted of ten talents of silver, and six thousand pieces of gold, and ten changes of raiment. It is needless to mention the pecuniary gratifications that have been given to men of learning in the East in later times; but as to vestments, D'Herbelot tells us, that Bokhteri, an illustrious poet of Cufah, in the ninth century, had so many presents made him in the course of his life, that at his death he was found possessed of a hundred complete suits of clothes, two hundred shirts, and five hundred turbans.—HARMER.

Ver. 9. So Naaman came with his horses and with his chariot, and stood at the door of the house of Elisha. 10. And Elisha sent a messenger unto him, saying, Go and wash in Jordan seven times, and thy flesh shall come again to thee, and thou shalt be clean.

Elisha's not appearing to receive the Syrian general, is ascribed by some to the retired course of life which the prophets led; but then, why did he see him, and enter into conversation with him, when he returned from his cure? I should rather think, that it was not misbecoming the prophet, upon this occasion, to take some state upon him, and to support the character and dignity of a prophet of the most high God; especially, since this might be a means to raise the honour of his religion and ministry, and to give Naaman a righter idea of his miraculous cure, when he found that it was neither by the prayer nor presence of the prophet, but by the divine power and goodness, that it was effected.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 18. In this thing the LORD pardon thy servant, that when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and he leaneth on my hand, and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon; when I bow down myself in the house of Rimmon, the LORD pardon thy servant in this thing.

It is amusing to see full-grown men, as they walk along the road, like schoolboys at home, leaning on each other's hands. Those who are weak, or sick, lean on another's shoulder. It is also a mark of friendship to lean on the shoulder of a companion.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 21. So Gehazi followed after Naaman. And when Naaman saw him running after him, he lighted down from the chariot to meet him, and said, Is all well?

The alighting of those that ride is considered in the East as an expression of deep respect; so Dr. Pococke tells us, that they are wont to descend from their asses in Egypt, when they come near some tombs there, and that Christians and Jews are obliged to submit to this. So Hasselquist tells Linæus, in one of his letters to him, that Christians were obliged to alight from their asses in Egypt, when they met with commanders of the soldiers there. This he complains of as a bitter indignity; out they that received the compliment, without doubt, required it as a most pleasing piece of respect. Achsah's and Abigail's alighting, were without doubt then intended as expressions of reverence: but it is to be imagined, that Naaman's alighting from his chariot, when Gehazi ran after him, arose from the same principle? If it did, there was a mighty change in this haughty Syrian after his cure. That he should pay such a reverence to a servant of the prophet must appear very surprising, yet we can hardly think the historian would have mentioned this circumstance so very distinctly in any other view. Rebecca's alighting from the camel on which she rode, when Isaac came to meet her, is by no means any proof that the considering this as an expression of reverence, is a modern thing in the East; it, on the contrary, strongly reminds one of D'Arvieux's account of a bride's throwing herself at the feet of the bridegroom when solemnly presented to him, which obtains among the Arabs.

We met a Turk, says Dr. Richard Chandler, in his Asiatic travels, "a person of distinction, as appeared from his turban. He was on horseback with a single attendant. Our janizary and Armenians respectfully alighted, and made him a profound obeisance, the former kissing the rim of his garment." So Niebuhr tells us, that at Kabira, Grand Cairo, "the Jews and Christians, who, it may be, alighted at first through fear or respect, when a Mohammedan with a great train on horseback met them, are now obliged to pay this compliment to above thirty of the principal people of that city. When these appear in public, they always cause a domestic to go before to give notice to the Jews and Greeks, and even the Europeans that they meet with, to get off their asses as soon as possible, and they are qualified on occasion to force them with a great club, which they always carry in their hands."—HARMER.

Ver. 21. So Gehazi followed after Naaman: and when Naaman saw him running after him, he lighted down from the chariot to meet him, and said, Is all well? [Heb. margin, Is there peace?] 22. And he said, All is well.

I never read this passage without fancying a Malabar man running after the chariot, and on being met by Naaman, making a most profound bow, and uttering the word selam, peace—the word used on this occasion, and still in use among millions in the East.—CALLAWAY.

Ver. 27. The leprosy therefore of Naaman shall cleave unto thee, and unto thy seed for ever. And he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow.

This was said by Elisha to Gehazi, because he ran after Naaman, (who had been cured of his leprosy) and said, his master had sent him to take "a talent of silver, and two changes of garments," and because he actually took possession of them. There is an account in the Hindoo book, called Seytku-Purana, of a leper who went to Ramiseram to bathe, in order to be cured of his complaint. He performed the required ceremonies, but the priests refused his offerings. At last a Bramin came: in the moment of temptation he took the money, and immediately the leprosy of the pilgrim took possession of his body! This complaint is believed to come in consequence of great sin, and therefore no one likes to receive any reward or present from a person infected with leprosy.

There are many children born white, though their parents are quite black. These are not lepers, but albinos; and are the same as the white negroes of Africa. To see a man of that kind almost naked, and walking among the natives, has an unpleasant effect on the mind, and leads a person to suspect that all has not been right. Their skin has generally a slight tinge of red, their hair is light, their eyes are weak; and when they walk in the sun, they hang down their heads. The natives do not consider this a disease, but a muru, i. e. produced by the sins of a former birth. It is believed to be a great misfortune to have a child of that description, and there is reason to believe that many of them are destroyed. The parents of such an infant believe ruin will come to their family; and the poor object, if spared, has generally a miserable existence. His name, in Tamul, is Pandan: and this is an epithet assigned to those, also, who are not white, for the purpose of making them angry. The general name for Europeans in the East is Pranky, (which is a corruption of the word Frank.) Hence these white Hindoos are, by way of contempt, called Pranky! Should a man who is going to transact important business, meet one of them on the road, it will be considered a very bad sign, and he will not enter into the transaction till another day. Should a person who is giving a feast have a relation of that description, he will in vie him, but the guests will not look upon him with pleasure. Women have a great aversion to them, and yet they sometimes marry them; and if they have children, they seldom take after the father. I have only heard of two white Hindoo females; which leads me to suspect that such infants are generally destroyed at the birth; as, were they allowed to grow up, no one would marry them.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 12. And one of his servants said, None, my lord, O king; but Elisha, the prophet that is in Israel, telleth the king of Israel the words that thou speakest in thy bedchamber.

It is not to be doubted, but that Naaman, upon his return from Samaria, spread the fame of Elisha so much in the court of Syria, that some of the great men there might have a curiosity to make a further inquiry concerning him; and being informed by several of his miraculous works, they might thence conclude that he could tell the greatest secrets, as well as perform such works as were related of him; and that therefore, in all probability, he was the person who gave the king of Israel intelligence of all the schemes that had been attempted to entrap him.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 15. And when the servant of the man of God was risen early, and gone forth, behold, a host compassed the city, both with horses and chariots. And his servant said unto him, Alas, my master! how shall we do? 16. And he answered, Fear not; for they that be with us are more than they that be with them. 17. And Elisha prayed, and said, LORD, I pray thee, open his eyes, that he may see. And the LORD opened the eyes of the young man: and he saw, and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha.

This young man, it is supposable, had been but a little while with his master, no longer than since Gehazi's dismissal, and therefore perhaps had not yet seen any great experiments of his power to work miracles; or if he had, the great and imminent danger he thought his master in, (for in all probability he had learned from the people of the town, that this vast body of men were come to apprehend him only,) might well be allowed to raise his fear, and shake his faith.

It must be allowed that angels, whether they be purely spiritual, or (as others think) clothed with some material form, cannot be seen by mortal eyes; and therefore as Elisha himself, without a peculiar vouchsafement of God, could not discern the heavenly host, which, at this time, encamped about him; so he requests of God, that, for the removal of his fears, and the confirmation of his faith, his servant might be indulged the same privilege: nor does it seem unlikely, that, from such accounts as these, that have descended by tradition, that notion among the Greeks, of a certain mist, which intercepts the sight of their gods from the ken of human eyes, might at first borrow its original.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 25. And there was a great famine in Samaria: and, behold, they besieged it, until an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of doves' dung for five pieces of silver.

The Tamul translation for "doves' dung," is "doves' grain:" which is known in the East by the name of Karamanne-piru. Dr. Boothroyd translates it "a cab of vetches," which amounts to about the same thing. Bochart, Dr. Clarke, and many others, believe it to have been pulse. The Orientals are exceeding fond of eating leguminous grains, when parched. I have often eaten the pulse which pigeons are so fond of, and have found it very wholesome, either in puddings or soup; (Lev. xx ii. 14, Ruth ii. 14, 2 Sam. xvii. 28;) and it is surprising to see what a great distance they will travel on only that food and water. It was therefore in consequence of the famine, that this, their favourite, and generally very cheap, sustenance, was so dear. Of what use would "a cab of doves' dung" be unto them? Some say, in explanation, it was good for manure! What were they to live upon till the manure had produced the grain?—ROBERTS.

Among the Jews, the ass was considered as an unclean animal, because it neither divides the hoof nor chews the cud. It could neither be used as food, nor offered in sacrifice. The firstling of an ass, like those of camels, horses, and other unclean animals, was to be redeemed with the sacrifice of a lamb, or deprived of life. In cases of extreme want, however, this law was disregarded; for when the Syrian armies besieged Samaria, the inhabitants were so reduced, that "an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver." Some writers, however, contend, that the term amor does not signify an ass, in this passage, but is the same as homer, a certain measure of grain. But this view of the passage cannot be admitted. We know what is meant by the head of an ass; but the head of a homer, or measure of wheat or barley, is quite unintelligible. Nor could the sacred writer say with propriety, that the city was suffering by a "great famine," while a homer of grain was sold for eighty pieces of silver; for in the next chapter he informs us, that, after the flight of the Syrians, and provisions of every kind, by the sudden return of plenty, were reduced to the lowest price, "a measure of fine flour (which is the thirtieth part of a homer) was sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, in the gate of Samaria." Besides, had the historian intended a measure of corn, he would not have said indefinitely, a homer was sold for eighty pieces of silver; but a homer of wheat, or of barley, or of oats, which are not of the same value. The prophet accordingly says, in the beginning of the next chapter, "a measure of fine flour shall be sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel:" And John, in the book of Revelation; "a measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny." Our translators, therefore, have taken a just view of this text, and given a correct version. It is reasonable to suppose, that the ass was not the last to suffer in the siege of Samaria. Hardly treated in times of peace and abundance, he must have been left to shift for himself in such circumstances, in a place where the hunger of the inhabitants compelled them to devour every green thing; and have rapidly sunk into a poor and wretched condition. How great must that famine have been, and how dreadful the distress to which the people were reduced, when they gave three times the price of the live animal, for that part of him which could yield them at any time only a few pounds of dry and unpalatable food, but when emaciated by famine, only a few morsels of carrion. Extreme must have been the sufferings which extinguished the powerful influence of religious principle, and natural aversion to a species of food so disagreeable and pernicious; and not only prevailed upon them to use it, but even to devour it with greediness.—PAXTON.

The royal city of Samaria was so severely distressed, when a certain king of Syria besieged it, that we are told an ass's head then sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of doves' dung for five pieces: this last article has been thought to be so unfit for food, that it has been very commonly imagined, I think, that a species of pulse was meant by that term; nevertheless, I cannot but think it much the most probable, that proper doves' dung was meant by the prophetic historian, since, though it can hardly be imagined, it was bought directly for food, it might be bought for the purpose of more speedily raising a supply of certain esculent vegetables, and in greater quantities, which must have been a matter of great consequence to the Israelites, shut up so straitly in Samaria. Had the kali of the scriptures been meant, how came it to pass that the common word was not made use of? Josephus and the Septuagint suppose that proper doves' dung was meant, and the following considerations may make their sentiment appear far from improbable.

All allow that melons are a most refreshing food, in those hot countries. And Chardin says, "melons are served up at the tables of the luxurious almost all the year; but the proper season lasts four months, at which time they are eaten by the common people. They hardly eat any thing but melons and cucumbers at that time." He adds, "that during these four melon months, they are brought in such quantities to Ispahan, that he believed more were eaten in that city in one day, than in all France in a month." On the other hand, he tells us, in another volume, that they have a multitude of dove-houses in Persia, which they keep up more for their dung than any thing else. This being the substance with which they manure their melon-beds, and which makes them so good and so large. Now if melons were half so much in request in those days in Judea, as they are now in Persia, it might be natural enough to express the great scarcity of provisions there, by observing an ass's head, which, according to their law was an unclean animal, sold for fourscore pieces of silver; and a small quantity of that dung that was most useful to quicken vegetation, as well as to increase those productions of the earth which were so desirable in those hot climates, that a small quantity, I say, of that substance should, in such circumstances, be sold for five such pieces. At least it is probable thus the Septuagint and Josephus understood the passage, if we should think it incredible that melons were in very common use in the days of Joram king of Israel. Josephus, in particular, says this dung was purchased for its salt, which can hardly mean to be used, by means of some preparation, as table salt, but as containing salt proper for manuring the earth. The prophet Elisha, in that very age, put salt into a spring of water, to express the imparting to it the quality of making the land watered by it fruitful, which land had been before barren, (2 Kings ii. 19—22,) to which event Josephus could be no stranger. It has been objected to this interpretation: that if the doves' dung was for manure, (for this interpretation is not a new one, but wanted to be better illustrated,) that there could be no room for growing any kind of vegetable food within the walls of a royal city, when besieged; but has any one a right to take this for granted? when it is known that there is a good deal of ground unbuild upon now in the royal cities of the East; that Naboth had a vineyard in Jezreel, a place of royal residence a few years before; that Samaria was a new-built city; and that in the time of distress, every void place might naturally be made use of to raise a species of food, that with due cultivation, in our climate, is brought to perfection, from the time of its sowing, in four months, and at the same time is highly refreshing. When we reflect on these things, the supposition appears not at all improbable. We do not know when the siege commenced, or how long it continued; that of Jerusalem, in the time of Zedekiah, lasted a year and a half; but the time that this dung was purchased at so dear a rate, we may believe was early in the spring, for then they begin to raise melons at Aleppo, and as they were then so oppressed with want, it is probable that it was not long after that they were delivered.

This explanation will appear less improbable, if we recollect the account already given, of the siege of Damietta, where some of the more delicate Egyptians pined to death, according to Vitruvius, though they had a sufficiency of corn, for the want of the food they were used to, pumpions, &c. The Israelites might be willing then, had their stores been more abundant than they were found to have been, to add what they could to them, and especially of such grateful vegetables as melons, and such like.—HARVEY.

Formerly great attention was paid to the nurturing and rearing of these birds, (pigeons,) their dung bringing in a yearly income, from the produce of one pigeon-house alone, of nearly two hundred tomanas. Among other uses to which the small remains of this manure is applied, it is laid on the melon-beds of Ispahan; and hence the great reputation of the melon of that district for its unequalled flavour. Another use of the dung in older times was to extract saltpetre, for the purpose of making gunpowder; which, two centuries ago, had only been just put into the Persian list of warlike ammunition.—SIR R. K. PORTER.

The dung of pigeons is the dearest manure that the Persians use: and as they apply it almost entirely for the rearing of melons, it is probably on that account that the melons of Ispahan are so much finer than those of other cities. The revenue of a pigeon-house is about a hundred tomanas per annum; and the great value of this dung, which rears a fruit that is indispensable to the existence of the natives during the great heats of summer, will probably throw some light upon that passage in scripture, where, in the famine of Samaria, the fourth part of a cab of doves' dung was sold for five pieces of silver.—MORIER.

Ver. 32. But Elisha sat in his house, and the elders sat with him: and the king sent a man from before him: but ere the messenger came to him, he said to the elders, See ye how this son of a murderer hath sent to take away my head? look, when the messenger cometh, shut the door, and hold him fast at the door: is not the sound of his master's feet behind him?

See on Prov. 16. 14.

This form of speech is used to denote the rapid approach of a person. When boys at school are making a great noise, or doing any thing which they ought not, some one will say, "I hear the sound of the master's feet." Are people preparing triumphal arches, (made of leaves,) or cleaning the rest-house of a great man, some of them keep saying, "Quick, quick, I hear the sound of his feet." "Alas, alas! how long you have been! do we not hear even the sound of the judge's feet?"—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 10. So they came, and called unto the porter of the city; and they told them, saying, We came to the camp of the Syrians, and, behold, there was no man there, neither voice of man, but horses tied, and asses tied, and the tents as they were.

From the circumstances recorded concerning the flight of the Syrians, it appears to have been remarkably precipitate. That they were not altogether unprepared for a hasty departure may be inferred from comparing this passage with the following extract (from Memoirs relative to Egypt, p. 300.) "As soon as the Arabs are apprehensive of an attack, they separate into several small camps, at a great distance from each other, and tie their camels to the tents, so as to be able to move off at a moment's notice." Such a precaution is not probably peculiar to the modern Arabs, but might be adopted by the Syrian army. If this was the case, it shows with what great fear God filled their minds, that though prepared as usual for a quick march, they were not able to avail themselves of the advantage, but were constrained to leave every thing behind them as a prey to their enemies.—BURDER.

Ver. 12. And the king arose in the night, and said unto his servants, I will now show you what the Syrians have done to us: They know that we be hungry, therefore are they gone out of the camp to hide themselves in the field, saying, When they come out of the city, we shall catch them alive, and get into the city.

In the history of the revolt of Ali Bey, we have an account of a transaction very similar to the stratagem supposed to have been practised by the Syrians. The pacha of Damascus having approached the Sea of Tiberias, found Sheik Daher encamped there; but the sheik deferring the engagement till the next morning, during the night divided his army into three parts, and left the camp with great fires blazing, all sorts of provisions, and a large quantity of spirituous liquors, giving strict orders not to hinder the enemy from taking possession of the camp, but to come down and attack just before the dawn of day. In the middle of the night, the pacha thought to surprise Sheik Daher, and marched in silence to the camp, which, to his great astonishment, he found entirely abandoned; and imagined the sheik had fled with so much precipitation, that he could not carry off the baggage and stores. The pacha thought proper to stop in the camp and refresh his soldiers. They soon fell to plunder, and drank so freely of the liquors, that, overcome with the fatigue of the day's march, and the fumes of the spirits, they were not long ere they sunk into a profound sleep. At that time two sheiks, who were watching the enemy, came silently to the camp, and Daher having repassed the Sea of Tiberias, meeting them, they all rushed into the camp, and fell upon the sleeping foe, eight thousand of whom they butchered on the spot; and the pacha, with the remainder of the troops, escaped with much difficulty to Damascus, leaving all their baggage in the hands of the victorious Daher.—PAXTON.

Ver. 15. And they went after them unto Jordan; and, lo, all the way was full of garments and vessels, which the Syrians had cast away in their haste: and the messengers returned, and told the king.

The flight of the Syrians, in the reign of Jehoram, king of Israel, was produced by a panic, which so completely unmanned them, that, says the sacred historian, "all the way was full of garments and vessels, which the Syrians had cast away in their haste." The flight of Saladin's army, which was defeated by Baldwin IV. near Gaza, in the time of the crusades, was marked with similar circumstances of consternation and terror. To flee with greater expedition, they threw away their arms and clothes, their coats of mail, their greaves, and other pieces of armour, and abandoned their baggage, and fled from their pursuers, almost in a state of complete nudity.—PAXTON.

Ver. 18. And it came to pass, as the man of God had spoken to the king, saying, Two measures of barley for a shekel, and a measure of fine flour for a shekel, shall be to-morrow, about this time, in the gate of Samaria.

In our rides we usually went out of town at the Derwazeh Shah Abdul Azeem, or the gate leading to the village of Shah Abdul Azeem, where a market was held every morning, particularly of horses, mules, asses, and camels. At about sunrise, the owners of the animals assemble and exhibit them for sale. But, besides, here were sellers of all sorts of goods, in temporary shops and tents; and this, perhaps, will explain the custom alluded to in 2 Kings vii. 18, of the sale of barley and flour in the gate of Samaria. (Morier.)—BURDER.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 9. So Hazael went to meet him, and took a present with him, even of every good thing of Damascus, forty camels' burden, and came and stood before him, and said, Thy son Ben-hadad, king of Syria, hath sent me to thee, saying, Shall I recover of this disease?

See on Gen. 43. 25.

These animals, when not loaded beyond their strength, submit with great patience. "When they are to be loaded, they bend their knees at the voice of their driver: but if they delay doing so, they are struck with a stick, or their knees forced downward, and then, as if constrained and groaning after their way, they bend their knees, put their bellies against the ground, and remain in that posture till, after having been loaded, they are commanded to rise."—BURDER.

The Syrian prince, on this occasion, in which he felt a particular interest, no doubt sent Elisha a present corresponding with his rank and magnificence; but it can scarcely be supposed that so many camels were required to carry it, or that the king would send, as a Jewish writer supposes he did, so great a quantity of provisions to one man. The meaning of this passage certainly is, that the various articles of which the present consisted, according to the modern custom of oriental courts, were carried on a number of camels for the sake of state, and that not fewer than forty were employed in the cavalcade. That these camels were not fully laden, must be evident from this, that the common load of a Turkman's camel is eight hundred pounds weight; and consequently, thirty-two thousand pounds weight is the proper loading of forty camels; "if they were only of the Arab breed, twenty thousand pounds weight was their proper loading;" a present, as Mr. Harmer justly remarks, too enormous to be sent by any one person to another.—PAXTON.

Ver. 12. And Hazael said, Why weepeth my lord? And he answered, Because I know the evil that thou wilt do unto the children of Israel: their strongholds wilt thou set on fire, and their young men wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt dash their children, and rip up their women with child.

This piece of cruelty has in some instances been practised on men. "Soon after Djezer bought the Pashalik of Damascus, coming to gather the tribute of Jerusalem and the neighbourhood, he pitched his camp at the village of Yenio, overlooking the plain of Esdraelon. An Arab woman came to complain to him that one of his soldiers had drank her milk, and refused to pay her. He went always armed with a sabre, yatagan, and pistols, which, when he ate, lay by his side. Taking up his yatagan, 'Follow me,' he said, 'and point out the man.' She did so, and he bade her be sure, as a mistake would cost her her life. Having asked the soldier if the accusation were true, and he denying it, he ripped him up, and the milk immediately poured out of his bleeding stomach. Seeing thus that the woman was right, he gave her two sequins, and sent her away. The soldier he left dead on the ground." (Turner.) The same piece of cruelty was practised by Timour. It is said that Mohammed the Second ripped up fourteen of his pages to find a melon.—BURDER.

Ver. 15. And it came to pass on the morrow, that he took a thick cloth, and dipped it in water, and spread it on his face, so that he died; and Hazael reigned in his stead.

An English proverb says, "Give a dog an ill name, and it will hang him;" much in the spirit of this proverb has been the general treatment of the character of Hazael, who, because he calls himself "a dog," has been treated with great indignity. Certainly, Hazael can be no favourite character with any upright mind; yet perhaps it is but justice to suggest what may render his murder of his master, King Benhadad, by means of a cloth dipped in water, at least dubious, without calling it well-intended in his part. In reading the history (2 Kings viii. 15.) it is nothing less than natural to suppose, that Hazael must have had, professedly at least, some fair pretence, some appearance of propriety in the action; or why did not those in attendance on their sovereign prevent his proceedings? Was Hazael the only person present, or in waiting on the sick king? It is by no means likely; in fact, it is scarcely supposable; but if we conceive that Hazael offered to the king either a kind of remedy usual in the disorder, which nevertheless failed to cure him; or an assistance, of which he took advantage to murder his master; then we reduce his behaviour to plausibility, and to the custom of the country in such diseases. Observe also, the text does not say expressly he did kill him; but "he took a thick cloth, and dipped it in water, and spread it over the king's face, (or person), and he died." It is usually said, he was chilled to death; but on reading the following extracts, we shall probably admit that this is an English notion, resulting from our climate and manners, &c. applied to an eastern disease, and to a country wherein both climate and manners are essentially different. If it be said Hazael stifled the king by means of the cloth spread over his face, it might be so; but we should do well to remark, that the easterns are accustomed to sleep with their faces covered; that Hazael hardly spread it over the king's face only: that it does not appear the king was asleep; he might therefore have removed the cloth, had he thought proper; and that whatever the cloth was, it was certainly employed, and the whole action was managed, in a way to prevent suspicion. Let us now hear Mr. Bruce:

"This fever prevailed in Abyssinia in all low grounds and plains, in the neighbourhood of all rivers which run in valleys; it is really a malignant tertian, which, however, has so many forms and modes of intermission, that it is impossible for one not of the faculty to describe it. It is not in all places equally dangerous; but on the banks and neighbourhood of Tacazze, it is particularly fatal. The valley where the river runs is very low and sultry, being full of large trees. It does not prevail in high grounds or mountains, or in places much exposed to the air. This fever is called NEBAD, or burning; it begins always with a shivering and headache, a heavy eye, and an inclination to vomit.

a violent heat follows, which leaves little intermission, and ends generally in death the third or fifth day. In the last stage of the distemper, the belly swells to an enormous size, or sometimes immediately after death, and the body, within an instant, smells most insupportably; to prevent which, they bury the corpse immediately after the breath is out, and often within the hour. The face has a remarkable yellow appearance, with a blackish cast, as in the last stage of a dropsy, or the atrophy. This fever begins immediately with the sunshine after the first rains; that is, while there are intervals of rain and sunshine; it ceases upon the earth being thoroughly soaked, in July and August, and begins again in September; but now, at the beginning of November, it ceases everywhere. Masnah is very unwholesome, as, indeed, is the whole coast of the Red Sea, from Suez to Babelmandel; but more especially between the tropics. Violent fevers, called there nedan, make the principal figure in this fatal list, and generally determine the third day in death. If the patient survives till the fifth day, he very often recovers, by drinking water only, and throwing a quantity of cold water upon him, even in his bed, where he is permitted to lie, without attempting to make him dry, or to change his bed, till another deluge adds to the first." (Bruce's Travels, vol. iii. p. 33.

Do not these extracts render it, in some degree, probable, that Hazael, besides the thick cloth soaked in water, added other chilling remedies? in doing which he did no more than is customary in this disease, the nedad; and, if this kind of fever, or one allied to it, were Benhadad's disease, Hazael might honestly spread a refreshing covering over him. Not expecting his exaltation to royalty so instantaneously, he might be loyal as yet, though his ambition soon found opportunity to be otherwise. The circumstances of the rapid approaches of death, and of immediate burial after death, seem very favourable to Hazael's instantly seating himself on the throne: especially if Benhadad had no son, &c. of proper age to be his successor.—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 2. And when thou comest thither, look out there Jehu the son of Jehoshaphat, the son of Nimshi, and go in, and make him arise up from among his brethren, and carry him to an inner chamber: 3. Then take the box of oil, and pour it on his head, and say, Thus saith the LORD, I have anointed thee king over Israel. Then open the door, and flee, and tarry not.

The fortified cities in Canaan, as in some other countries, were commonly strengthened with a citadel, to which the inhabitants fled when they found it impossible to defend the place. The whole inhabitants of Thebes, unable to resist the repeated and furious assaults of Abimelech, retired into one of those towers, and bid defiance to his rage: "But there was a strong tower within the city, and thither fled all the men and women, and all they of the city, and shut it to them, and gat them up to the top of the tower." The extraordinary strength of this tower, and the various means of defence which were accumulated within its narrow walls, may be inferred from the violence of Abimelech's attack, and its fatal issue: "And Abimelech came unto the tower, and fought against it, and went hard unto the door of the tower, to burn it with fire. And a certain woman cast a piece of a millstone upon Abimelech's head, and all to break his skull." The city of Shechem had a tower of the same kind, into which the people retired, when the same usurper took it, and sowed it with salt. These strong towers which were built within a fortified city, were commonly placed on an eminence, to which they ascended by a flight of steps. Such was the situation of the city of David, a strong tower, upon a high eminence at Jerusalem; and the manner of entrance, as described by the sacred writer: "But the gate of the fountain repaired Shallum, unto the stairs that go down from the city of David." It is extremely probable, that Ramoth Gilead, a frontier town belonging to the ten tribes, and in the time of Jehu in their possession, was strengthened by one of these inner towers, built on an eminence, with an approach of this nature. If this conjecture be well founded, it throws light upon a very obscure passage, where the manner in which Jehu was proclaimed king of Israel, is described. His associates were no sooner informed that the prophet had anointed him king over the ten tribes, than "they hastened and took every man his garment, and put it under him on the top of the stairs, and blew with trumpets, saying, Jehu is king." Hence the stairs were not those within the tower, by which they ascended to the top; but those by which they ascended the hill, or rising ground on which the tower stood; the top of the stair will then mean the landing-place in the area before the door of the tower, and by consequence the most public place in the whole city. As it was the custom of those days to inaugurate and proclaim their kings in the most public places, no spot can be imagined more proper for such a ceremony, than the top of the steps, that is, the most elevated part of the hill, upon which stood the castle of Ramoth Gilead, in the court of which, numbers of people might be assembled, waiting the result of a council of war which was sitting at the time, deliberating on the best method of defending the city against the Syrians, in the absence of their sovereign.—PAXTON.

Ver. 10. And the dogs shall eat Jezebel in the portion of Jezreel, and there shall be none to bury her. And he opened the door and fled.

The Abbe Poirer, in his travels through Barbary, tells us, that the severest punishment among the Arabs is to be cut to pieces and thrown to the dogs. "After this the queen of Mira, concerning whom so many surprising stories had been told of her poisoning the water by drugs and enchantments, was, notwithstanding the known partiality of this king for the fair sex, ordered to be hewn in pieces by the soldiers, and her body given to the dogs." (Bruce.)—BURDER.

Ver. 13. Then they hastened, and took every man his garment, and put it under him on the top of the stairs, and blew with trumpets, saying, Jehu is king.

They laid down their garments instead of carpets. "The use of carpets was common in the East in the remoter ages. The kings of Persia always walked upon carpets in their palaces. Xenophon reproaches the degenerate Persians of his time, that they placed their couches upon carpets, to repose more at their ease. The spreading of garments in the street before persons to whom it was intended to show particular honour, was an ancient and very general custom. Thus the people spread their clothes in the way before our Saviour, Matthew xxi. 8, where some also strewed branches. In the Agamemnon of Æschylus, the hypocritical Clytemnestra commands the maids to spread out carpets before her returning husband, that, on descending from his chariot, he may place his foot on a "purple-covered path." We also find this custom among the Romans. When Cato of Utica left the Macedonian army, where he had become legationary tribute, the soldiers spread their clothes in the way. (Plutarch's Life of Cato.) The hanging out of carpets, and strewing of flowers and branches, in solemn processions, among us, is a remnant of the ancient custom.—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 28. And his servants carried him in a chariot to Jerusalem, and buried him in his sepulchre with his fathers in the city of David.

What does this funeral chariot, which was carried by men, mean? What we may see in the vicinity of a large town every day of our lives. This chariot, or handek, (as it is called in Tamul,) is about six feet long, three feet broad, and in the centre about four feet in height. The shape is various, and the following is more common than any other. The drapery is of white, or scarlet cloth; and the whole is covered with garlands of flowers. The servants then carry it on their shoulders to the place of sepulture, or burning.—ROBERTS. (See Engraving.)

Ver. 30. And when Jehu was come to Jezreel, Jezebel heard of it; and she painted her face, and tired her head, and looked out at a window.

31. And as Jehu entered in at the gate, she said, Hail Zimri pence, who slew his master?

32. And he lifted up his face to the window, and said, Who is on my side? who? And there looked out to him two or three eunuchs.

33. And he said, Throw her down.

She stained her eyes with stibium or antimony. This is a custom in Asiatic countries to the present day. "The Persians differ as much from us in their notions of beauty as they do in those of taste. A large, soft, and languishing black eye, with them, constitutes the perfection of beauty. It is chiefly on this account that the women use the powder of antimony, which, although it adds to the vivacity of the eye, throws a kind of voluptuous languor over it, which makes it appear, if I may use the expression, dissolving in bliss. The Persian women have a curious custom of making their eyebrows meet; and if this charm be denied them, they paint the forehead with a kind of preparation made for that purpose." (E. S. Waring's Tour to Sheeraz).—BURDER.

In the evening we accompanied them on shore, and took some coffee in the house of the consul, where we were introduced to the ladies of his family. We were amused by seeing his wife, a very beautiful woman, sitting cross-legged by us upon the divan of his apartment, and smoking tobacco with a pipe six feet in length; her eyelashes, as well as those of all the other women, were tinged with a black powder made of the sulphuret of antimony, and having by no means a cleanly appearance, although considered as essential an addition to the decorations of a woman of rank in Syria, as her ear-rings, or the golden circlets of her ankles. Dark streaks were also pencilled, from the corners of her eyes, along the temples. This curious practice instantly brought to our recollections certain passages of scripture, wherein mention is made of a custom among oriental women of "putting the eyes in painting;" and which our English translators of the Bible, unable to reconcile with their notions of a female toilet, have rendered "painting the face."—CLAREE.

The court of eastern houses is for the most part surrounded with a cloister, over which, when the house has a number of stories, a gallery is erected of the same dimensions with the cloister, having a balustrade, or else a piece of carved or latticed work, going round about, to prevent people from falling from it into the court. The doors of the enclosure round the house, as already mentioned, are made very small, to defend the family from the insolence and rapacity of Arabian plunderers; but the doors of the houses very large, for the purpose of admitting a copious stream of fresh air into their apartments. The windows which look in the street, are very high and narrow, and defended by lattice-work; as they are only intended to allow the cloistered inmate a peep of what is passing without, while she remains concealed behind the casement. This kind of window the ancient Hebrews called Arubah, and is the same term which they used to express those small openings, through which pigeons passed into the cavities of the rocks, or into those buildings which were raised for their reception. Thus the prophet demands: "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves (אֲרֻבֹתֶיךָ) el arubothchem, to their small or narrow windows." The word is derived from a root which signifies to lie in wait for the prey; and is very expressive of the concealed manner in which a person examines, through that kind of window, an external object. Irwin describes the windows in upper Egypt, as having the same form and dimensions; and says expressly, that one of the windows of the houses in which they lodged, and through which they looked into the street, more resembled a pigeon-hole, than any thing else. But the sacred writers mention another kind of window, which was large and airy; it was called (חַלּוֹן) halon, and was large enough to admit a person of mature age being cast out of it; a punishment which that profligate woman Jezebel suffered by the command of Jehu, the authorized exterminator of her family.—PAXTON.

Dr. Shaw, after having observed that the jealousy of the people there admits only of one small latticed window into the street, the rest opening into their own courts, says, "It is during the celebration only of some zena, as they call a public festival, that these houses and their latticed windows or balconies are left open. For this being a time of great liberty, revelling, and extravagance, each family is ambitious of adorning both the inside and outside of the houses with their richest furniture, while crowds of both sexes, dressed out in their best apparel, and laying aside all modesty and restraint, go in and out where they please. The account we have, 2 Kings ix. 30, of Jezebel's painting her face, and tiring her head, and looking out at a window, upon Jehu's public entrance into Jezreel, gives us a lively idea of an eastern lady at one of these zenas or solemnities."—HARMER.

Ver. 33. And he said, Throw her down. So they threw her down: and some of her blood was sprinkled on the wall, and on the horses: and he trode her under foot.

While the above particulars were relating, it was a shuddering glance that looked down from the open side of the Keikhoda's saloon, on almost the very spot where the unhappy victims had breathed their last. It recalled to my remembrance a similar window, for similar purposes, at Erivan, where the governor of that place used to dispose of his malefactors the moment sentence was pronounced. And while listening to the hideous details of a sort of punishment so common in the East, I could not but recall similar descriptions in ancient writers on these countries, which showed how old had been the practice of taking offenders to a height, and casting them headlong, sometimes from a rock, at others, from high battlements, and often from a window which commanded a sufficient steep. We have a dreadful picture of this most tremendous mode of punishment in the second book of Kings.—SIR R. K. PORTER.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1. And Ahab had seventy sons in Samaria.

To those who are unaccustomed to the effects of polygamy and concubinage, this appears a very remarkable circumstance. In Homer, old King Priam is represented as having fifty sons and twelve daughters. Artaxerxes Mneumon, king of Persia, had, by his concubines, who amounted to three hundred and sixty, not less than one hundred and fifteen sons, besides three by his queen. "Muley Abdallah, who was emperor of Morocco in 1720, is said, by his four wives, and the many thousand women he had in his seraglio during his long reign, to have had seven hundred sons, able to mount a horse; but the number of his daughters is not known." (Stewart's Journey to Mequinez).—BURDER.

Ver. 6. Then he wrote a letter the second time to them, saying, If ye be mine, and if ye will hearken unto my voice, take ye the heads of the men your master's sons, and come to me to Jezreel by to-morrow this time. (Now the king's sons, being seventy persons, were with the great men of the city, which brought them up.)

The rich hire a dodeh, or wet-nurse, for their children. If a boy, the father appoints a steady man, from the age of two years, to be his laleh, who, I conjecture, must stand in the same capacity as the bringers-up of children mentioned in the catastrophe of Ahab's sons. But if it be a daughter, she has a gees sefed, or white head, attached to her for the same purpose as the laleh. (Morier).—BURDER.

Ver. 8. And there came a messenger, and told him, saying, They have brought the heads of the king's sons. And he said, Lay ye them in two heaps at the entering in of the gate until the morning.

During this fight, ten tomans were given for every head of the enemy that was brought to the prince: and it har been known to occur, after the combat was over, that prisoners have been put to death in cold blood, in order that the heads, which are immediately despatched to the king, and deposited in heaps at the palace-gate, might make a more considerable show.—MORIER.

Arrived at the palace of the pacha, inhabited by the dey, the first object that struck our eyes were six bleeding heads, ranged along before the entrance; and as if this dreadful sight were not sufficient of itself to harrow up the soul, it was still further aggravated by the necessity of stepping over them, in order to pass into the court. They were the heads of some turbulent agas, who had dared to murmur against the dey. (Panaudi's Narrative of a Residence in Algiers.) "The pacha of Diarbeck has sent to Constantinople a circumstantial report of his expedition against the rebels of Mardin. This report has been accompanied by a thousand heads, severed from the vanquished. These sanguinary trophies have been exposed, as usual, at the gate of the seraglio. The Tartar who brought them has obtained a pelisse of honour; presents have also been sent to the pacha." (Literary Panorama, vol. ix. p. 289.) A pyramid of heads, of a certain number of feet diameter, is sometimes erected in Persia; and so indifferent are the executioners to the distresses of others, that they will select a head of peculiar appearance, and long beard, to grace the summit of it. Sir J. Malcolm says, that "when Timour stormed Ispahan, it was impossible to count the slain, but an account was taken of seventy thousand heads, which were heaped in pyramids, as monuments of savage revenge." "Three weeks before our arrival at Cattaro, they (the Montenegrines) had some skirmishes with the Turks, and had brought home several of their heads, which were added to the heap before the bishop's house." (Dodwell's Tour through Greece).—BURDER.

Ver. 12. And he arose and departed, and came to Samaria. And as he was at the shearing-house in the way, 13. Jehu met with the brethren of Ahaziah, king of Judah, and said, Who are ye? And they answered, We are the brethren of Ahaziah; and we go down to salute the children of the king, and the children of the queen. 14. And he said, Take them alive. And they took them alive, and slew them at the pit of the shearing-house, even two and forty men: neither left he any of them.

Our translators suppose, that the edifice at which Jehu slew the brethren of Ahaziah, king of Judah, was destined to the sole purpose of shearing of sheep; but as I apprehend, the term in the original is ambiguous, which is accordingly literally translated in the margin, the house of shepherd's binding; it might be better to use some less determinate word; as the word, I am ready to believe, may signify the binding sheep for shearing, the binding up their fleeces, after those fleeces taken from the sheep beforehand were washed; or the binding the sheep for the purpose of milking. Whether it was erected for all three purposes, or if only for one of them, then for which of the three, it may be very difficult precisely to say. A pit near such a building must be useful in any of the three cases, for the affording water for the sheep that were detained there for some time, in the first and third case, to drink; and for the washing the wool in the other. If the intention of the historian had been to describe it as the place appropriated to the shearing of sheep, it would have been natural for him to have used the word that precisely expresses that operation, not such a general term as the house of binding. All know that sheep must be bound, or at least forcibly held, in order to be shorn; and it appears in the Travels of Dr. Richard Chandler in the Lesser Asia, that "the shepherds there, sitting at the mouth of the pen, were wont to seize on the ewes and she-goats, each by the hind leg, as they pressed forward, to milk them," which seizing them, sufficiently shows they must be held, shackled, or somehow bound, when milked.

In another observation I have taken notice of the readiness of great men, in the East, to repose themselves, when fatigued, under the shelter of roofs of a very mean kind; the brethren, it seems, of Ahaziah anciently did the same thing. But they found no more safety in this obscure rereat, than they would have found in the palaces of either Samaria or Jezreel. The slaying them at the pit, near this place, seems to have been owing to a custom at that time, whether arising from superstition, to preserve the land from being defiled, or any other notion, does not at first sight appear; but it was, it seems, a customary thing at that time to put people to death near water, at least near where water was soon expected to flow, as appears from 1 Kings xviii. 40.—HARMER.

Ver. 15. And when he was departed thence, he lighted on Jehonadab the son of Rechab, coming to meet him: and he saluted him, and said to him, Is thy heart right, as my heart is with thy heart? And Jehonadab answered, It is. If it be, give me thy hand. And he gave him his hand; and he took him up to him into the chariot.

A very solemn method of taking an oath in the East is by joining hands, uttering at the same time a curse upon the false swearer. To this form the wise man probably alludes in that proverb: "Though hand join in hand"—though they ratify their agreement by oath—"the wicked shall not be unpunished, but the seed of the righteous shall be delivered." This form of swearing is still observed in Egypt and the vicinity; for when Mr. Bruce was at Shekh Anmer, he entreated the protection of the governor in prosecuting his journey, when the great people, who were assembled, came, and after joining hands, repeated a kind of prayer, of about two minutes long, by which they declared themselves and their children accursed, if ever they lifted up their hands against him in the tell, or field, in the desert; or in the case that he or his should fly to them for refuge, if they did not protect them at the risk of their lives, their families, and their fortunes; or, as they emphatically expressed it, to the death of the last male child among them. The inspired writer has recorded an instance of this form of swearing in the history of Jehu: "And when he was departed thence, he lighted on Jehonadab, the son of Rechab, coming to meet him, and he saluted him, and said to him, Is thy heart right, as my heart is with thy heart; and Jehonadab answered, It is. If it be, give me thy hand. And he gave him his hand, and he took him up unto him into the chariot." Another striking instance is quoted by Calmet from Ockley's history of the Saracens. Telha, just before he died, asked one of Ali's men if he belonged to the emperor of the faithful; and being informed that he did, "Give me then, said he, your hand, that I may put mine in it, and in this action renew the oath of fidelity which I have already made to Ali."—PAXTON.

Deep as the reverence is with which the Orientals treat their princes, yet in some cases, a mode of treatment occurs that we are surprised at, as seeming to us of the West, too near an approach to that familiarity that takes place among equals: the taking a new elected prince by the hand, in token of acknowledging his princely character, may probably appear to us in this light. D'Herbelot, in explaining an eastern term, which, he tells us, signifies the election or anointment of a calif, the supreme head of the Mohammedans, both in civil and ecclesiastical matters, tells us, that "this ceremony consisted in stretching forth a person's hand, and taking that of him that they acknowledged for calif. This was a sort of performing homage, and swearing fealty to him." He adds, that "Khondemir, a celebrated historian, speaking of the election of Othman, the third calif after Mohammed, says, that Ali alone did not present his hand to him, and that upon that occasion Abdurahman, who had by compromise made the election, said to him, 'Ali! he who violates his word is the first person that is injured by so doing;' upon hearing of which words, Ali stretched out his hand, and acknowledged Othman as calif."

How much less solemn and expressive of reverence is this, than the manner of paying homage and swearing fealty at the coronation of our princes; to say nothing of the adoration that is practised in the Romish church, upon the election of their great ecclesiastic! It may however serve to illustrate what we read concerning Jehonadab, the head of an Arab tribe that lived in, and consequently was in some measure subject to, the kingdom of Israel. "Jehonadab came to meet Jehu, and he saluted him; and Jehu said to Jehonadab, Is thy heart right as my heart is with thy heart? and Jehonadab answered, It is. And he said, If it be, give me thy hand: and he gave him his hand, and he took him up to him into the chariot." This giving him the hand appears not to have been the expression of private friendship; but the solemn acknowledgment of him as king over Israel. Our translators seem to have supposed, by their way of expressing matters, that Jehu saluted, or blessed Jehonadab, and Bishop Patrick thought it was plain that it ought so to be understood; but I cannot but think it most natural to understand the words as signifying, that Jehonadab came to meet Jehu as then king of Israel; and to compliment him on being acknowledged king of the country in which he dwelt; not that this newly anointed prince first saluted him. This would not have been in character. So when Jacob was introduced to Pharaoh, he is said to have blessed Pharaoh, not Pharaoh Jacob, Gen. xlvii. 7. The words therefore should have been translated, with a slight variation, after some such manner as this, "He lighted on Jehonadab, the son of Rechab, coming to meet him, and he, Jehonadab, saluted him, and he, Jehu, said unto him, Is thy heart," &c.—HARMER.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 2. But Jehosheba, the daughter of king Joram, sister of Ahaziah, took Joash the son of Ahaziah, and stole him from among the king's sons which were slain; and they hid him, even him and his nurse, in the bedchamber, from Athaliah, so that he was not slain.

A bedchamber does not, according to the usage of the East, mean a lodging room, but a repository for beds. Chardin says, "In the East beds are not raised from the ground with posts, a canopy, and curtains; people lie on the ground. In the evening they spread out a mattress or two of cotton, very light, of which they have several in great houses, against they should have occasion, and a room on purpose for them." From hence it appears that it was in a chamber of beds that Joash was concealed.—HARMER.

Ver. 12. And he brought forth the king's son, and put the crown upon him, and gave him the testimony; and they made him king, and anointed him; and they clapped their hands, and said, God save the king.

The way by which females in the East express their joy, is by gently applying one of their hands to their mouths. This custom appears to be very ancient, and seems to be referred to in several places of scripture. Pitts, describing the joy with which the leaders of their sacred caravans are received in the several towns of Barbary through which they pass, says, "This Emir Hagge, into whatever town he comes, is received with a great deal of joy, because he is going about so religious a work. The women get upon the tops of the houses to view the parade, where they keep striking their forefingers on their lips softly as fast as they can, making a joyful noise all the while." The sacred writers suppose two different methods of expressing joy by a quick motion of the hand: the clapping of the hands, and that of one hand only, though these are confounded in our translation. The former of these methods obtained anciently, as an expression of malignant joy; but other words, which our version translates clapping the hands, signify, the applying of only one hand somewhere with softness, in testimony of a joy of a more agreeable kind. Thus in 2 Kings xi. 12, and Psalm xlvii. 1, it should be rendered in the singular, Clap your hand, and as the word implies gentleness, it may allude to such an application of the hand to the mouth as has now been recited.—BURNER.

Ver. 14. And when she looked, behold, the king stood by a pillar, as the manner was, and the princes and the trumpeters by the king; and all the people of the land rejoiced, and blew with trumpets: and Athaliah rent her clothes, and cried, Treason, treason!

The Orientals looked upon a seat by a pillar or column as a particular mark of respect. In the Iliad, Homer places Ulysses on a lofty throne, by a pillar: and in the Odyssey, he more than once alludes to the same custom. The kings of Israel wore, for the same reason, placed at their coronation, or on days of public festivity, by a pillar in the tradition of the Lord. Josiah, the king of Judah, stood by a pillar when he was admitted to the throne of his ancestors; and Josiah, one of his successors, when he made a covenant before the Lord.—PANTON.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 9. But Jehoiada the priest took a chest, and bored a hole in the lid of it, and set it beside the altar, on the right side as one cometh into the house of the Lord: and the priests that kept the door put therein all the money that was brought into the house of the Lord.

See on 1 Kings 18. 33.

Ver. 10. And it was so, when they saw that there was much money in the chest, that the king's scribe and the high-priest came up, and they put up in bags, and told the money that was found in the house of the Lord.

It appears to have been usual in the East for money to be put into bags, which, being ascertained as to the exact sum deposited in each, were sealed, and probably labelled, and thus passed currently. Instances of this kind may be traced in the scriptures, at least so far as that money was thus conveyed, and also thus delivered, from superior to inferior officers, for distribution: as in the passage referred to in this article. Major Rennel in giving an abstract of the History of Tobit, says, "we find him again at Nineveh, from whence he despatches his son Tobias to Rages by way of Ecbatana, for the money. At the latter place, he marries his kinswoman Sara, and sends a messenger on to Rages. The mode of keeping and delivering the money was exactly as at present in the East. Gabriel, who kept the money in trust, brought forth bags, which were sealed up, and gave them to him, and received in return the handwriting or acknowledgment which Tobias had taken care to require of his father before he left Nineveh. The money, we learn, was left in trust, or as a deposit, and not on usury, and, as it may be concluded, with Tobit's seal on the bags. In the East, in the present times, a bag of money passes (for some time at least) currently from hand to hand, under the authority of a banker's seal, without any examination of its contents."—BURNER.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 7. Neither did he leave of the people to Jehoahaz but fifty horsemen, and ten chariots, and ten thousand footmen; for the king of Syria had destroyed them, and had made them like the dust by thrashing.

In modern Turkey, the custom of treading out the corn by oxen is still practised. This is a much quicker way than our method of beating out the corn with the flail, but less cleanly; for, as it is performed in the open air, upon any round level plat of ground, danced over with coudung, to prevent as much as possible the earth, sand, or gravel, from rising, a great quantity of them all, notwithstanding these precautions, must unavoidably be taken up with the grain; at the same time the straw, which is their only fodder, is by this means shattered to pieces. To this circumstance the sacred historian alludes, with great force and propriety, in his brief description of the wretched state to which the kingdom of the ten tribes had been reduced by the arms of Hazael king of Syria: "Neither did he leave of the people to Jehoahaz but fifty horsemen, and ten chariots, and ten thousand footmen; for the king of Syria had destroyed them, and had made them like the dust by thrashing."—PANTON.

Ver. 17. And he said, Open the window eastward.

and he opened it. Then Elisha said, Shoot: and he shot. And he said, The arrow of the Lord's deliverance, and the arrow of deliverance from Syria; for thou shalt smite the Syrians in Aphek till thou have consumed them.

It was an ancient custom to shoot an arrow, or cast a spear, into the country which an army intended to invade. Justin says, that as soon as Alexander the Great had arrived on the coasts of Ionia, he threw a dart into the country of the Persians. The dart, spear, or arrow, thus thrown, was an emblem of the commencement of hostilities. Virgil represents Turnus as giving the signal of attack by throwing a spear.

Equis erit mecum, O Juvencus, qui primus in hostem!
En, ait, et jaculum intorquens emittit in auras.
Principium pugne; et campo sese arduus infert.

Who first, he cried, with me the foe will dare?
Then hurl'd a dart, the signal of the war.—(Prrr.)

Servius, in his note upon this place, shows that it was a custom to proclaim war in this way. The pater patratus, or chief of the Feciales, a sort of heralds, went to the confines of the enemy's country; and, after some solemnities, said, with a loud voice, "I wage war with you, for such and such reasons;" and then threw in a spear. It was then the business of the parties thus defied, or warned, to take the subject into consideration; and if they did not, within thirty days, come to some accommodation, the war was begun.—BURDER.

Ver. 21. And it came to pass, as they were burying a man, that, behold, they spied a band of men; and they cast the man into the sepulchre of Elisha: and when the man was let down, and touched the bones of Elisha, he revived, and stood up on his feet.

With us, the poorest people have their coffins; if the relations cannot afford them, the parish is at the expense. In the East, on the contrary, they are not at all made use of in our times: Turks and Christians, Thevenot assures us, agree in this. The ancient Jews probably buried their dead in the same manner: neither was the body of our Lord, it seems, put into a coffin: nor that of Elisha, whose bones were touched by the corpse that was let down a little after into his sepulchre, (2 Kings xiii. 21.) It is no objection to this account, that the widow of Nain's son is represented as carried forth to be buried in a Sopos, or bier, for the present inhabitants of the Levant, who are well known to lay their dead in the earth unenclosed, carry them frequently out to burial in a kind of coffin: so Russel in particular describes the bier used by the Turks at Aleppo as a kind of coffin, much in the form of ours, only the lid rises with a ledge in the middle. Christians, indeed, that same author tells us, are carried to the grave in an open bier: but as the most common kind of bier there very much resembles our coffins, that used by the people of Nain might very possibly be of the same kind, in which case the word Sopos was very proper.—HARMER.

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 9. And Jehoshaphat the king of Israel sent to Amaziah king of Judah, saying, The thistle that was in Lebanon sent to the cedar that was in Lebanon, saying, Give thy daughter to my son to wife: and there passed by a wild beast that was in Lebanon, and trode down the thistle.

We have here another beautiful instance of the way in which the ancients conveyed instruction or reproof in parables, apologies, or riddles. Jehoshaphat, the king of Israel, the author of the parable, compares himself to a cedar: and Amaziah, the king of Judah, to a thistle. It would no doubt be very annoying to Amaziah to be represented by a thistle! and his opponent by a cedar. Some years ago, two magistrates, who were much superior to their predecessors, in reference to the way in which they had discharged their duties, were appointed to take charge of separate districts.

The natives, as usual, did not speak plainly as to their merits, but under "the similitude of a parable." One of the districts was very famous for the banyan tree, the fruit of which is only eaten by the flying fox, birds, and monkeys. The people, therefore, to show how much better their present magistrate was than the former, said, "Ah! the banyan of our country is now giving the fruit of the palmirah." Those of the other district (where the palmirah was exceedingly plentiful) said of their magistrate, "Have you not heard that our palmirah is now giving mangoes?" Some men are always known by the name of certain trees. Thus, a person who is tall, and stoops a little, is called the cocoa-nut tree, and he who has long legs and arms, is called the banyan, which spreads its arms, and lets fall its supporters to the ground. It is, therefore, not very improbable that Jehoshaphat was known by the name of the cedar, and Amaziah by that of the thistle.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 28. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord; he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin.

CHAPTER XVI.

Ver. 3. But he walked in the way of the kings of Israel; yea, and made his son to pass through the fire, according to the abominations of the heathen, whom the Lord cast out from before the children of Israel.

Few things are more shocking to humanity than the custom of which such frequent mention is made in scripture, of making children, &c., pass through fire in honour of Moloch; a custom, the antiquity of which appears from its having been repeatedly forbidden by Moses, as Lev xviii. 21, and at length, in chap. xx. 1—5, where the expressions are very strong, of "giving his seed to Moloch." This cruelty, one would hope, was confined to the strangers in Israel, and not adopted by any native Israelite; yet we afterward find the kings of Israel, themselves, practising this superstition, and making their children pass through the fire. This may be illustrated by an instance: There is a remarkable variation of terms in the history of Ahaz, who (2 Kings xvi. 3) is said to make "his son to pass through the fire, according to the abominations of the heathen," i. e. no doubt, in honour of Moloch—which 2 Chron. xxviii. 3, is expressed by "he burned his children in the fire." Now, as the book of Chronicles is best understood, by being considered as a supplementary and explanatory history to the book of Kings, it is somewhat singular, that it uses by much the strongest word in this passage—for the import of ibor (יָבַר), is generally, to consume, to clear off: so Psal. lxxxiii. 14, "as the fire burneth a wood," so Isaiah i. 31; and this variation of expression is further heightened, by the word son (who passed through) being singular in Kings, but plural (sons) in Chronicles. It seems very natural to ask, "If he burned his children in the fire, how could he leave any posterity to succeed him?" We know, that the Rabbins have histories of the manner of passing through the fires, or into caves of fire; and there is an account of an image, which received children into its arms, and let them drop into a fire beneath, amid the shouts of the multitude, the noise of drums, and other instruments, to drown the shrieks of the agonizing infant, and the horrors of the parents' mind. Waiving further allusion to that account at present, we think the following extract may afford a good idea, in what manner the passing through, or over fire, was anciently performed: the attentive reader will notice the particulars. "A still more astonishing instance of the superstition of the ancient Indians, in respect to the venerated fire, remains at this day in the grand annual festival holden in honour of Darma Rajah, and called the FEAST OF FIRE; in which, as in the ancient rites of Moloch, the devotees walk barefoot over a glowing fire, extending forty feet. It is called the feast of fire, because they then walk on that element. It lasts eighteen days, during which time, those that make a vow to keep it, must fast, abstain from women, lie on the bare ground, and walk on a brisk fire. The eighteenth day, they assemble, on the sound of instruments; their heads crowned with flowers, the body bedaubed with saffron, and follow in cadence the figures of Darna Rajah, and Drobade, his wife, who are carried there in procession: when they come to the fire, they stir it, to animate its activity, and take a little of the ashes, with which they rub their forehead, and when the gods have been three times round it, they walk either fast or slow, according to their zeal, over a very hot fire, extending to about forty feet in length. Some carry their children in their arms, and others lances, sabres, and standards. "The most fervent devotees walk several times over the fire. After the ceremony, the people press to collect some of the ashes to rub their foreheads with, and obtain from the devotees some of the flowers with which they were adorned, and which they carefully preserve." (Sonnerat's Travels, vol. i. 154.) The flowers, then, were not burned.

This extract is taken from Mr. Maurice's "history of Hindostan," and it accounts for several expressions used in scripture: such as causing children (very young perhaps) to pass through fire, as we see they are carried over the fire, by which means, though devoted, or consecrated, they were not destroyed; neither were they injured, except by being profaned. Nevertheless, it might, and probably did happen, that some of those who thus passed, were hurt or maimed in the passing, or if not immediately slain by the fire, might be burnt in this superstitious pilgrimage, in such a manner as to contract fatal diseases. Shall we suppose, then, that while some of the children of Ahaz passed safely over the fire, others were injured by it, and injured even to death? But this could not be the case with all of them; as besides Hezekiah, his successor, we read of "Maaseiah, the king's son," 2 Chron. xxviii. 7. Humanity would induce us to hope that the expression "burned," should be taken in a milder sense than that of staying by fire; and, perhaps, this idea may be justified, by remarking the use of it—Exod. iii. 2, 3, "the bush burned with fire, yet the bush was not consumed." The word, therefore, being capable of a milder, as well as of a stronger sense, like our English word, to burn, it is desirable, if fact would permit, to take it in the milder sense in this instance of Ahaz, and possibly in others. Nevertheless, as the custom of widows burning themselves to death, with the body of their deceased husbands, not only continues, but is daily practised in India, it contributes to justify the harsher construction of the word to burn; as the superstitious cruelty which can deprive women of life, may easily be thought guilty of equal barbarity in the case of children, [and moreover the drowning of children in the Ganges, as an act of dedication, is common.]—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 10. And they set them up images and groves in every high hill, and under every green tree: 11. And there they burnt incense in all the high places, as did the heathen whom the LORD carried away before them; and wrought wicked things to provoke the LORD to anger.

Thus did the wicked Jews imitate the heathen. The whole verse might be a description of the localities, and usages of MODERN heathenism. See their high hills; they are all famous for being the habitation of some deity. On the summit there is generally a rude representation, formed by nature, or the distorted imagination, into the likeness of a god. In going to the spot, images are set up in every direction, as so many sentinels and guides to the sacred arcana. See the Ficus religiosa, and numerous other trees, under which various symbols of idolatry may be seen. Fastened into the roots of one, we discover the trident of Siva: under another, an emblem of Ganesa: there we see a few faded flowers, a broken cocoa-nut, an altar, or the ashes of a recent fire.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 17. And they caused their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire.

The Tamul translation has "to pass or tread on the fire." Dent. xviii. 10. 2 Kings xxiii. 10. xxi. 6. Lev. xviii. 21. Jer. xxxii. 35. are rendered "step over" the fire. To begin with Lev. xviii. 21. "Thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass through the fire to Moloch; neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the Lord." The marginal references "to profane the name of thy God," are chap. xix. 12. "And ye shall not swear by my name falsely, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God." (See also chap. xx. 3. xxi. 6. and xxii. 2. 32. Ezek. xxxvi. 20.) Connected therefore, with passing through the fire, as mentioned in Lev. xviii. 21, and the marginal references, it is clear that the name of God was profaned by SWEARING. The Tamul translation of Lev. xviii. 21, for "pass through the fire," has "step over the fire," which alludes to the oath which is taken by STEPPING OVER THE FIRE. It is a solemn way of swearing to innocence, by first making a fire, and when stepping over to exclaim, "I am not guilty." Hence the frequency of the question, (when a man denies an accusation,) "Will you step over the fire?" But so careful are the heathen in reference to fire, when they are not on their oath, that they will not step over it. See a traveller on his journey; does he come to a place where there has been a fire, he will not step over it, but walk round it, lest any evil should come upon him. I think it, therefore, probable, from the words, "profane the name of thy God," as mentioned in connexion with passing through the fire, and from the eastern custom, that the ancient idolaters did take a solemn oath of allegiance to their gods, or of their innocence of crime, by thus stepping over the fire.

But it is also a custom among these heathen to pass through, or rather to walk on, the fire. This is done sometimes in consequence of a vow, or from a wish to gain popularity, or to merit the favour of the gods. A fire is made on the ground, from twenty to thirty paces in length, and the individual walks on it barefoot, backwards and forwards, as many times as he may believe the nature of his circumstances require. Some say that these devotees put a composition on their feet, which prevents them from being much burnt; but I am of opinion this is not often the case. To walk on the fire is believed to be most acceptable to the cruel goddess Kali, the wife of Vyravar, who was the prince of devils. When a man is sick, he vows, "O Kali, mother, only cure me, and I will walk on fire in your holy presence." A father, for his deeply afflicted child, vows, "O Kali, or, O Vyravar, only deliver him, and when he is fifteen years of age, he shall walk on fire in your divine presence."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 37. And the statutes, and the ordinances, and the law, and the commandment, which he wrote for you, ye shall observe to do for evermore; and ye shall not fear other gods.

The most prominent effect of heathenism on the minds of its votaries is FEAR; and no wonder; for how can they love deities guilty of such repeated acts of cruelty, injustice, falsehood, dishonesty, and impurity? Strange as it may appear, European descendants, as well as native Christians, are in danger of FEARING the gods of the heathen. There are so many traditions of their malignity and power, that it requires strength of mind, and, above all, faith in Jesus Christ, the conqueror of devils, to give a perfect victory over it. On this account the missionaries sent out by Denmark, more than one hundred years ago, (and some of their successors,) have not approved of the native Christians studying the heathen books and superstitions. This, however, has had an injurious effect, because it disqualified the members of the church to expose the errors of heathenism to the people, and also conveyed an idea of something like inadequacy in the Gospel of Christ to meet such a system. In view of this, the missionaries of the present day, and many of their converts, have, like Ezekiel, (chap. viii.) looked into this vile arcana; have dragged the monstrous transactions to light, exposed them to public gaze, and driven from the field of argument, the proud and learned Bramin.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 11. And the king of Assyria did carry away Israel unto Assyria, and put them in Halah and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes.

For the following narrative, and the particular application of it, great commendation is due to the learned and intelligent traveller. After describing some sculptured figures which he had just seen, he says: "At a point something higher up than the rough gigantic forms just described, in a very precipitous cliff, there appeared to me a still more interesting piece of sculpture, though probably not of such deep antiquity. Even at so vast a height, the first glance showed it to have been a work of some age accomplished in the art: for all here was executed with the care and fine expression of the very best at Persepolis. I could not resist the impulse to examine it nearer than from the distance of the ground, and would have been glad of Queen Semiramis's stage of packs and fardels. To approach it at all was a business of difficulty and danger; however, after much scrambling and climbing, I at last got pretty far up the rock, and finding a ledge, placed myself on it as firmly as I could; but still I was further from the object of all this peril than I had hoped: yet my eyes being tolerably long-sighted, and my glass more so, I managed to copy the whole sculpture with considerable exactness. It contains fourteen figures, one of which is in the air. The first figure (to our left in facing the sculpture) carries a spear, and is in the full Median habit, like the leaders of the guards at Persepolis; his hair is in a similar fashion, and bound with a fillet. The second figure holds a bent bow in his left hand; he is in much the same dress, with the addition of a quiver slung at his back by a belt that crosses his right shoulder, and his wrists are adorned with bracelets. The third personage is of a stature much larger than any other in the group, a usual distinction of royalty in oriental description; and, from the air and attitude of the figure, I have no doubt he is meant to designate the king. The costume, excepting the beard not being quite so long, is precisely that of the regal dignity, exhibited in the bas-reliefs of Nakshi-Roustan, and Persepolis: a mixture of the pontiff-king, and the other sovereign personages. The robe being the ample vesture of the one, and the diadem the simple band of the other; a style of crown which appears to have been the most ancient badge of supremacy of either king or pontiff. But as persons of inferior rank also wore fillets, it seems the distinction between theirs and their sovereigns, consisted in the material or colour. For instance, the band or cydaris, which formed the essential part in the old Persian diadem, was composed of a twined substance of purple and white: and any person below the royal dignity presuming to wear those colours unsanctioned by the king, was guilty of a transgression of the law, deemed equal to high treason. The fillets of the priesthood were probably white or silver; and the circlets of kings, in general, simple gold. Bracelets are on the wrists of this personage, and he holds up his hand in a commanding or admonitory manner, the two forefingers being extended, and the two others doubled down in the palm: an action also common on the tombs at Persepolis, and other monuments just cited; his left hand grasps a bow of a different shape from that held by his officer, but exactly like the one in which the king leans in the bas-relief on the tomb at Nakshi-Roustan. This bow, together with the left foot of the personage I am describing, rests on the body of a prostrate man, who lies on his back with outstretched arms, in the act of supplicating for mercy. This unhappy personage, and also the first in the string of nine which advance towards the king, are very much injured; however, enough remains of the almost defaced leader, when compared with the apparent condition of the succeeding eight, to show that the whole nine are captives. The hands of all are tied behind their backs, and the cord is very distinct which binds the neck of the one to the neck of the other, till the mark of bondage reaches to the last in the line. If it were also originally attached to the leader, the cord is now without trace there; his hands, however, are evidently in the same trammels as his followers. The second figure in the procession has his hair so close to his head, that it appears to have been shaven, and a kind of caul covers it from the top of the forehead to the middle of the head. He is dressed in a short tunic, reaching no further than the knee; a belt fastens it round the waist; his legs are bare. Behind this figure is a much older person, with a rather pointed beard and bushy hair, and a similar caul covers the top of his head. He too is habited in a short tunic, with something like the trouser, or booted appearance on the limbs which is seen on some of the figures at Persepolis. In addition to the binding of the hands, the preceding figure, and this, are fastened together by a rope round their necks, which runs onward, noosing all the remaining eight in one string. This last-described person has the great peculiarity attached to him, of the skirt of his garment being covered entirely with inscriptions in the arrow-headed character. Next follows one in a long vestment, with full hair, without the caul. Then another in a short, plain tunic, with trousers. Then succeeds a second long vestment. After him comes one in a short tunic, with naked legs, and, apparently, a perfectly bald head. He is followed by another in long vestments. But the ninth, and last in the group, who also is in the short tunic and trouser, has the singularity of wearing a prodigious high-pointed cap; his beard and hair are much ampler than any of his companions, and his face looks of a greater age. In the air, over the heads of the centre figures, appears the floating intelligence in his circle and car of sunbeams, so often remarked on the sculptures of Nakshi-Roustan and Persepolis.

"Above the head of each individual in this bas-relief is a compartment with an inscription in the arrow-headed writing, most probably descriptive of the character and situation of each person. And immediately below the sculpture, are two lines in the same language, running the whole length of the group. Under these again, the excavation is continued to a considerable extent, containing eight deep and closely-written columns in the same character. From so much labour having been exerted on this part of the work, it excites more regret that so little progress has yet been made towards deciphering the character. The design of this sculpture appears to tally so well with the great event of the total conquest over Israel, by Salmaneser, king of Assyria, and the Medes, that I venture to suggest the possibility of this bas-relief having been made to commemorate that final achievement. Certain circumstances attending the entire captivity of the ten tribes, which took place in a second attack on their nation, when considered, seem to confirm the conjecture into a strong probability. In turning from this account in the scriptures, to the sculpture on the rock, the one seemed clearly to explain the other. In the royal figure, I see Salmaneser, the son of the renowned Arbaces, followed by two appropriate leaders of the armies of his two dominions, Assyria and Media, carrying the spear and the bow. Himself rests on the great royal weapon of the East, revered from earliest time as the badge of supreme power—Behold I do set my bow in the cloud. Besides, he tramples on a prostrate foe; not one that is slain, but one who is a captive: this person not lying stretched out and motionless, but extending his arms in supplication. He must have been a king, for on none below that dignity would the haughty foot of an eastern monarch condescend to tread. Then we see approach nine captives, bound, as it were, in double bonds, in sign of a double offence. We may understand this accumulated transgression, on recollecting that on the first invasion of Israel, by Tiglath-pileser, he carried away only part of three tribes; and on the second by Salmaneser, he not only confirmed Hoshea on the throne, but spared the remaining people. Therefore, on this determined rebellion of king and people, he punishes the ingratitude of both, by putting both in the most abject bonds, and bringing away the whole of the ten tribes into captivity; or, at least, the principal of the nation; in the same manner, probably, as was afterwards adopted by Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon, with regard to the inhabitants of Judea, he carried away all from Jerusalem, and all the princes, and all the mighty men of valour, even ten thousand captives; and all the craftsmen and smiths; none remained, save the poorest sort of people of the land. 2 Kings xxiv. 14.

"Besides, it may bear on our argument, to remark, that, including the prostrate monarch, there are precisely ten captives: who might be regarded as the representatives, or heads, of each tribe, beginning with the king, who, assuredly, would be considered as the chief of his: and end ing with the aged figure at the end, whose high cap may have been an exaggerated representation of the mitre worn by the sacerdotal tribe of Levi: a just punishment of the priesthood at that time, which had debased itself by every species of idolatrous compliance with the whims, or rather wickedness of the people, in the adoption of pagan worship. Hence, having all walked in the statutes of the heathen, the Lord rejected Israel, and delivered them into the hand of the spoilers. Doubtless, the figure with the inscription on his garments, from the singularity of the appendage, must have been some noted personage in the history of the event; and besides, it seems to designate a striking peculiarity of the Jews, who were accustomed to write memorable sentences of old, in the form of phylacteries, on different parts of their raiment. What those may mean, which cover the garment of this figure, we have no means of explaining, till the diligent researches of the learned may be able to decipher the arrow-headed character, and then a full light would be thrown on the whole history, by expounding the tablets over every head. If the aerial form above were ever intended to represent the heavenly apparition of a departed king, which is the opinion of some, that of the great Arbaces might appear here with striking propriety, at the final conquest of rebellious Israel. Should the discoveries of time prove my conjecture at all right, this baserelief must be nearly two hundred years older than any which are ascribed to Cyrus, at Persepolis or Pasargade." (Sir R. K. Porter.)—BURDER. (See engraving, pl. no. at the end of the volume.)

Ver. 20. Thou sayest, (but they are but vain words,) I have counsel and strength for the war. Now, on whom dost thou trust, that thou rebellest against me?

The Hindus say of boasting words, or those which do not proceed from the heart, they are "words of the mortar;" but to speak evil of a person is called a chandu-chadi, a hint of the lip.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 23. Now therefore, I pray thee, give pledges to my lord the king of Assyria, and I will deliver thee two thousand horses, if thou be able on thy part to set riders upon them.

In the first periods of the Jewish history, the armies of Israel consisted of all footmen. At length Solomon raised a body of twelve thousand horse, and fourteen hundred chariots, some with two, and others with four horses; but whether that magnificent prince intended them for pomp or war, is uncertain. Infantry was also the chief strength of the Greek and Roman armies. Cavalry is not so necessary in warm climates, where the march of troops is less incommoded with bad roads; nor can they be of so much use in mountainous countries, where their movements are attended with great difficulty and hazard. The eastern potentates, however, brought immense numbers of horse into the field, and chiefly trusted to their exertions for defence or conquest. The people of Israel, who were appointed to "dwell alone," and not to mingle with the nations around them, nor imitate their policy, were expressly forbidden to maintain large bodies of cavalry; and they accordingly prospered, or were defeated, as they obeyed or transgressed this divine command; which a celebrated author observes, cannot be justified by the measures of human prudence. Even upon political reasons, says Warburton, the Jews might be justified in the disuse of cavalry, in the defence of their country, but not in conquering it from a warlike people, who abounded in horses. Here, at least, the exertion of an extraordinary providence was wonderfully conspicuous. The kings who succeeded Solomon certainly raised a body of horse for the defence of their dominions, which they recruited from the studs of Egypt, in those times equally remarkable for their vigour and beauty. But the Jewish cavalry were seldom very numerous; and under the religious kings of David's line, who made the divine law the rule of their policy, they were either disembodied altogether, or reduced to a very small number. In the reign of Hezekiah, when the country was invaded by the king of Assyria, the Jews seem to have had no force of this kind, for, said Rabshakeh, "Now, therefore, I pray thee, give pledges to my lord the king of Assyria, and I will deliver thee two thousand horses, if thou be able on thy part to set riders upon them."—PAXTON.

Ver. 28. Then Rabshakeh stood, and cried with a loud voice in the Jews' language, and spake, saying, Hear the word of the great king, the king of Assyria: 29. Thus saith the king, Let not Hezekiah deceive you; for he shall not be able to deliver you out of his hand: 30. Neither let Hezekiah make you trust in the LORD, saying, The LORD will surely deliver us, and this city shall not be delivered into the hand of the king of Assyria. 31. Hearken not to Hezekiah: for thus saith the king of Assyria, Make an agreement with me by a present, and come out to me, and then eat ye every man of his own vine, and every one of his fig-tree, and drink ye every one the waters of his cistern; 32. Until I come and take you away to a land like your own land; a land of corn and wine, a land of bread and vineyards, a land of olive and of honey, that ye may live and not die: and hearken not unto Hezekiah, when he persuadeth you, saying, The LORD will deliver us.

It must be owned that there is something extremely insolent in the speeches of Rabshakeh to Hezekiah and his loyal subjects, (2 Kings xviii.) his boastings, both as to matter and manner, appear to have been of the most unlimited kind, and to have wanted for no amplification in the capacity of the speaker to bestow on them: he describes his master's power in the highest terms, and even beyond what fidelity, as a servaunt to the king of Assyria, might have required from him. Probably his speeches are recorded as being in a strain somewhat unusual, and it will not be easy to find their equal: nevertheless, the reader may be amused by the following portrait, which forms no bad companion to that of Rabshakeh: if it may not rival that in expression, it falls little short of it, and is, to say the least, an entertaining representation of eastern manners and train of thought. It should be remarked, that Rabshakeh was speaking openly, in defiance to enemies: Hyat Saib was conversing in his own residence. If, when speaking in private, he was thus eloquent, what had been his eloquence, had he been employed by his sovereign in a message of defiance?

Hyat Saib, the jemadar, or governor of Baidanore, "having exhausted his whole string of questions, he turned the discourse to another subject—no less than his great and puissant lord and master, Hyder, of whom he had endeavoured to impress me with a great, if not a terrible idea; amplifying his honour, his wealth, and the extent and opulence of his dominions; and describing to me, in the most exaggerated terms, the number of his troops, his military talents, his vast, and, according to his account, unrivalled genius; his amazing abilities in conquering and governing nations; and, above all, his amiable qualities and splendid endowments of heart, no less than understanding.

"Having thus, with equal zeal and fidelity, endeavoured to impress me with veneration for his lord and master, and for that purpose attributed to him every perfection that may be supposed to be divided among all the kings and generals that have lived since the birth of Christ, and given each their due, he turned to the English government, and endeavoured to demonstrate to me the folly and inutility of our attempting to resist his progress, which he compared to that of the sea, to a tempest, to a torrent, to a lion's pace and fury—to every thing that an eastern imagination could suggest as a figure proper to exemplify grandeur and irresistible power. He then vaunted of his sovereign's successes over the English, some of which I had not heard of before, and did not believe; and concluded by assuring me, that it was Hyder's determination to drive all Europeans from Indostan, which he averred he could not fail to do, considering the weakness of the one, and the boundless power of the other.—He expended half an hour in this manner and discourse." (Campbell's Travels to India.)—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

CHAPTER XIX.

Ver. 3. And they said unto him, Thus saith Hezekiah, This day is a day of trouble, and of rebuke, and blasphemy: for the children are come to the birth, and there is not strength to bring forth.

When a person has all but accomplished his object, when only a very slight obstacle has prevented him, it is then said, "The child came to the birth, but there was not strength to bring it forth." Some time ago, an opulent man accused another, who was also very rich, and in office, of improper conduct to the government: the matter was well investigated by competent authorities; but the accused, by his superior cunning, and by bribes, escaped, as by the "skin of his teeth;" and the people said, "Alas! the child came to the mouth, but the hand could not take it." When a person has succeeded in gaining a blessing which he has long desired, he says, "Good, good! the child is born at last." Has a person lost his lawsuit in a provincial court, he will go to the capital to make an appeal to a superior court; and should he there succeed, he will say, in writing to a friend, "Good news, good news! the child is born." When a man has been trying to gain an office, his friend meeting him on return, does not always ask, "Is the child born? or did it come to the birth?" but, "Is it a male or a female?" If he say the former, he has gained his object; if the latter, he has failed.—ROBERTS.

The destruction of Sennacherib and his army appears to have been effected by that pestilential wind called the simoom.

At Bagdad, October 9, 1818, Sir R. K. Porter informs us, (Travels, vol. ii. p. 229.) the master of the khan "told me, that they consider October the first month of their autumn, and feel it delightfully cool in comparison with July, August, and September; for that during forty days of the two first-named summer months, the hot wind blows from the desert, and its effects are often destructive. Its title is very appropriate, being called the samiel, or baude semoom, the pestilential wind. It does not come in continued long currents, but in gusts at different intervals, each blast lasting several minutes, and passing along with the rapidity of lightning. No one dare stir from their houses while this invisible flame is sweeping over the face of the country. Previous to its approach, the atmosphere becomes thick and suffocating, and appearing particularly dense near the horizon, gives sufficient warning of the threatened mischief. Though hostile to human life, it is so far from being prejudicial to the vegetable creation, that a continuance of the samiel tends to ripen the fruits. I inquired what became of the cattle during such a plague, and was told they were seldom touched by it. It seems strange that their lungs should be so perfectly insensible to what seems instant destruction to the breath of man; but so it is, that they are regularly driven down to water at the customary times of day, even when the blasts are at the severest. The people who attend them are obliged to plaster their own faces, and other parts of the body usually exposed to the air, with a sort of muddy clay, which, in general, protects them from its most malignant effects. The periods of the winds' blowing are generally from noon till sunset; they cease almost entirely during the night; and the direction of the gusts is always from the northeast. When it has passed over, a sulphuric, and indeed loathsome smell, like putridity, remains for a long time. The poison which occasions this smell must be deadly; for if any unfortunate traveller, too far from shelter, meet the blast, he falls immediately; and in a few minutes his flesh becomes almost black, while both it and his bones at once arrive at so extreme a state of corruption, that the smallest movement of the body would separate the one from the other."—ROBINSON.

The south wind in those arid regions blowing over an immense surface of burning sand, becomes so charged with electrical matter, as to occasion the greatest danger, and often instant death, to the unwary traveller. A Turk, who had twice performed the pilgrimage to Mecca, told Dr. Clarke that he had witnessed more than once the direful effects of this hot pestilential wind in the desert. He has known all the water dried out of their skin bottles in an instant, by its influence. The camels alone gave notice of its approach, by making a noise, and burying their mouths and nostrils in the sand. This was considered as an infallible token that the desolation was at hand; and those who imitated the camels escaped suffocation.

In some districts it commits great ravages, and at times so totally burns up all the corn, that no animal will eat a blade of it, or touch any of its grain. It has been known, even in Persia, to destroy camels and other hardy animals; its effects on the human frame are represented as inconceivably dreadful. In some instances it kills instantaneously; but in others the wretched sufferer lingers for hours, or even days, in the most excruciating torture. In those places where it is not fatal to life, it resembles the breath of a glowing furnace, destroys every symptom of vegetation, and will, even during the night, scorch the skin in the most painful manner. In the sandy desert it is often so heated as to destroy every thing, animal and vegetable, with which it comes in contact. In the inhabited country every article of furniture, of glass, and even of wood, becomes as hot as if it were exposed to a raging fire. In Hindostan, when the hot wind blows, the atmosphere for many hours of the day becomes insupportable; the heavens are like brass, and the earth like heated iron. At such times the miserable inhabitants are obliged to confine themselves in dark rooms, cooled by screens of matted grass kept continually watered. To this terrible agent the prophet alludes in his prediction of Sennacherib's overthrow: "Behold, I will send a blast upon him." The return of man to his native dust is as certain and speedy as the blasting of a tender plant by the deadly breath of the simoom: "For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone; and the place thereof shall know it no more."

Campbell, in his Travels, most significantly calls it a horrid wind, whose consuming blasts extend their ravages all the way from the extreme end of the Gulf of Cambaya up to Mosul. It carries along with it fleaks of fire, like threads of silk; instantly strikes dead those that breathe it, and consumes them inwardly to ashes; the flesh soon becoming black as a coal, and dropping off the bones. The numbers that perish by its fatal influence are sometimes very great. Thevenot states, that in the year 1665, in the month of July, four thousand people died at Bassora by that wind, in three weeks' time.

By this powerful and terrific agent, invigorated by the arm, and guided by the finger of Jehovah, was the numerous army of the proud and blaspheming Sennacherib destroyed under the walls of Libnah. In the brief statement of Isaiah it is said, "Then the angel (or, as it may be rendered, the messenger) of the Lord went forth, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred and fourscore and five thousand men." Now this angel of Jehovah is expressly called, in ver. 7th of the same chapter, raach, a blast or wind; which can hardly leave a doubt of the manner in which this passage is to be understood.—PAXTON.

Ver. 24. I have digged and drunk strange waters, and with the sole of my feet have I dried up all the rivers of besieged places.

The curious Viiringa admires the explanation which Grotius has given, of that watering with the foot by which Egypt was distinguished from Judea, derived from an observation made on Philo, who lived in Egypt, Philo having described a machine used by the peasants of that country for watering as wrought by the feet; which sort of watering Dr. Shaw has since understood of the gardener's putting a stop to the further flowing of the water in the rill, in which those things were planted that wanted watering, by turning the earth against it with his foot. Great respect is due to so candid and ingenious a traveller as Dr. Shaw; I must however own, that I apprehend the meaning of Moses is more truly represented by Grotius than the doctor. For Moses seems to intend to represent the great labour of this way of watering by the foot, which the working that instrument really was, on which account it seems to be laid aside in Egypt since the time of Philo, and easier methods of raising the water made use of; whereas the turning the earth with the foot which Dr. Shaw speaks of, is the least part of the labour of watering. If this should be remarked, that this machine was not older than Archimedes, which has been supposed, I would by way of reply observe, that the more ancient Egyptian machines might be equally wrought with the foot, and were undoubtedly more laborious still, as otherwise the invention of Archimedes would not have brought them into disuse. But though I think the interpretation of Deut. xi. 10, by Grotius, is preferable to that of Dr. Shaw, I readily admit that the doctor's thought may be very naturally applied to these words of Sennacherib, to which however the doctor has not applied it; for he seems to boast that he could as easily turn the water of great rivers, and cause their old channels to become dry, as a gardener stops the water from flowing any longer in a rill by the sole of his foot.

And as the gardener stops up one rill and opens another with his mattock, to let in the water, so, says Sennacherib, I have digged and drank strange waters, that is, which did not heretofore flow in the places I have made them flow in. This is the easiest interpretation that can, I believe, be given to the word strange, made use of by this Assyrian prince, and makes the whole verse a reference to the eastern way of watering: I have digged channels, and drank, and caused my army to drink out of new-made rivers, into which I have conducted the waters that used to flow elsewhere, and have laid those old channels dry with the sole of my foot, with as much ease as a gardener digs channels in his garden, and directing the waters of a cistern into a few rills, with his foot stops up that in which it before ran.

In confirmation of all which, let it be remembered, that this way of watering by rills is in use in those countries from whence Sennacherib came; continued down from ancient times there, without doubt, as it is in Egypt.

The understanding those words of the Psalmist, Ps. lxxv. 9, Thou visitest the earth and waterest it, thou greatly enrichest it with the rivers of God, of the watering it as by a rill of water, makes an easy and beautiful sense; the rain being to the earth in general, the same thing from God, that a watering rill, or little river, is to a garden from man.—HARMER.

Ver. 26. Therefore their inhabitants were of small power, they were dismayed and confounded; they were as the grass of the field, and as the green herb, as the grass on the house-tops, and as corn blasted before it be grown up.

The Hebrew has, instead of small power, "short of hand." This figure is much used here, and is taken from a man trying to reach an object for which his arm is not long enough. When it is wished to ascertain what is a man's capacity or power, it is asked, "Is his arm long or short?" "Let me tell you, friend, Tamnan will never succeed; his arm is not long enough." Of feeble people it is said, "they have short hands."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 28. Because thy rage against me and thy tumult is come up into mine ears, therefore I will put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way by which thou camest.

A person says of his deliverer from prison or danger, "Ah! the good man took me out by his lote," i. e. hook. A culprit says of the officers who cannot catch him, "Their hooks are become straight." The man who cannot drag another from his secrecy, says, "My hook is not sufficient for that fellow."—ROBERTS.

The dromedary differs from the common camel, in being of a finer and rounder shape, and in having upon its back a smaller protuberance. This species (for the former seldom deviating from the beaten road, travels with its head at liberty) is governed by a bridle, which being usually fastened to a ring fixed in its nostrils, may very well illustrate the expression which the sacred writer uses concerning Sennacherib: "I will put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way by which thou camest." These words refer at once to the absolute control of heaven, under which he acted, and the swiftness of his retreat.—PAXTON.

Ver. 35. And it came to pass that night, that the angel of the Lord went out, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred fourscore and five thousand: and when they arose early in the morning, behold, they were all dead corpses.

Mr. Boswell, in his Life of Dr. Johnson, informs us, that it was a subject of conversation between them, in what manner so great a multitude of Sennacherib's army was destroyed. "We are not to suppose," says the doctor, in reply, "that the angel went abroad with a sword in his hand, stabbing them one by one; but that some powerful natural agent was employed; most probably the simyael." Whether the doctor had noticed some picture in which the angel was thus employed, is uncertain; and it should seem, that this idea is common; and even Dr. Doddridge appears to have conceived of the angel, as of a person employed in slaughter; for he says, in a note on the passage (Matt. xxvi. 53) where our Lord mentions that his Father could furnish him twelve legions of angels, "How dreadfully irresistible would such an army of angels have been, when one of these celestial spirits was able to destroy 185,000 Assyrians at one stroke!" Without attempting to investigate the power of celestial spirits, we may endeavour to present the history of the destruction of Sennacherib's army, according to what, in all probability, was the real fact; premising that simyael, sumiel, samyel, sumoom, simoom, &c. are different names for the same meteor. Mr. Bruce's account of this wonderful natural phenomenon, affords some very interesting particulars. The extracts are from the quarto edition of his Travels.

"On the 16th, at half past ten, we left El Mout, [death.] At eleven o'clock, while we contemplated with great pleasure the rugged top of Chiggré, to which we were fast approaching, and where we were to solace ourselves with plenty of good water, Idris cried out, 'Fall upon your knees, for here is the simoom!' I saw from the southeast a haze come, in colour like the purple part of the rainbow, but not so compressed or thick. It did not occupy twenty yards in breadth, and was about twelve feet high from the ground. It was a kind of bluish upon the air, and it moved very rapidly, for I scarce could turn to fall upon the ground, with my head to the northward, when I felt the heat of its current plainly upon my face. We all lay flat on the ground, as if dead, till Idris told us it was blown over. The meteor, or purple haze, which I saw, was indeed passed, but the light air that still blew was of heat to threaten suffocation. For my part, I found distinctly in my breast that I had imbibed a part of it, nor was I free of an asthmatic sensation, till I had been some months in Italy, at the baths of Poretta, near two years afterward. A universal despondency had taken possession of our people. They ceased to speak to one another, and when they did it was in whispers, by which I easily guessed that they were increasing each other's fears, by vain suggestions, calculated to sink each other's spirits still further. This phenomenon of the simoom, unexpected by us, though foreseen by Idris, caused us all to relapse into our former despondency. It still continued to blow so as to exhaust us entirely, though the blast was so weak as scarcely would have raised a leaf from the ground. At twenty minutes before five, the simoom ceased, and a comfortable and cooling breeze came by starts from the north. We had no sooner got into the plains than we felt great symptoms of the simoom, and about a quarter before twelve, our prisoner first, and then Idris, cried out, The simoom! the simoom! My curiosity would not suffer me to fall down without looking behind me; about due south, a little to the east, I saw the coloured haze, as before. It seemed now to be rather less compressed, and to have with it a shade of blue. The edges of it were not defined as those of the former; but like a very thin smoke, with about a yard in the middle, tinged with these colours. We all fell upon our faces, and the simoom passed with a gentle ruffling wind. It continued to blow in this manner till near three o'clock, so we were all taken ill at night, and scarcely strength was left us to load the camels. The simoom, with the wind at southeast, immediately followed the wind at north, and the usual despondency that always accompanied it. The blue meteor, with which it began passing over us about twelve, and the ruffling wind that followed it, continued till near two. Silence, and a desperate kind of indifference about life, were the immediate effects upon us; and I began, seeing the condition of my camels, to fear we were all doomed to a sandy grave, and to contemplate it with some degree of resignation. I here began to provide for the worst. I saw the fate of our camels fast approaching, and that our men grew weak in proportion: our bread, too, began to fail us, although we had plenty of camel's flesh in its stead; our water, though to all appearance we were to find it more frequently than in the beginning of our journey, was nevertheless brackish, and scarce served the purpose to quench our thirst; and above all, the dreadful simoom had perfectly exhausted our strength, and brought upon us a degree of cowardice and languor that we struggled with in vain."

The following extract is from D'Osbornville's "Essays, &c. on the East."<sup>22</sup>—"Some enlightened travellers have seriously written, that every individual who falls a victim to this infection, is immediately reduced to ashes, though apparently only asleep; and that when taken hold of to be awakened by passengers, the limbs part from the body and remain in the hand. Such travellers would evidently not have taken these tales on hearsay, if they had paid a proper attention to other facts, which they either did or ought to have heard. Experience proves, that animals, by pressing their nostrils to the earth, and men, by covering their heads in their mantles, have nothing to fear from these meteors. This demonstrates the impossibility that a poison which can only penetrate the most delicate parts of the brain or lungs, should calcine the skin, flesh, nerves, and bones. I acknowledge these accounts are had from the Arabs themselves; but their picturesque and extravagant expressions are a kind of imaginary coin, to know the true value of which, requires some practice."

Notwithstanding this remark, if the word immediately were exchanged for quickly, the purport of the account might be almost exactly justified. Our author proceeds—"I have twice had an opportunity of considering the effect of these siphons, with some attention. I shall relate simply what I have seen in the case of a merchant and two travellers, who were struck during their sleep, and died on the spot. I ran to see if it was possible to afford them any succour, but they were already dead; the victims of an interior suffocating fire. There were apparent signs of the dissolution of their fluids; a kind of serous matter issued from the nostrils, mouth, and ears; and in something more than an hour, the whole body was in the same state. However, as, according to their custom, they [the Arabs] were diligent to pay them the last duties of humanity, I cannot affirm that the putrefaction was more or less rapid than usual in that country. As to the meteor itself, it may be examined with impunity at the distance of three or four fathoms; and the country people are only afraid of being surprised by it when they are asleep; neither are such accidents very common, for these siphons are only seen during two or three months of the year; and as their approach is felt, the camp-guards and the people awake are always very careful to rouse those that sleep, who also have a general habit of covering their faces with mantles."

Any seeming contrariety of representation between Mr. Bruce and this traveller may be accounted for, by supposing that in different deserts, or at different times, (of the year, perhaps,) these meteors are more or less fatal; but the reader's attention is desired, particularly, to certain ideas implied in these descriptions:—1. The meteor seems like a thin smoke, i. e. seen by daylight, when Mr. Bruce travelled. 2. It passed with a gentle ruffling wind. 3. It was some hours in passing. 4. It affected the mind, by enfeebling the body; producing despondency and cowardice. 5. It is dangerous by being breathed. 6. It is peculiarly fatal to persons sleeping. 7. Its effects, even on those to whom it is not fatal, are debilitating and lasting. 8. It is felt; and is compared to a suffocating fire. 9. Its extent is sometimes considerable; about half a mile; sometimes more, sometimes less. 10. Colonel Campbell says, at the close of the extract from him, page 9, that "to prevent drawing it in, it is necessary first to see it, which is not always practicable." No doubt, we may safely add, especially by night.

These particulars respecting the nature and effects of the simoom, will illustrate, by comparison, occurrences recorded 2 Kings, chap. xix., and Isaiah, chap. xxxvii.

I. "Behold, I will send a blast upon him," (Sennacherib.) The word rendered blast (רוח ריב) does not imply a vehement wind; but a gentle breathing, a breeze, a vapour, a reek, an exhalation; and thus agrees perfectly with the descriptions extracted above.

II. It is supposed the prophet alludes to this meteor, Isa. chap. xxx. 27, "The Lord's anger is burning, or devouring, fire;" "burning with his anger"—"his tongue is a devouring fire." Eng. Trans. And ver. 33, "The breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it."

III. The army of Sennacherib was destroyed by night. No doubt the unwarrantable pride of the king had extended also to his army, (witness the arrogance of Rabshakeh,) so that being in full security the officers and soldiers were negligent; their discipline was relaxed; the "camp-guards" were not alert; or, perhaps, they themselves were the first taken off; and those who slept not wrapped up, imbibed the poison plentifully. If this had been an evening of dissolute mirth, (no uncommon thing in a camp,) their joy (perhaps for a victory, or "the first night of their attacking the city;" says Josephus) became, by its effects, one means of their destruction.

IV. If the Assyrians were not accustomed to the action of this meteor at home, they might little expect it; and by night, might little watch for, or discern it. The total number of Sennacherib's army is not mentioned: perhaps it was three or four times the number slain; that it was very great, appears from his boastings sent to Hezekiah. If the extent of the meteor was half a mile, or a mile, in passing over a camp, it might destroy many thousands of sleepers; while those on each side of its course, escaped; and these, "rising early in the morning," discovered the slaughter of their fellows around them. The destruction of Cambyses' army of 50,000 men going for Ethiopia, is, in some respects, not unlike this destruction of the Assyrians.

V. The subsequent languor, despondence, and cowardice, attending this meteor, contribute to explain the forced return of Sennacherib home; even though his army might be very numerous, notwithstanding this diminution.

Observe, it was not before Jerusalem that this event occurred, but to the south.

VI. The Babylonish Talmud affirms, that this destruction of the Assyrians was executed by lightning; and some of the Targums are quoted for saying the same thing. Josephus says, "Sennacherib, on his return from the Egyptian war, found his army which he had left under Rabshakeh, almost entirely destroyed by a judicial pestilence, which swept away, in officers and common soldiers, the first night they sat down before the city, 185,000 men."

VII. That this meteor inflicts diseases where it is not immediately fatal, Mr. Bruce himself is an instance; he also says, "though Syene, by its situation, should be healthy, the general complaint is a weakness and soreness in the eyes; generally ending in blindness of one or both eyes; you scarce ever see a person in the street who sees with both eyes. They say it is owing to the hot wind from the desert; and this I apprehend to be true, by the violent soreness and inflammation we were troubled with in our return home, through the great desert, to Syene."—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 11. And Isaiah the prophet cried unto the Lord; and he brought the shadow ten degrees backward, by which it had gone down in the dial of Abaz.

At the beginning of the world it is certain there was no distinction of time, but by the light and darkness, and the whole day was included in the general terms of the evening and morning. The Chaldeans, many ages after the flood, were the first who divided the day into hours; they being the first who applied themselves with any success to astrology. Sun-dials are of ancient use: but as they were of no service in cloudy weather and in the night, there was another invention of measuring the parts of time by water; but that not proving sufficiently exact, they laid it aside for another by sand. The use of dials was earlier among the Greeks than the Romans. It was above three hundred years after the building of Rome before they knew any thing of them; but yet they had divided the day and night into twenty-four hours; though they did not count the hours numerically, but from midnight to midnight, distinguishing them by particular names, as by the cock-crowing, the dawn, the midday, &c. The first sun-dial we read of among the Romans, which divided the day into hours, is mentioned by Pliny, as fixed upon the temple of Quirinus by L. Papyrius, the censor, about the twelfth year of the wars with Pyrrhus. Scipio Nasica, some years after, measured the day and night into hours from the dropping of water.—BURDEN.

Ver. 13. And Hezekiah hearkened unto them, and showed them the house of his precious things, the silver, and the gold, and the spices, and the precious ointment, and all the house of his armour, and all that was found in his treasures: there was nothing in his house, nor in all his dominion, that Hezekiah showed them not.

The display which Hezekiah made of his treasure was to gratify the ambassadors of the king of Babylon. It appears to have been an extraordinary thing, and not done but upon this and occasions of a similar nature; such probably was the general practice. Lord Macartney informs us, that "the splendour of the emperor of China and his court, and the riches of the mandarins, surpass all that can be said of them. Their silks, porcelain, cabinets, and other furniture, make a most glittering appearance. These, however, are only exposed when they make or receive visits: for they commonly neglect themselves at home, the laws against private pomp and luxury being very severe."

Vertmannus, in his voyage to the East, describing the treasure of the king of Calicut, says, that it is esteemed so immense that it cannot be contained in two remarkably large cellars or warehouses. It consists of precious stones, plates of gold, and as much coined gold as may suffice to lade a hundred mules. They say that it was collected together by twelve kings who were before him, and that in his treasury is a coffer three spans long and two broad, full of precious stones of incalculable value. This custom for the eastern princes to amass enormous loads of treasure, merely for show and ostentation, appears to have been practised by the kings of Judea. One instance of it at least is found in the case of Hezekiah, in the passage now referred to.—BURDEN.

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver. 11. Because Manasseh king of Judah hath done these abominations, and hath done wickedly above all that the Amorites did, which were before him, and hath made Judah also to sin with his idols.

Bodin informs us from Maimonides, that it was customary among the Amorites to draw their new-born children through a flame; believing that by this means they would escape many calamities; and that Maimonides himself had been an eyewitness of this superstition in some of the nurses of Egypt.—BURDEN.

CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 17. Because they have forsaken me, and have burnt incense unto other gods, that they might provoke me to anger with all the works of their hands; therefore my wrath shall be kindled against this place, and shall not be quenched.

"Ah! who can quench the wrath of my enemy?" "Who? O, I have done it already, for his anger is turned to water." Does a person reply to another in such a way as to increase anger, it is asked, "Will ghee (clarified butter) quench fire?" "Do not cast ghee on that man's passions." "I beseech you to try to make peace for me." "Peace for you! can I quench his wrath?"—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Ver. 3. And the king stood by a pillar, and made a covenant before the LORD, to walk after the LORD, and to keep his commandments and his testimonies and his statutes, with all their heart and all their soul, to perform the words of this covenant that were written in this book: and all the people stood to the covenant.

See on 2 Kings 11. 14.

Ver. 7. And he brake down the houses of the Sodomites, that were by the house of the LORD, where the women wove hangings for the grove.

Very large hangings are used in the temples, some of which are fastened to the roof, others used as screens, and others to cover the sacred cars. On them are painted the actions of the gods, as described in the books Ramyanum and the Scanda Purāna; and there are portrayed things of the most indecent nature.—ROBERTS.

In the history of Schemselouhar and the prince of Persia, (Arabian Nights' Entertainment,) when the former was told that the calif was coming to visit her, she ordered the paintings on silk, which were in the garden, to be taken down. In the same manner are paintings or hangings said to be used in the passage referred to. The authority given for this custom must be allowed to be sufficient to vouch for the existence of the practice in question, to whatever animadversions the work itself may be liable in any other point of view.—BURDEN.

Ver. 11. And he took away the horses that the kings of Judah had given to the sun, at the entering in of the house of the LORD, by the chamber of Nathan-melech the chamberlain, which was in the suburbs, and burnt the chariots of the sun with fire.

The Hindoos believe that the sun is drawn in his course by seven horses, and that the deity sits in his chariot of one wheel, which is driven by Arunan. Thus may be seen the sun and his horses represented in wood, or painted on the hangings which adorn the cars. See, then, the profligacy of the kings of Judah: they gave horses and chariots to the sun as a sign of their attachment to that system of idolatry, and to procure those blessings which are believed to be dispensed by the gods; for it must be observed, that such gifts to the deities and their temples are only for the fulfilment of some vow for favours received, or for those which are earnestly desired.—ROBERTS.

By those horses, cannot well be understood, as the greater part of modern interpreters maintain, a number of sculptured figures of gold, silver, or brass, which had been presented as votive offerings to the heathen deity. The words of the sacred historian certainly refer to living horses for he simply states, that Josiah "took away the horses that the kings of Judah had given, or dedicated to the sun:" but had the figures of horses been intended, the clause, to correspond with the common manner of the sacred writers, must have run in these terms, He took away the horses of gold, of silver, or of brass; for in this way the molten calf of Aaron, the serpent of Moses, and the lions and oxen of Solomon, are distinguished in scripture from the real animals. Nor had he distinguished in one statue the horses from the chariot; nor assigned to them a particular station between the temple and the house of Nathan-melech; because they were parts and appendages of the same general figure. Besides, the destruction of the horses was effected by one operation, and the chariots by another, which shows that they were not metallic figures: Josiah took away, or (as the verb is rendered in other parts) destroyed the horses, but he burned the chariots in the fire. These horses were given or dedicated to the sun, to be offered in sacrifice to that luminary, according to some writers; or kept in honour of Baal, or Apollo, as others imagine. The Jewish writers allege that the priests of the sun led them forth at the dawn, with great pomp, into a large area, between the temple and the house of Nathanaelech, to salute their god, as soon as he appeared above the horizon.—PAXTON.

Ver. 21. And the king commanded all the people, saying, Keep the passover unto the Lord your God, as it is written in the book of the covenant. 22. Surely there was not holden such a passover from the days of the judges that judged Israel, nor in all the days of the kings of Israel, nor of the kings of Judah.

To those who may wonder how Jerusalem could receive such multitudes, as were obliged by the Jewish law to attend there three times a year, and as we know did sometimes actually appear in it, I would recite the account that Pitts gives of Mecca, the sacred city of the Mohammedans, and the number of people he found collected together there, for the celebration of their religious solemnities, in the close of the seventeenth century. This city, he tells us, he thought he might safely say, had not one thousand families in it of constant inhabitants, and the buildings very mean and ordinary. That four caravans arrive there every year, with great numbers of people in each, and the Mohammedans say, there meet not fewer than seventy thousand souls at these solemnities; and that though he could not think the number quite so large, yet that it is very great. How such numbers of people, with their beasts, could be lodged and entertained in such a little ragged town as Mecca, is a question he thus answers: "As for houseroom, the inhabitants do straiten themselves very much, in order at this time to make their market. And as for such as come last, after the town is filled, they pitch their tents without the town, and there abide until they remove towards home. As for provision, they all bring sufficient with them, except it be of flesh, which they may have at Mecca; but all other provisions, as butter, honey, oil, olives, rice, biscuit, &c. they bring with them as much as will last through the wilderness, forward and backward, as well as the time they stay at Mecca; and so for their camels they bring store of provender, &c. with them." The number of Jews that assembled at Jerusalem at their passover, was much greater; but had not Jerusalem been a much larger city than Mecca is, as in truth it was, yet the present Mohammedan practice of abiding under tents, and carrying their provisions and bedding with them, will easily explain how they might be accommodated. Josephus says, that in one year the number of lambs slain at the passover amounted to five hundred and fifty-six thousand five hundred, and that ten men at least ate of one lamb, and often many more, even to the number of twenty. Taking therefore the number of persons at the lowest computation, i. e. ten to one lamb, there must have been present this year at Jerusalem, not less than two million five hundred and sixty-five thousand persons!—HARMER.

Ver. 30. And his servants carried him in a chariot dead from Megiddo, and brought him to Jerusalem, and buried him in his own sepulchre. And the people of the land took Jehoahaz the son of Josiah, and anointed him, and made him king in his father's stead.

See on ch. 9. 28.

CHAPTER XXV.

Ver. 7. And they slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes, and put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and bound him with fetters of brass, and carried him to Babylon.

This was probably done with the intention of rendering the king incapable of ever reascending the throne. Thus it was a law in Persia down to the latest time, that no blind person could mount the throne. Hence the barbarous custom, common at the time of Chardin, and even since, of depriving the sons and male relations of a Persian king, who are not to be allowed to attain the government, of their sight. Down to the time of Abbas, who reigned in 1642, this was done, according to Chardin, only by passing a red-hot copper plate before the eyes. "But the power of vision was not so entirely destroyed, but that the person blinded still retained a glimmering; and the operation was frequently performed in so favourable a manner, that still some sight remained. During the reign of Abbas II., one of the brothers of that prince once visited his aunt and his nephew, whose palace joins the residence of the Dutch: as he expressed a wish to visit these strangers, they were informed of this, and they were invited to spend an afternoon, and take supper with them. The brother of the king brought several other blinded princes with him, and when candles were introduced, it was observed that they were aware of it. They were asked if they saw any thing. The king's brother answered in the affirmative, and added, that he could see enough to walk without a stick. This was unfortunately heard by one of the court spies, who were employed to watch all the motions of the great people. According to the custom of these people, he related it to the king in a malicious manner, and so that he could not avoid being uneasy. 'How!' cried he, 'these blind people boast they can see? I shall prevent that;' and immediately he ordered their eyes to be put out in the manner above described. This is performed by entirely putting out the eyes with the point of a dagger. The Persians," continues Chardin, "consider their policy towards the children of the royal family, as humane and laudable; since they only deprive them of their sight, and do not put them to death, as the Turks do. They say that it is allowable to deprive these princes of their sight, to secure the tranquillity of the state; but they dare not put them to death for two reasons; the first is, because the law forbids to spill innocent blood; secondly, because it might be possible that those who remained alive should die without children, and if there were no other relations, the whole legitimate family would become extinct."—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 30. And his allowance was a continual allowance given him of the king, a daily rate for every day, all the days of his life.

The other guests were arranged round the room, according to their respective ranks: among whom was an old man, a lineal descendant of the Seffi family, whom they called Nawab, and who took his seat next to the Ameenad-Dowlah. Although needy and without power, he is always treated with the greatest respect. 2 Sam. ix. 1. 7. He receives a daily sursat, or allowance, from the king, which makes his case resemble that of Jehoiahin, for his allowance was a continual allowance given him of the king, a daily rate, all the days of his life. 2 Kings xxv. 30. Giving to the Nawab a high rank in society, is illustrative of the precedence given to Jehoiahin, by setting his throne above the throne of the kings that were with him in Babylon.—MONIA.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 34. Now Sheshan had no sons, but daughters: and Sheshan had a servant, an Egyptian, whose name was Jarha. 35. And Sheshan gave his daughter to Jarha his servant to wife, and she bare him Attai.

The usages of the East differ very much from those of the West, with relation to the more than kind treatment of their servants; but they perfectly agree with those that are referred to in the scriptures. How far these have been taken notice of in explaining passages of holy writ, I do not know; but I believe the gathering up together, and presenting them in one view to my reader, will be a sort of novelty.

They marry their slaves frequently to their daughters, and that when they have no male issue, and those daughters are what we call great fortunes. That Hassan of whom Maillet gives a long account in his eleventh letter, and who was kiaz of the Asaphs of Cairo, that is to say, the colonel of four or five thousand men who go under that name, was the slave of a predecessor in that office, the famous Kamel, and married his daughter: "for Kamel," says he, "according to the custom of the country, gave him one of his daughters in marriage, and left him, at his death, one part of the great riches he had amassed together in the course of a long and prosperous life." What Sheshan then did, was perhaps not so extraordinary as we may have imagined, but perfectly conformable to old eastern customs, if not to the arrangements of Moses; at least it is, we see, just the same with what is now practised.—HARMER.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 39. And they went to the entrance of Gedor, even unto the east side of the valley, to seek pasture for their flocks. 40. And they found fat pasture and good, and the land was wide, and quiet, and peaceable; for they of Ham had dwelt there of old.

Our people, who are extremely watchful over their public pastures, to guard them from intruders, and so ready to go to law with their next neighbours about their right to common, or the number of beasts they shall feed there, may think it very strange that Abraham and Lot, the Kenites and Rechabites, should have been permitted to move up and down, and feed their flocks and herds unmolested, in inhabited countries as well as in deserts.

But this ancient custom still continues in Palestine, which, depopulated as it is, probably has as many inhabitants in its towns, as it had in the days of Abraham. Nor is this peculiar to Palestine; there are many that live in Barbary, and other places, in the same manner. And as the Kenites and Rechabites lived in Palestine in tents, and pastured their cattle there without molestation, when the country was very populous, so Maillet assures us, that great numbers of these people that live in tents, come into Egypt itself to pasture their cattle, a very populous country, and indeed the Holland of the Levant. As I do not know his account has ever appeared in English, I will here give it to the reader:—

"Besides these native inhabitants of Egypt, who have fixed habitations, and compose those numerous and populous villages of which I have spoken above, there are also in that part of the country that is next the deserts, and even often in those that border on the Nile, a sort of wandering people, who dwell in tents, and change their habitation, as the want of pasture or the variety of the seasons lead them. These people are called Bedouin Arabs; and we may reckon there are above two millions of them in Egypt. Some keep on the mountains, and at a distance from the cities and villages, but always in places where it is easy for them to have water. Others pitch their tents, which are very low and poor, in the neighbourhood of places that are inhabited, where they permit them for a small recompense to feed their flocks. They even give them up some lands to cultivate for their own use, only to avoid having any misunderstanding with people, who can do a great deal of mischief without any danger of having it returned upon them. For to avoid every thing of this kind, they have nothing to do but to penetrate a day's journey into the deserts, where, by their extreme frugality, and by the knowledge they have of places of water, they can subsist several months without great difficulty. There is not a more pleasing sight in the world, than the beholding, in the months of November, December, and January, those vast meadows, where the grass, almost as high as a man, is so thick that a bullock laid in it has enough of it without rising, within his reach, to feed on for a whole day, all covered with habitations and tents, with people and herds. And indeed it is at this time of the year that the Bedouins flock into Egypt, from three or four hundred leagues distance, in order to feed their camels and horses there. The tribute which they require of them for granting this permission, they pay with the produce of some manufactures of their wool, or with some sheep, which they sell, as well as their lambs, or some young camels, which they dispose of. As to what remains, accustomed as they are to extreme frugality, they live on a little, and a very small matter is sufficient for their support. After having spent a certain space of time in the neighbourhood of the Nile, they retire into the deserts, from whence, by routes with which they are acquainted, they pass into other regions, to dwell there in like manner some months of the year, till the return of the usual season calls them back to Egypt."

We see here that they are at liberty to feed their cattle, not only in the deserts adjoining to cultivated countries, but in those countries themselves, and in those that are full of people too. The commons then of these countries are not, cannot be, appropriated to this or that village, this or that district, but lie open to all, nor have they any notion of our rights of commoning. It was so anciently in Israel, as appears by the case of the Kenites and Rechabites, as well as by that ancient constitution among the Jews, ascribed by them to Joshua, and which is the first of ten that are supposed to have been established by him, by which it was lawful to feed a flock in the woods, everywhere, without any regard to the division of the lands between the tribes, so that those of the tribe of Naphtali might feed a flock in the woods of the tribe of Judah. These usages are extremely contrary to ours; the observing therefore that they continue still in full force in the East, may be requisite to engage us to admit such suppositions, in settling the Old Testament history, as we might otherwise hardly be willing to allow.—HARMER.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 10. And in the days of Saul they made war with the Hagarites, who fell by their hand: and they dwelt in their tents throughout all the east land of Gilead.

The shepherds are not the only class of people that live in tents; many Orientals forsake their villages at the approach of summer, for the more airy and refreshing shelter which they afford. This custom, which may be traced to an antiquity very remote, explains, in the most satisfactory manner, an incident in the history of Jacob. When the patriarch, in consequence of a divine admonition, had formed the resolution to return from Mesopotamia to his father's house, he sent for Rachel and Leah to his flocks, and there informed them of his design; and on their consenting to go with him, he set out upon his journey so silently, that Laban had no notice of it till the third day after his departure. It appears, however, that he carried all his effects with him, and tents for the accommodation of his family; and that Laban, who pursued him, had tents also for the use of his followers. The reason is, it was the time of sheep-shearing, when the masters and all their retainers commonly lived under tents in the open fields; and had the greater part, if not the whole of their furniture with them, on account of the entertainments which were given on these joyful occasions. Thus was Jacob equipped at once for his journey, and Laban for the pursuit. It is not more difficult to account for the intelligence not reaching Laban till the third day after Jacob's escape. Laban's flocks were in two divisions—one under the care of Jacob, the other committed to the care of Laban's sons, at the distance of three days' journey; and Jacob's own flock, under the management of his family, were, probably for the same reason, at an equal distance. Besides this, there might be other circumstances which retarded the progress of the messenger, which the sacred historian did not think it necessary to state; the fact is certain, and all the incidents of the story are natural and easy. The custom of living in tents was not confined to people in the country; persons of distinction often retired from the towns into the fields, and lived under tents during the heats of summer. Tahmasp, a Persian monarch, used to spend the winter at Casbin, and to retire in the summer three or four leagues into the country, where he lived in tents at the foot of Mount Alouvent, a place famed for its cool and pleasant retreats. His successors acted in the same manner, till the time of Abbas the Great, who removed his court to Ispahan.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 18. (Who hitherto waited in the king's gate eastward:) they were porters in the companies of the children of Levi.

This gate was so called, because Solomon built it and the rest of the wall on that side, at an extraordinary trouble and expense, raising the foundation four hundred cubits, or seven hundred and twenty-nine feet seven inches from the bottom of the deep valley of Kidron, by means of large stones, twenty cubits, or thirty-six feet five inches long, and six cubits, or ten feet ten inches high, so as to be on an equality with the rest of the surface. When Captain Light visited Jerusalem, in 1814, some of these large stones seem to have been remaining, for when describing the Turkish aga's house, which is built on the spot where the house of Pontius Pilate formerly stood, he says, "what attracted my observation most, were three or four layers of immense stones, apparently of the ancient town, forming part of the walls of the palace." The ancients delighted in building with these large kinds of stones, for in the ruins which we have of ancient buildings, they are often to be found of great magnitude. Mr. Wood, in his Ruins of Palmyra and Babec, states, "that the stones which compose the sloping wall of the latter are enormous; some are from twenty-eight to thirty-five feet long, and nine feet high. There are three of the following dimensions: fifty-eight feet high, and twelve thick; they are of white granite, with large shining flakes like gypsum."

At Bagdad, the gate Al Talism is "now bricked up, in honour of its having been entered in triumph by the Sultan Murad, after his having recovered Bagdad from the Persians, and the weak grasp of the unworthy son of the great Abbas. In consequence of this signal event, the portal was instantly closed on the victor having marched through, and from that day has never been reopened. This custom of shutting up any passage that has been peculiarly honoured, that it may not be profaned by vulgar footsteps, appears to have prevailed very generally over the East. I found an instance of it at Ispahan, where the Ali Copi gate is, in like manner, held sacred for a similar reason." (Sir R. K. Porter).—BURDER.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 9. And when they had stripped him, they took his head, and his armour, and sent into the land of the Philistines round about to carry tidings unto their idols, and to the people.

After Saul had fallen on Mount Gilboa, his enemies "stripped him, and took off his head, and sent the tidings to their idols." When the heathen of the present day gain a victory over their enemies, they always take the tidings to their idols. There is the king, and there his general, and troops, and priests, and people, marching in triumph to the temple. Then they relate to the gods all their proceedings; how they conquered the foe, and that to them they have come to give the glory. But this practice is had recourse to, also, in the common affairs of life. A man delivered from prison, or any great emergency, always goes to his gods, to carry the joyful tidings. Hear them relate the story: "Ah! Swamy, you know Mutoo wanted to ruin me; he therefore forged a deed in my name, and tried to get my estates; but I resisted him, and it has just been decided before the court, that he is guilty. I am therefore come to praise you, O Swamy!"—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 41. Uriah the Hittite, Zabab the son of Ahlai.

Foreigners resident in the country were permitted to serve in the Jewish armies, and they sometimes rose to a very high rank; for both Uriah and Ittai, who seemed to have held principal commands in the armies of David, were aboriginal Canaanites. But in succeeding ages, the kings of Judah, affecting to imitate the policy of the surrounding potentates, or distrusting the omnipotent protection of Jehovah, occasionally hired large bodies of foreign troops to fight their battles, who, like mercenaries of later times, after expelling the invaders, sometimes turned their arms against their employers, and ravaged the country which they came to protect.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 8. And of the Gadites there separated themselves unto David, into the hold to the wilderness, men of might, and men of war fit for the battle, that could handle shield and buckler, whose faces were like the faces of lions, and were as swift as the roes upon the mountains.

See on 2 Sam. 2. 18.

Ver. 15. These are they that went over Jordan in the first month, when it had overflowed all his banks; and they put to flight all them of the valleys, both towards the east and towards the west.

See on Josh. 3. 15.

Ver. 40. Moreover, they that were nigh them, even unto Issachar and Zebulun and Naphtali, brought bread on asses, and on camels, and on mules, and on oxen; and meat, meal, cakes of figs, and bunches of raisins, and wine, and oil, and oxen, and sheep abundantly: for there was joy in Israel.

The strong and docile ox was also taught to submit his shoulder to the heavy burden; for, at the accession of David to the throne of Israel, the people brought "bread on asses, and on camels, and on mules, and on oxen." He is less fitted, indeed, by the rotundity of his form, for this species of labour, than for those just mentioned. But although the very back of the ox, according to this elegant writer, declares that it has not been formed to receive a load, yet the concurring testimony of past ages assures us that it is not altogether unfit for that purpose. Elian observes, that the bull submits to the bier, and carries a boy or a girl on his neck, and a woman on his back. The Roman authors mounted Bacchus on a bull, and made Europa travel in the same manner. These facts prove, that it was by no means uncommon to use the ox for burdens of every kind, and even for the saddle; a custom which Mr. Bruce avers, is still practised among some tribes. In Guzerat the oxen are perfectly white, with black horns, a skin delicately soft, and eyes rivalling those of the antelope in brilliant lustre. Those reared in the northern part of the province are noble animals, superior in size, strength, and docility; some of them travel with a hackery, a vehicle for the conveyance of women and children, from thirty to forty miles a day; and are yoked to the carriages of wealthy Hindoos in distant parts of India. In sweetness of temper and gentleness of manners they nearly resemble the elephant. Some of these oxen are valued at nearly two hundred pounds sterling.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 16. And David the king came and sat before the LORD, and said, Who am I, O LORD God, and what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?

The ceremonial of the Orientals does not end with the introduction of persons to one another, but continues during the whole visit. The most scrupulous attention is paid by all parties to the established tokens of respect; the posture of the body, the part of the room, and other circumstances, are all regulated by custom, to whose imperious dictates they have implicitly submitted from the remotest antiquity. One of the postures by which a person testifies his respect for a superior, is by sitting upon his heels, which is considered as a token of great humility. In this manner, says Dr. Pococke, resting on their hams, sat the attendants of the English consul, when he waited on the caia of the pacha of Tripoli. It was in this humble posture, probably, that David, the king of Israel, sat before the Lord in the sanctuary, when he blessed him for his gracious promise concerning his family; half sitting and half kneeling, so as to rest the body upon the heels. This entirely removes the ground of perplexity, which some expositors have felt, in their attempts to elicit a meaning from the phrase, sitting before the Lord, at once consistent with the majesty of Jehovah, and the humility of the worshipper; for this attitude expressed among the Orientals the deepest humility, and by consequence, was every way becoming a worshipper of the true God.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Ver. 9. Now when Tou king of Hamath heard how David had smitten all the host of Hadarezer king of Zobah, 10. He sent Hadoram his son to King David, to inquire of his welfare, and to congratulate him, because he had fought against Hadarezer, and smitten him; (for Hadarezer had war with Tou;) and with him all manner of vessels of gold and silver and brass.

Here, again, we have a beautiful and simple picture of eastern manners. Tou, the heathen king, sent a messenger to compliment David on his success over his enemies. Who, in the East, has not witnessed similar things? Has a man gained a case in a court of law; has he been blessed by the birth of a son; has he given his daughter in marriage; has he gained a situation under government; has he returned from a voyage or a journey, or finished a successful speculation—then his friends and neighbours send messengers to congratulate him—to express the joy they feel in his prosperity; “so much so, that, had it come to themselves, their pleasure could not have been greater.”—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver. 1. And Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel.

See on 2 Sam. 24. 1.

Ver. 5. And Joab gave the sum of the number of the people unto David. And all they of Israel were a thousand thousand and a hundred thousand men that drew sword: and Judah was four hundred threescore and ten thousand men that drew sword.

Few things in history are more surprising than the great numbers which are recorded as forming eastern armies, even the scripture accounts of the armies that invaded Judea, or were raised in Judea, often excite the wonder of their readers. To parallel these great numbers by those of other armies, is not all that is acceptable to the inquisitive; it is requisite also to show how so small a province as the Holy Land really was, could furnish such mighty armies of fighting men; with the uncertainty of the proportion of these fighting men to the whole number of the nation; in respect to which many unfounded conjectures have escaped the pens of the learned. This includes more importance than may be at first sight attached to it, because it is well known that Josephus, in narrating the same facts, often gives different numbers. In the story of Abijah, 1 Kings xv. 5, we read in some MSS. 40,000, instead of 400,000. The question is, which is wrong? since it has been concluded that both could not be right. Besides this, the answers to those who question the possibility of the Holy Land maintaining so great a population as the armies mentioned implies, have usually taken the proportion which Europe furnishes of fighting men to the mass of its inhabitants; and very erroneous conclusions (as I conceive) have been drawn from such calculations. It must be admitted, that the passages in which numbers are expressed in all ancient writings, and by parity of reason, in the scriptures, seem, more than many others, to justify suspicion of error in our present copies; and to understand them correctly requires much attention and information; especially when such numbers are very great. Having premised this, I proceed to attempt two particulars: first, by instances of numerous armies which have been occasionally raised, to show what may be done by despotic power, or the impulse of military glory; secondly, to show that the composition of Asiatic armies is such as may render credible those numbers which express their gross amount; while no just inference respecting the entire population of a country can be drawn from the numbers stated as occasionally composing its armies. As to the first particular, the accounts of the armies of Semiramis, of Darius, and of Xerxes, are in everybody's hands, but as these are not without suspicion of having been enlarged, either purposely by misreport, or accidentally by errors in copyists, I decline them; and rather submit to the reader's attention the account given by Knolles in his “History of the Turks,” of the contending armies of Bajazel and Tamerlane. It is no bad specimen of the “I will” of military power, of the cares and anxieties attending on the station of command, and of the feelings of great minds on great occasions.

“So, marching on, Tamerlane at length came to Bachi-chich, where he staid to refresh his army eight daies, and there again took a generall muster thereof, wherein were found (as most write) four hundred thousand horse, and six hundred thousand foot; or, as some others that were there present affirm, three hundred thousand horsemen, and five hundred thousand foot of al nations. Vnto whom he there gaue a generall pay, and, as his manner was, made vnto them an oration, informing them of such orders as he would haue kept, to the end they might the better obserue the same: with much other militarie discipline, whereof he was very curious with his captains. At which time, also, it was lawfull for every common soldier to behold him with more boldness than on other daies, forasmuch as he did for that time, and such like, lay aside his imperial majestie, and shew himselfe more familiar vnto them. . . . .” Page 215.

“Malcozzius hauing made true relation vnto Bajazel, was by him demanded ‘whether of the two armies he thought bigger or stronger?’ for now Bajazel had assembled a mightie armie of three hundred thousand men, or, as some report, of three hundred thousand horsemen and two hundred thousand foot. Whereunto Malcozzius, hauing before craved pardon, answered, ‘That it could not be, but that Tamerlane might in reason haue the greater number, for that he was a commander of farre greater countries.’ Wherewith proud Bajazel offended, in great chollier replied, ‘Out of doubt, the sight of the Tartarian hath made this coward so afraid, that he thinketh every enemye to be two.’” 216. . . . “All which Tamerlane, walking this night vp and down in his campe, heard, and much reioiced to see the hope that his soldiers had already in general conceived of the victory. Who after the second watch returning unto his pavillion, and there casting himself upon a carpet, had thought to haue slept a while; but his cares not suffering him so to do, he then, as his manner was, called for a booke, wherein was contained the lives of his fathers and ancestors, and of other valient worthies, the which he used ordinarily to read, as he then did: not as therwith vainly to deceive the time, but to make vse thereof, by the imitation of that which was by them worthily done, and declining of such dangers as they by their rashness or oversight fel into." Page 218. . . . [Vide the same kind of occupation of Ahasuerus, Esther vi. 1.]

... "My will is," said Tamerlane, "that my men come forward unto me, as soon as they may, for I will advance forward with an hundred thousand footmen, fiftie thousand vpon each of my two wings, and in the midst of them forty thousand of my best horsemen. My pleasure is, that after they haue tried the force of these men, that they come vnto my avauitgard, of whom I wil dispose, and fifty thousand horse more in three bodies, whom thou shalt command: which I will assist with 80,000 horse, wherein shall be mine own person: hauing 100,000 footmen behind me, who shall march in two squadrons: and for my arereward I appoint 40,000 horse, and fiftie thousand footmen, who shall not march, but to my aid. And I will make choice of 10,000 of my best horse, whom I will send into euery place where I shall thinke needfull within my armie, for to impart my commands." (Knolles's History of the Turks, page 218.)

[It is impossible, on this occasion, not to recollect the immense army led by Napoleon Bonaparte into Russia, exceeding six hundred thousand troops; also the forces engaged around Leipsic, amounting (including both sides) to half a million of men. Vide LITERARY PANORAMA, for November, 1813.]

It may be said, "Such mighty empires may well be supposed to raise forces, to which the small state of Judea was incompetent;" and this may safely be admitted. But what was in all probability, the nature and composition of the Jewish, as of other eastern armies, we may learn from the following relations, which contribute to strengthen the credibility of the greater numbers recorded as composing them. I shall first offer what Baron De Tott reports of the armies raised by the cham of the Crimea; and then, as still more descriptive of Asiatic armies, especially of those raised on the spur of an occasion, the remarks of M. Volney: "It may be presumed that the rustic, frugal life, which these pastoral people lead, favours population, while the wants and excesses of luxury, among polished nations, strike at its very root. In fact, it is observed, that the people are less numerous under the roofs of the Crimea, and the province of Boodjack, than in the tents of the Nogais. The best calculation we can make, is from a view of the military forces which the cham is able to assemble. We shall soon see this prince raising three armies at the same time; one of a hundred thousand men, which he commanded in person; another of sixty thousand, commanded by the calga; and a third of forty thousand, by the nooradin. He had the power of raising double the number, without prejudice to the necessary labours of the state.

"The invasion of New Serbia, which had been determined on at Constantinople, was consented to in the assembly of the grand vassals of Tartary, and orders were expedited, throughout the provinces, for the necessary military supplies. Three horsemen were to be furnished by eight families, which number was estimated to be sufficient for the three armies, which were all to begin their operations at once. That of the nooradin, consisting of forty thousand men, had orders to repair to the Little Don; that of the calga, of sixty thousand, was to range the left coast of the Boristhenes, till they came beyond the Orela; and that which the cham commanded in person, of a hundred thousand, was to penetrate into New Serbia." (De Tott.)

"Sixty thousand men, with them, are very far from being synonymous with sixty thousand soldiers, as in our armies. That of which we are now speaking affords a proof of this; it might amount, in fact, to forty thousand men, which may be classed as follows:—Five thousand Mamlouk cavalry, which was the whole effective army; about fifteen hundred Barbary Arabs, on foot, and no other infantry, for the Turks are acquainted with none; with them the cavalry is every thing. Besides these, each Mamlouk having in his suite two footmen, armed with staves, these would form a body of ten thousand valets, besides a number of servants and serradgis, or attendants on horseback, for the bey and kachefs, which may be estimated at two thousand: all the rest were sutlers, and the usual train of followers. Such was this army, as described to be in Palestine, by persons who had seen and followed it. The Asiatic armies are mobs, their marches ravages, their campaigns mere inroads, and their battles bloody frays. The strongest, or the most adventurous party, goes in search of the other, which is not unfrequently flies without offering resistance: if they stand their ground, they engage pellmell, discharge their carbines, break their spears, and hack each other with their sabres; for they rarely have any cannon, and when they have, they are but of little service. A panic frequently diffuses itself without cause: one party flies, the other pursues, and shouts victory; the vanquished submits to the will of the conqueror, and the campaign often terminates without a battle." (Volney.)

It appears, by these extracts, that the numbers which compose the gross of Asiatic armies are very far from denoting the true number of soldiers, fighting men, of that army; in fact, when we deduct those whose attendance is of little advantage, it may be not very distant from truth, if we say, nine out of ten are such as, in Europe, would be forbid the army; nor is the suggestion absolutely despicable, that when we read 40, instead of 400, the true fighting corps of soldiers only are reckoned and stated. However that may be, these authorities are sufficient to justify the possibility of such numbers as scripture has recorded, being assembled for purposes of warfare; of which purposes plunder is not one of the least, in the opinion of those who usually attend a camp. It follows, also, that no conclusive estimate of the population of a kingdom can be drawn from such assemblages, under such circumstances; and therefore, that no calculation ought to be hazarded on such imperfect data.—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

CHAPTER XXII.

VER. 19. Now set your heart and your soul to seek the LORD your God: arise, therefore, and build ye the sanctuary of the LORD God, to bring the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and the holy vessels of God, into the house that is to be built to the name of the LORD.

In all heathen temples, there are numerous vessels of brass, silver, and gold, which are especially holy. Those, however, of the highest castes, may be allowed to touch, and even borrow them for certain purposes. Thus, a native gentleman, who is going to give a feast, borrows the large caldron for the purpose of boiling the rice; should his daughter be about to be married, he has the loan of the silver salvers, plates, and even jewels; which, however, must all be purified by incense and other ceremonies when returned to the temple. "The ark" finds a striking illustration in the keadagam of the Hindoos,—a model of which may be seen in the house of the Royal Asiatic Society. In it are placed the idols, and other sacred symbols, which are carried on men's shoulders.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXVI.

VER. 6. Also unto Shemaiah his son were sons born, that ruled throughout the house of their father: for they were mighty men of valour.

It has been a frequent complaint among learned men, that it is commonly difficult, and oftentimes impossible, to illustrate many passages of the Jewish history, referred to in the annals of their princes, and in the predictions of their prophets, for want of profane historians of the neighbouring nations, of any great antiquity; upon which I have been ready to think, that it might not be altogether vain to compare with those more ancient transactions, events of a later date that have happened in those countries, in nearly similar circumstances, since human nature is much the same in all ages, allowing for the eccentricity that sometimes arises from some distinguishing prejudices of that particular time. The situation of the Christian kings of Jerusalem, in particular, in the twelfth century, bears, in many respects, a strong resemblance to that of the kings of Judah; and the history of the crusades may serve to throw some light on the transactions of the Jewish princes. At least the comparing them together may be amusing. It is said of King Uzziah, 1 Chron. xxvi. 6, that "he went forth and warred against the Philistines, and broke down the wall of Gath, and the wall of Jabneh, and the wall of Ashdod, and built cities about Ashdod and among the Philistines." Thus we find, in the time of the crusades, when that ancient city of the Philistines, called Ashkelon, had frequently made inroads into the territories of the kingdom of Jerusalem, the Christians built two strong castles not far from Ashkelon; and finding the usefulness of these structures, King Fulk, in the spring of the year of our Lord 1138, attended by the patriarch of Jerusalem and his other prelates, proceeded to build another castle, called Blanche Garde, which he garrisoned with such soldiers as he could depend upon, furnishing them with arms and provisions. These watching the people of Ashkelon, often defeated their attempts, and sometimes they did not content themselves with being on the defensive, but attacked them, and did them great mischief, gaining the advantage of them. This occasioned those who claimed a right to the adjoining country, encouraged by the neighbourhood of such a strong place, to build many villages, in which many families dwelt, concerned in tilling the ground, and raising provisions for other parts of their territories. Upon this the people of Ashkelon, finding themselves encompassed round by a number of inexpugnable fortresses, began to grow very uneasy at their situation, and to apply to Egypt for help by repeated messages! Exactly in the same manner we may believe Uzziah built cities about Ashdod, that were fortified to repress the excursions of its inhabitants, and to secure to his people the fertile pastures which lay thereabout; and which pastures, I presume, the Philistines claimed, and indeed all the low land from the foot of the mountains to the sea, but to which Israel claimed a right, and of a part of which this powerful Jewish prince actually took possession, and made settlements for his people there, which he thus guarded from the Ashdodites: "He built cities about Ashdod, even among the Philistines," for so I would render the words, as the historian appears to be speaking of the same cities in both clauses. Uzziah did more than King Fulk could do, for he beat down the walls not only of Gath and Jabneh, two neighbouring cities, but of Ashdod itself, which must have cut off all thoughts of their disturbing the Jewish settlers, protected by strong fortresses, when they themselves lay open to those garrisons. Ashkelon, on the contrary, remained strongly fortified, by fortresses built by the Christians.—HARMER.

Ver. 13. And they cast lots, as well the small as the great, according to the house of their fathers, for every gate. 14. And the lot eastward fell to Shelemiah. Then for Zechariah his son (a wise counsellor) they cast lots, and his lot came out northward. 15. To Obed-edom southward; and to his sons the house of Ashipim. 16. To Shuppim and Hosah the lot came forth westward, with the gate Shallechoth, by the causeway of the going up, ward against ward.

Thus the gates were assigned to the different officers by lot. On the death of a parent, the whole of his fields and gardens are often divided among his children, and great disputes generally arise as to whom shall be given this or that part of the property. One says, "I will have the field to the east." "No," says another, "I will have that;" and it is not till they have quarrelled and exhausted their store of ingenuity and abuse, that they will consent to settle the matter by lot. The plan they take is as follows: they draw on the ground the cardinal points: they then write the names of the parties on separate leaves, and mix them all together: a little child is then called, and told to take one leaf and place it on any point of the compass he pleases; this being done, the leaf is opened, and to the person whose name is found therein will be given the field or garden which is in that direction. I think it therefore probable, that the lot's eastward, westward, northward, and southward, which fell to Shelemiah, Zechariah, Obed-edom, and Shuppim, were drawn something in the same way.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 27. Out of the spoils won in battles did they dedicate to maintain the house of the Lord.

According to the law of Moses, the booty was to be divided equally between those who were in the battle, and those who were in the camp, whatever disparity there might be in the number of each party. The law further requires, that out of that part of the spoils which was assigned to the fighting men, the Lord's share should be separated; and for every five hundred men, oxen, sheep, &c. they were to take one for the high-priest, as being the Lord's first-fruits, and out of the other moiety belonging to the children of Israel, they were to give for every fifty men, oxen, sheep, &c. one to the Levites. Among the Greeks and Romans the plunder was brought together into one common stock, and divided afterward among the officers and soldiers, paying some respect to their rank in the distribution. Sometimes the soldiers made a reserve of the chief part of the booty, to present, by way of compliment, to their respective generals. The gods were always remembered. And the priests had sufficient influence to procure them a handsome offering, and other acceptable presents.—BURSER.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Ver. 25. And over the king's treasures was Azmaveth the son of Adiel: and over the store-houses in the fields, in the cities, and in the villages, and in the castles, was Jehonathan the son of Uzziah.

Subterranean granaries were common in the East. The following is a detailed account of those now used by the Moors:—After the harvest they used to enclose their corn in subterranean granaries, which are pits dug in the earth, where the corn is preserved for a considerable time. This custom is very ancient, and ought to be general in all warm countries, inhabited by wandering people. To secure the corn from moisture, they line these pits with straw, in proportion as they fill them, and cover them with the same; when the granary is filled, they cover it with a stone, upon which they put some earth in a pyramidal form, to disperse the water in case of rain. Among the wealthier part, the fathers commonly fill one granary at the birth of each child, and empty it at their marriage. I have seen corn preserved in this manner during five-and-twenty years. It had lost its whiteness. When by motives of convenience, or by an imperial order, the Moors are obliged to change their habitations, not being able to carry their grain with them, they leave over these granaries a mark of stones heaped together: they have much trouble in finding them again. It is the custom now to observe the earth at the rising of the sun, when a thick vapour ascends from them: they then discover the granary, upon which the sun has a marked effect, on account of the fermentation of the corn which is shut up.—BURSER.

Ver. 28. And over the olive-trees, and the sycamore-trees that were in the low plains, was Ban-hanan the Gederite: and over the cellars of oil was Joash.

When our translation represents Joash as over the cellars of oil, in the time of King David, 1 Chron. xxvii. 28, they have certainly without any necessity, and perhaps improperly, substituted a particular term for a general expression. Joash was at that time, according to the sacred historian, over the treasures of oil; but whether it was kept in cellars, or in some other way, does not at all appear in the original history. The modern Greeks, according to Dr. Richard Chandler, do not keep their oil in cellars, but in large earthen jars, sunk in the ground, in areas before their houses. The custom might obtain among the Jews: as they it was needless, it must be improper to use the particular term cellars, when the original uses a word of the most general signification. It is certain they sometimes buried their oil in the earth, in order to secrete it in times of danger, on which occasion they must be supposed to choose the most unlikely places, where such concealment would be least suspected, in their fields; whether they were wont to bury it, at other times, in their courtyards, cannot be so easily ascertained.—HARMER.

The Egyptians are not the only people to whose palate the fruit of the sycamore is agreeable; Hasselquist, the Swedish traveller, found it very grateful to the taste; he describes it as soft, watery, and sweetish, with something of an aromatic flavour. The fruit of this tree comes to maturity several times in a season; according to some writers not fewer than seven times, although prolific figs, or such as are perfectly formed, ripen only once. Thus the sycamore produces a fresh crop of agreeable, and not unwholesome fruit, seven times a-year, for the use of those that dwell under its shadow; a boon which perhaps no other tree in the garden of Nature bestows on man. Nor is it a dangerous or a laborious task to gather the figs; they seem to have so little hold of the parent tree, that "if they be shaken, they shall even fall into the mouth of the eater." The disposition of the fig-tree to part with her untimely or precocious figs, is noticed by John, in the book of Revelation: "And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind." This accounts for the appointment of a particular officer in the reign of David, whose sole duty it was to watch over the plantations of sycamore and olive-trees: "And over the olive-trees and the sycamore-trees that were in the low plains, was Baalhanan the Gederite." So valuable was the sycamore in the land of Canaan, during the reign of David, (from which undoubtedly may be inferred the high estimation in which it was held in every age,) that, in the commission of Baalhanan, the officer charged with its protection, it is joined with the olive, one of the most precious gifts which the God of nature has bestowed on the oriental nations. Hasselquist found the sycamore growing in great numbers in the plains and fields of Lower Egypt, which verifies the accuracy of the inspired writer; and it appears from the same traveller, that the olive delights in similar situations; for, in his journey from Jaffa to Rama, he passed through fine vales abounding with olive-trees.—FAXTON.

Ver. 30. Over the camels also was Obil the Ishmaelite: and over the asses was Jehdeiah the Meronothite.

Natural historians mention two varieties of this animal, the domestic and the wild ass; but it is to the former our attention at present is to be directed. His colour is generally a reddish brown; a circumstance to which he owes his name in the Hebrew text; for (אמר) amur is derived from a verb which signifies to be red or dun. This appears to have been the predominating colour in the oriental regions; but we learn from the song of Deborah, that some asses were white, and on this account reserved for persons of high rank in the state. The term (אלון) alhon is another name for that creature, from a root which signifies to be firm or strong; because he is equal to a greater load than any animal of the same size. To this quality Jacob alluded in his last benediction: "Issachar is a strong ass, couching down between two burdens." Or, it may refer to the stubborn temper for which he is remarkable, and the stupid insensibility which enables him to disregard the severest castigation, till he has accomplished his purpose. These qualities are beautifully described by Homer, in the 11th book of the Iliad; but the passage is too long to be quoted.

In the patriarchal ages, the breed of this animal, which we regard with so much unmerited contempt, was greatly encouraged, and constituted no inconsiderable portion of wealth among oriental shepherds. It is on this account the number of asses in the herds of Abram, and other patriarchs, is so frequently stated by Moses, in the book of Genesis. So highly were they valued in those times of primitive simplicity, that they were formed into separate droves, and committed to the management of princes, and other persons of distinction. The sacred historian informs us, that Anab, a Horite prince, did not think it unbecoming his dignity to feed the asses of Zibeon his father: and that the sons of Jacob seized the asses of Shechem and his people, and drove them away, with the sheep and the oxen. During the seven years of famine that wasted the land of Egypt, and reduced the people to the greatest distress, Joseph purchased their asses, and gave them corn to preserve them alive. When the people of Israel subdued the Midianites, they carried away "threescore and one thousand asses." In times long posterior, Saul, the son of Kish, was sent in quest of his father's asses, which had strayed from their pasture; and he was engaged in this service when the prophet Samuel received a command to anoint him king over Israel. After David's accession to the throne, and the Lord had given him rest from all his enemies, he appointed Jehdeiah the Meronothite, a prince in Israel, to superintend this part of his property. Nor was this animal unworthy of such attention and care. His humility, patience, and temperance, qualities in which he greatly excels, eminently fitted him for the service of man. His great value was soon discovered, and he was preferred even to the horse, for many domestic purposes. The sons of Jacob employed him to carry burdens of every kind; and he seems to have been the only quadruped they took with them in their repeated journeys into Egypt, to purchase corn for their households; and their descendants continued for many ages to employ him in the same manner. The fruits of the field, the produce of the vineyard, provisions and merchandise of all kinds, were carried on the backs of asses.

He was long used for the saddle in the oriental regions, and persons of high rank appeared in public, mounted on this animal. Those which the great and wealthy selected for their use, were larger and more elegant animals than the mean and unshapely creature with which we are acquainted. Dr. Russel, in his history of Aleppo, mentions a variety of the ass in Syria, much larger than the common breed; and other travellers say, that some of them in Persia are kept like horses for the saddle, which have smooth hair, carry their heads well, and are quicker in their motions than the ordinary kind, which are dressed like horses and taught to amble like them.—FAXTON.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Ver. 24. And all the princes, and the mighty men, and all the sons likewise of King David, submitted themselves unto Solomon the king.

The Hebrew has, for submitted, "Gave the hand under." To give "the hand under," is a beautiful orientalism to denote submission. See the man who wishes to submit to a superior; he stands at a short distance, then stooping, he keeps moving his hands to the ground, and says, "I submit, my lord." "You recollect having heard that Kandan and Chinnan had a serious quarrel?"—"Yes, I heard it."—"Well, they have settled the matter now, for Chinnan went to him last evening, and 'gave his hand under.'" "The Meddler is no longer angry with me, because I have put down my hand to the ground." "That rebellious son has, for many years, refused to acknowledge his father's authority, but he has at last put his hand under," i. e. he has submitted to him—has become obedient.—ROBERTS. ## THE SECOND BOOK OF CHRONICLES.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 16. And Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and linen yarn; the king's merchants received the linen yarn at a price.

See on I Kings 10. 23.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 12. Also the Levites, which were the singers, all of them of Asaph, of Heman, of Jeduthun, with their sons and their brethren, being arrayed in white linen, having cymbals and psalteries and harps, stood at the east end of the altar, and with them a hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets.

No person in Greece and Italy appeared at an entertainment in black, because it was a colour reserved for times of mourning, but always in white, or some other cheerful colour, which corresponded with the joyous nature of the occasion. Such were the garments of salvation in which the people of Israel celebrated their festivals, or entertained their friends. When Solomon brought up the ark of the Lord from the city of David, and placed it between the cherubim in the most holy place, the sons of Asaph, of Heman, and Jeduthun, and their brethren, who conducted the songs in the temple, stood at the east end of the altar, arrayed in vestures of fine linen, the chosen emblem of purity and joy. The few faithful witnesses that remained in Sardis, and had not defiled their garments, were promised the distinguishing honour of walking with their Saviour in white. And to encourage them in their steadfast adherence to the cause of God and truth, it is added, "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment." On the mount of transfiguration, the raiment of Christ became white as the light; and in the same garb of joy and gladness the angels appear at his resurrection.—ΠΑΡΣΟΝ.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 28. If there be death in the land, if there be pestilence, if there be blasting, or mildew, locusts, or caterpillars; if their enemies besiege them in the cities of their land; whatsoever sore or whatsoever sickness there be.

We are so little acquainted with the various species of destructive insects that ravage the eastern countries, that it may be thought extremely difficult to determine what kind was meant by Solomon, in his prayer at the dedication of the temple, 2 Chron. vi. 28, by the word (חַשְׂעוֹן) chaseel, which our version renders caterpillars, and which is distinguished by him there from the locusts, which genus is so remarkable for eating up almost every green thing; but a passage of Sir John Chardin may probably illustrate that part of Solomon's address to him whom he considered as the God of universal nature. The paragraph of Solomon's prayer is this: When heaven is shut up, and there is no rain, because they have sinned against thee; if they pray towards this place, &c. . . . If there be in the land famine, if there be pestilence, blasting, mildew, locusts, or if there be caterpillars; if their enemies besiege them in the land of their cities, &c. . . . Then hear thou in heaven thy dwelling-place, and forgive and do, &c. The causes of famine, reckoned up here, are want of rain, blasting, mildew, locusts, and caterpillars, according to our translation: with which may be compared the following passage of Chardin, in the second tome of his Travels: "Persia is subject to have its harvest spoiled by hail, by drought, or by insects, either locusts, or small insects, which they call sim, which are small white lice, which fix themselves on the foot of the stalk of corn, gnaw it, and make it die. It is rare for a year to be exempt from one or the other of these scourges, which affect the ploughed land and the gardens," &c. The enumeration by Solomon, and that of this modern writer, though not exactly alike, yet so nearly resemble each other, that one would be inclined to believe these small insects are what Solomon meant, by the word translated caterpillars in our English version.—HARMER.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 13. If I shut up heaven that there be no rain, or if I command the locusts to devour the land, or if I send pestilence among my people.

A term used by the sacred writers to signify the locust, is (חַגָב) hagab, which our translators render sometimes locust and sometimes grasshopper. They translate it locusts in the following passage: "If I shut up heaven that there be no more rain, or if I command the locusts (hagab) to devour the land, or if I send a pestilence among my people: if my people shall humble themselves and pray unto me, and seek my face, then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin, and heal their land." We cannot reasonably doubt that the word, in this place, denotes the locust, for this declaration was made in answer to Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple, that if the heaven should be shut up, and there should be no rain; or if there should be famine, pestilence, blasting, mildew, locust, or caterpillar, then God would hear them when they spread forth their hands towards that holy place. It must also be remembered, that the grasshopper is an inoffensive animal, or noxious in a very slight degree, and therefore by no means a proper subject for deprecation in the temple. This circumstance also shows, that the Hebrew term here does not mean the cicada, as some writers have supposed; for though the noise which they make is extremely disagreeable and disturbing, as Chandler complains, it is not an insect so distressing to the Orientals, as to admit the idea that it was a subject of solemn prayer at the dedication. To disturb the slumbers of the weary traveller, or the toil-worn peasant, and to devour the fruits of the earth, and plunge the inhabitants of a country into all the horrors of famine, are evils of a very different magnitude.

Hagab is rendered grasshopper in the twelfth chapter of Ecclesiastes; and the circumstances, it must be confessed, harmonize with the character of those creatures; for it will be readily admitted that their chirping must be disagreeable to the aged and infirm, that naturally love quiet, and are commonly unable to bear much noise. But it is more probable that hagab denotes the locust, which is proverbially loquacious. They make a very loud, screaming, and disagreeable noise, with their wings; if one begin, others join, and the hateful concert becomes universal; a pause then ensues, and, as it were, on a signal given, it again commences; and in this manner they continue squalling for two or three hours without intermission. Mr. Harmer is of opinion, that hagab ought to be rendered locust in this passage too, because it becomes a burden by its depredations, and desire fails; that is, every green thing disappears, and nature puts on the semblance of universal deadness; and such is the affecting appearance of the human body in extreme old age; it resembles a tree which the locust has stripped of its leaves, has deprived of its bark, and left naked and bare, to wither in the blast, and moulder, by degrees, into the dust from whence it rose. The interpretation is ingenious; but the common meaning seems to be still more expressive, and is certainly more affecting. Some kinds of the locust are very small and light. Were the cicada not to be classed among the locust tribes, still the figure remains in all its force and beauty. The minutest of those small insects becomes a burden to extreme old age, weighed down with a load of years, and worn with toil and cares, to the verge of existence. The powers and faculties of body and mind are equally debilitated, and the relish for the enjoyments of sense, which he once felt so keenly, is extinguished for ever. Some insects live under a regular government, and, like the bee, submit to the authority of a chief; but the wise man observes, "The locusts have no king, yet they go forth by bands." How just is this remark! The head of the column, when the army is not tossed and scattered by the winds, which often happens, is directed by their voracious desire of food; and the rest follow in long succession, under the influence of the same instinct; but the devastations they commit are as methodical and complete, as if they acted under the strictest discipline.

In Barbary and Palestine, the locusts appear about the latter end of March. By the middle of April their numbers are so increased, that in the heat of the day they form themselves into large and numerous swarms, fly in the air like a succession of clouds; and, as the prophet Joel expresses it, "darken the sun." When a brisk gale happens to blow, so that these swarms are crowded by others, or thrown one upon another, the musing and intelligent traveller obtains a lively idea of the Psalmist's comparison: "I am tossed up and down like the locust." In the month of May, when the ovaries of those insects are ripe and turgid, each of these swarms begins gradually to disappear, and retire into the plains, where they deposit their eggs. These are no sooner hatched in June, than each of the broods collect themselves into a large body, sometimes extended more than a furlong on every side; and then marching directly towards the sea, they suffer nothing to escape them, eating up every thing that is green and juicy, from the tender and lowly vegetable, to the coarse leaf and bark of the vine and the pomegranate. In prosecuting their work of destruction, they keep their ranks like soldiers in order of battle, climbing as they advance, over every tree or wall that stands in their way; they enter into the very houses and bedchambers, like so many thieves. It is impossible to stop their motions, or even to alter their line of march; while the front is regardless of danger, and the rear presses on so close, that a retreat is altogether impossible. A day or two after one of these broods is in motion, others are already hatched to march and glean after them, gnawing off the very bark, and the young branches of such trees as had before escaped with the loss only of their fruit and foliage; so justly have they been compared by the prophet to a great army.—ΠΑΡΘΟΝ.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 24. And they brought every man his present, vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and raiment, harness, and spices, horses, and mules, a rate year by year.

Presents of vestments, on the other hand, are frequently made in these countries to the great, and those that are in public stations; and they expect them. Thevenot tells us, it was a custom in Egypt, in his time, for the consuls of the European nations to send the bashaw a present of so many vests, and so many besides to some officers, both when a new bashaw came, or a new consul entered his office, as were rated at above a thousand piasters. Does not this last account remind us of the presents that were made to Solomon, by the neighbouring princes, at set times, part of which, we are expressly told, consisted of raiment? 2 Chron. ix. 24. This may be thought not very well to agree with a remark of Sir J. Chardin, mentioned under a former observation, "that vestments are not presented by inferiors to superiors; or even by an equal to an equal;" but there is really no inconsistency; vestments are not the things that are chosen by those that would make a present to the great, in common; but they may be ordered to be sent as a sort of a tribute, or a due which the superior claims.

The other things mentioned in that passage of Chronicles, vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, harness and spices, horses and mules, still continue to be thought fit presents to the great. So Russel tells us, in his account of the eastern visits, that if it is a visit of ceremony from a bashaw or a person in power, a fine horse, sometimes with furniture, or some such valuable thing, is made a present to him at his departure; and the Baron Fabricius, in his letters concerning Charles XII. of Sweden, tells us, that when he was seized at Bender, the house being set on fire, the rich presents that had been made him, consisting of tents, sabres, saddles and bridles adorned with jewels, rich housings and harnesses, to the value of 200,000 crowns, were consumed. Of the rest, the vessels of silver and the spices may be illustrated by that story of D'Herbelot concerning Akhschid, the commander of an eastern province, who is said to have purchased peace of Jezid, general of the troops of one of the califs, by sending him a present of seven hundred thousand drachms of silver in ready money; four hundred loads of saffron, which that country produced in abundance; and four hundred slaves, who each of them carried a rich turban of silk in a silver basin.—HARMER.

Presents of dresses are alluded to very frequently in the historical books of scripture, and in the earliest times: when Joseph gave to each of his brethren a change of raiment, and to Benjamin five changes of raiment, it is mentioned without particular notice, and as a customary incident, (Gen. xlv. 22, 23.) Naaman gave to Gehazi, from among the presents intended for Elisha, who declined accepting any, (as we have seen above, some persons did, on extraordinary occasions,) two changes of raiment; and even Solomon, king as he was, received raiment as presents, (2 Chron. ix. 24.) This custom is still maintained in the East: it is mentioned by all travellers; and we have merely chosen to give the following extract from De la Motte, in preference to what might easily have been produced from others, because he notices, as a particularity, that the grand seignior gives his garment of honour before the wearer is admitted to his presence; but the vizier gives his honorary dresses after the presentation: will this apply to the parable of the wedding garment, and to the behaviour of the king, who expected to have found all his guests clad in robes of honour? (Matt. xxii. 11.) Is any thing like this management observable, Zech. iii.? Joshua being introduced to the angel of the Lord, not to the Lord himself, stood before the angel with filthy garments; but he ordered a handsome caffetan to be given him. Jonathan, son of Saul, divested himself of his robe, and his upper garment, even to his sword, his bow, and his girdle—partly intending David the greater honour, as having been apparel worn by himself; but principally, it may be conjectured, through haste and speed, he being impatient of honouring David, and covenanting for his affection. Jonathan would not stay to send for raiment, but instantly gave him his own. The idea of honour connected with the caffetan, appears also in the prodigal's father,—"bring forth the best robe." We find the liberality in this kind of gifts was considerable: Ezra ii. 69, "The chief of the fathers gave one hundred priests' garments." Neh. vii. 70, "The Tirshatha gave five hundred and thirty priests' garments." This would appear sufficiently singular among us; but in the East, where to give is to honour, the gift of garments, or of any other usable commodities, is in perfect compliance with established sentiments and customs.

"The vizier entered at another door, and their exclamations rose to salute him after their manner, which was returned by a little inclining of his head; after which he sat down on the corner of his sofa, which is the most honourable place; then his chancellor, his kiahia, and the Chiaouz Bashaw, came and stood before him, till coffee was brought in; after which M. de Chateaufort presented M. de Ferriol to him, as his successor, who delivered him the king his master's letters, complimenting him as from his majesty and himself, to which the vizier answered very obligingly; then they gave two dishes of coffee to their excellencies, with sweetmeats, and afterward the perfumes and sherbet; then they clothed them with CAFFETANS of a silver brocade, with large silk flowers; and to those that were admitted into the apartments with them, they gave others of brocade, almost all silk, except some slight gold or silver flowers; according to the custom usually observed towards all foreign ministers.

"Caffetans are long vests of gold or silver brocade, flowered with silk, which the grand seignor and the vizier present to those to whom they give audience; the grand seignor before, and the vizier after audience." (De la Motraye's Travels.)—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

Ver. 28. And they brought unto Solomon horses out of Egypt, and out of all lands.

The people of Israel were, by their law, forbidden to multiply horses; for which several reasons may be assigned. The land of Canaan, intersected in almost every direction by hills and mountains, was less adapted to the rearing of horses than other parts of Syria; but the principal reason might be, to discourage the art of war, to which mankind in all ages have shown so strong a propensity, which is so hostile to the interests of true religion, of which they were the chosen depositaries, and prevent them from relying for the defence of their country, rather on the strength of their armies, which, in the East, chiefly consists of cavalry, than on the promised aid of Jehovah. This wise and salutary command, however, was often disregarded, even by the more pious kings of David's line, who imitated the princes around them in the number and excellence of their horses. Solomon set the first example of transgressing that precept, and of departing from the simplicity of his fathers: "For Solomon gathered together chariots and horsemen; and he had a thousand and four hundred chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen, whom he bestowed in the cities for chariots, and with the king at Jerusalem." Josephus informs us he had twenty thousand horses, which surpassed all others in beauty and swiftness. These were mounted by young men in the bloom of youth, excelling all their countrymen in stature and comeliness, with long flowing hair, habited in rich dresses of Tyrian purple, their hair powdered with gold-dust, which, by reflecting the beams of the sun, shed a dazzling splendour around their heads. It was the practice of those in the highest rank of society, in the time of Josephus, to adorn their persons in the gorgeous manner he describes; and the strong partiality which the historian cherished for his country, it is evident, induced him to transfer the extravagance of his own age to the time of Solomon. The same overweening desire to exalt the power, the riches, and the splendour of his nation, in the most brilliant epoch of her history, has prevailed upon him to contradict the page of inspiration itself, which expressly limits the number of Solomon's horses to twelve thousand. The sacred historian informs us, that these horses were purchased in Egypt, and in all the surrounding countries, by the Jewish merchants, where the fame of so great a king procured them easy access, and liberal encouragement. It is extremely probable that Solomon's stud was replenished from regions lying at a very great distance from Jerusalem; but the sacred writers particularly celebrate the breeds of Assyria, Togarmah, and Egypt. The horses of Togarmah were brought to the fairs of Tyre, and were sufficiently numerous and valuable to attract the notice of Ezekiel, who thus addresses the merchant city: "They of the house of Togarmah traded in thy fairs, with horses, and horsemen, and mules." These, in the opinion of Bochart and other geographers, were the Cappadocians, whose country has been, from time immemorial, celebrated for its superior breed of horses. The prophets of Jehovah frequently advert to the admirable qualities of the Assyrian charger. Isaiah, describing the terrible devastation which the land of Judea was doomed to suffer by the Assyrian armies, warns his people that their horses' hoofs shall be counted like flint—compact and durable as the flinty rock; qualities which, in times when the shoeing of horses was unknown, must have been of very great importance. The value of a solid hoof has not escaped the notice of Homer's muse, who celebrates, in many passages of his immortal poems, the brazen-footed horses. In the admirable instructions which Virgil communicates to the Italian husbandmen, a solid hoof is mentioned as indispensably requisite in a good breed of horses. The amazing rapidity of their movements is expressed with much beauty and force in the next clause: "Their wheels shall be like a whirlwind;" and, with equal felicity, in these words of Jeremiah: "Behold, he shall come up as clouds, and his chariots shall be as a whirlwind; his horses are swifter than eagles." The prophet Habakkuk, in describing the same quality, uses a different figure, but one equally striking: "Their horses also are swifter than the leopards, and are more fierce than the evening wolves; and their horsemen shall spread themselves, and their horsemen shall come from far; they shall fly as the eagle that hasteth to eat."—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 5. Ought ye not to know that the Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom over Israel to David for ever, even to him and to his sons by a covenant of salt?

The Orientals were accustomed also to ratify their federal engagements by salt. This substance was, among the ancients, the emblem of friendship and fidelity, and therefore used in all their sacrifices and covenants. It is a sacred pledge of hospitality which they never venture to violate. Numerous instances occur of travellers in Arabia, after being plundered and stripped by the wandering tribes of the desert, claiming the protection of some civilized Arab, who, after receiving him into his tent, and giving him salt, instantly relieves his distress, and never forsakes him till he has placed him in safety. An agreement, thus ratified, is called in scripture, "a covenant of salt." The obligation which this symbol imposes on the mind of an Oriental, is well illustrated by the Baron De Tott in the following anecdote: One who was desirous of his acquaintance, promised in a short time to return. The baron had already attended him half way down the staircase, when stopping, and turning briskly to one of his domestics, Bring me directly, said he, some bread and salt. What he requested was brought; when, taking a little salt between his fingers, and putting it with a mysterious air on a bit of bread, he ate it with a devout gravity, assuring De Tott he might now rely on him.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XVI.

Ver. 14. And they buried him in his own sepulchres, which he had made for himself in the city of David, and laid him in the bed which was filled with sweet odours and divers kinds of spices prepared by the apothecaries' art; and they made a very great burning for him.

A passage from Drummond's Travels ought not to be omitted here, in which he gives an account of the manner in which a large quantity of spices and perfumes was made use of, to do honour to the dead. It seems, according to a tradition that prevailed among the Turks, "An eminent prophet, who lived in Mesopotamia many ages ago, whose name was Zechariah, was beheaded by the prince of that country, on account of his virtuous opposition to some lewd scheme of his. His head he ordered to be put into a stone urn, two feet square, upon the top of which was an inscription, importing that that urn enclosed the head of that great prophet Zechariah. This urn remained in the castle of Aleppo till about eight hundred years ago, when it was removed into an old Christian church in that city, afterward turned into a mosque, which decaying, another was built near it, and the place where the head was deposited choked up by a wall." About forty years before Mr. Drummond wrote this account, which was in December 1748, consequently about the year 1708, a zealous grand vizier, who pretended to have been admonished in a dream to remove this stone vessel into a more conspicuous place, had it removed accordingly, with many religious ceremonies, and affixed in a conspicuous part of a mosque; and in the close of all it is said, "the urn was opened, and filled with spices and perfumes, to the value of four hundred pounds." Here we see in late times honour was done to the supposed head of an eminent saint, by filling its repository with odoriferous substances. The bed of sweet spices, in which Asa was laid, seems to have been of the same kind, or something very much like it. Might not large quantities of precious perfumes, in like manner, be strewed, or designed to be strewed, about the body of our Lord? This would require large quantities. Zechariah of Mesopotamia had been dead so long, that nothing of this kind could be done with any view to preserve his head from decay, it was merely to do him honour: the spices used by the Jews in burial might be for the same purpose.—HARMER.

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 20. And they arose early in the morning, and went forth into the wilderness of Tekoa: and as they went forth, Jehoshaphat stood and said, Hear me, O Judah, and ye inhabitants of Jerusalem; believe in the LORD your God, so shall ye be established; believe his prophets, so shall ye prosper.

Ver. 28. And they came to Jerusalem with psalteries and harps and trumpets, unto the house of the LORD.

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver. 20. Thirty and two years old was he when he began to reign, and he reigned in Jerusalem eight years, and departed without being desired; howbeit they buried him in the city of David, but not in the sepulchres of the kings.

The burying of persons in their cities is also an eastern manner of doing them honour. They are in common buried without the walls of their towns, as is apparent, from many places of the Old and New Testament. The ancient Jews also were thus buried; but sometimes they bury in their cities, when they do a person a distinguished honour. "Each side of the road," says the author of the History of the piratical states of Barbary, "without the gate, is crowded with sepulchres. Those of the pacha and the deys are built near the gate of Babalonet. They are between ten and twelve feet high, very curiously white-washed, and built in the form of a dome. Hali Dey, as a very eminent mark of distinction, was buried in an enclosed tomb within the city. For forty days successively his tomb was decorated with flowers, and surrounded with people, offering up prayers to God for his soul. This dey was accounted a saint, and a particular favourite of heaven, because he died a natural death; a happiness of which there are few instances since the establishment of the deys in Algiers." No comment is more lively, or more sure, than this, on those that speak of the burying of the kings of the house of David within Jerusalem; those sepulchres, and that of Huldah the prophetess, being the only ones to be found there. But it is not a perfect comment; for it is to be remembered that a peculiar holiness belonged to Jerusalem, as well as the dignity of being the royal city, but no particular sanctity is ascribed to Algiers, by those people that buried Hali Dey there.—HARMER.

CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 11. But Jehoshabeath, the daughter of the king, took Joash the son of Ahaziah, and stole him from among the king's sons that were slain, and put him and his nurse in a bedchamber. So Jehoshabeath, the daughter of King Jehoram, the wife of Jehoiada the priest, (for she was the sister of Ahaziah,) hid him from Athaliah, so that she slew him not.

The bedchamber in the temple, in which Jehosheba hid Joash in the days of Athaliah, mentioned 2 Kings xi. 2, and 2 Chron. xxii. 11, does not seem to mean a lodging-chamber, but a chamber used as a repository for beds. I am indebted to Sir John Chardin for this thought, which seems to be a just one; for the original words בית המיטה bachadar hanmitoth, signify a chamber of beds, and the expression differs from that which is used when a lodging-chamber is meant. He supposes then that place is meant, where beds are kept: for in the East, and particularly in Persia and Turkey, beds are not raised from the ground with bedposts, a canopy, and curtains; people lie on the ground. In the evening they spread out a mattress or two of cotton, very light, &c. Of these they have several laid up in great houses, until they may have occasion to use them, and have a room on purpose for them. In a chamber of beds, the room used for the laying up beds, it seems Joash was sequestered. Understand it how you will, it appears that people were lodged in the temple; and if any lodged there, it is to be supposed at particular times there were many, especially the relations and friends of the high-priest. Here it may be right to consult Neh. xiii. 4, 5. In the room in which beds were deposited, not a common bedchamber, it seems the young prince lay concealed. Chardin complains the Vulgar Latin translation did not rightly understand the story; nor have others represented the intention of the sacred writer perfectly, if he is to be understood after this manner.—HARMER.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Ver. 19. And he set the porters at the gates of the house of the LORD, that none which was unclean in any thing should enter in.

The entrance of the inner chamber of a Buddhist temple is usually low and narrow; and on each side stands a dreadful looking fellow formed of clay, and above the size of the human form, with a huge serpent in his hand, seemingly ready to lash with it whoever enters; but intended chiefly, I believe, to admonish such as come unprepared. They are styled mookarayo, the usual word for guards or sentinels.—CALLAWAY.

CHAPTER XXV.

Ver. 12. And other ten thousand left alive did the children of Judah carry away captive, and brought them unto the top of the rock, and cast them down from the top of the rock, that they all were broken in pieces.

The Greeks and Romans condemned some of their criminals to be cast down from the top of a rock. In the time of Pis, the inhabitants of Constantine, a town of Turkey, built on the summit of a great rock, commonly executed their criminals who had been guilty of more atrocious crimes, by casting them headlong from the cliff. This punishment Amaziah, the king of Judah, inflicted on ten thousand Edomites, whom he had taken captive in war: "Other ten thousand left alive, did the children of Judah carry away captive, and brought them to the top of the rock, and cast them down from the top of the rock, and they all were broken in pieces."—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Ver. 10. Also he built towers in the desert, and digged many wells: for he had much cattle, both in the low country and in the plains; husbandmen also, and vinedressers in the mountains, and in Carmel: for he loved husbandry.

The Indians build pagodas, not to be used as temples, but for the protection of their flocks, in case of any alarm. They are placed in the fields, and surrounded with good walls. Over the gates they raise high pyramids, full of pictures of their gods; and within their circuit were many little chapels, every one of which contained an idol. In these countries, the soldiers are very ill paid, and the commanders permit them to take what they can get. They therefore often seize the cattle, when the shepherds think least of it. Travellers also retire into these pagodas.—BURDER.

William of Tyre describes a country not far from the Euphrates, as inhabited by Syrian and Armenian Christians, who led great flocks and herds there, but were in subjection to the Turks, who, though few in number, yet living in strong places among them, kept them under, and received tribute from these poor peasants who inhabited the villages, and employed themselves in country business. I do not know whether this may not give us a truer view of the design of those towers that Uzziah built in the wilderness, mentioned 2 Chron. xxvi. 10, than commentators have done, who have supposed they were conveniences made for sheltering the shepherds from bad weather, or to defend them from the incursions of enemies; for they might rather be designed to keep the nations that pastured there in awe; to prevent their disputing with his servants about wells, and also to induce them quietly to pay that tribute to which the seventh and eighth verses seem to refer.—HARMER,

Ver. 15. And he made in Jerusalem engines, invented by cunning men, to be on the towers and upon the bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones withal: and his name spread far abroad: for he was marvellously helped till he was strong.

The batteringram was an engine with an iron head, resembling the head of a ram, with which they beat down the enemies' walls. Of this, Potter mentions three kinds; the first was plain and unartificial, being nothing but a long beam with an iron head, which the soldiers drove with main force against the wall; the second was hung with ropes to another beam, by the help of which they thrust it forward with much greater force; the third differed from the former only in being covered with a testudo, or shroud, to protect the soldiers that worked it from the darts of the enemy. The beam was sometimes no less than a hundred and twenty feet in length, and covered with iron plates, lest those who defended the walls should set it on fire; the head was armed with as many horns as they pleased. Josephus reports, that one of Vespasian's rams, the length of which was only fifty cubits, which came not up to the size of several of the Grecian rams, had a head as thick as ten men, and twenty-five horns, each of which was as thick as one man, and placed a cubit's distance from the rest; the weight, hung (as was customary) upon the hinder part, was no less than one thousand and five hundred talents; when it was removed from one place to another, it was not taken in pieces; a hundred and fifty yoke of oxen, or three hundred pair of horses and mules, laboured in drawing it; and no less than fifteen hundred men employed their utmost strength in forcing it against the walls. At other times, we find these rams driven upon wheels. Such was the formidable engine, of which the prophet warned the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and which, in the hands of the Romans, levelled at last the walls of that proud metropolis with the ground.

To this may be added, various engines for casting arrows, darts, and stones of a larger size; of which the most remarkable was the balista, which hurled stones of a size not less than millstones, with so great a violence as to dash whole houses in pieces at a blow. Such were the engines which Uzziah, the king of Judah, planted on the walls and towers of Jerusalem, to defend it against the attacks of an invading force: "And he made in Jerusalem engines, invented by cunning men, to be on the towers, and upon the bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones withal." Some of these inventions, however, had been in use long before; for in the reign of David, the batteringram was employed in the siege of Abel-Bethmaachah: "They cast up a bank against the city, and it stood in the trench; and all the people that were with Joab battered the wall to throw it down." These powerful engines, invented by Jewish artists, and worked by the skill and vigour of Jewish soldiers, were undoubtedly the prototypes of those which the celebrated nations of Greece and Rome afterward employed with so much success in their sieges.—PAXTON.

Ver. 23. So Uzziah slept with his fathers, and they buried him with his fathers in the field of the burial which belonged to the kings; for they said, He is a leper: and Jotham his son reigned in his stead.

The kings and princes of the oriental regions are often subjected to trial after their decease by their insulted and oppressed people, and punished according to the degree of their delinquency. While the chosen people of God were accustomed to honour in a particular manner the memory of those kings who had reigned over them with justice and clemency, they took care to stamp some mark of posthumous disgrace upon those who had left the world under their disapprobation. The sepulchres of the Jewish kings were at Jerusalem; where, in some appointed receptacle, the remains of their princes were deposited; and from the circumstance of these being the cemetery for successive rulers, it was said when one died and was buried there, that he was gathered to his fathers. But several instances occur in the history of the house of David, in which, on various accounts, they were denied the honour of being entombed with their ancestors, and were deposited in some other place in Jerusalem. To mark, perhaps, a greater degree of censure, they were taken to a small distance from Jerusalem, and laid in a private tomb. Uzziah, who had, by his presumptuous attempt to seize the office of the priesthood, which was reserved by an express law for the house of Aaron, provoked the wrath of heaven, and been punished for his temerity with a loathsome and incurable disease, "was buried with his fathers in the field of the burial which belonged to the kings; for they said, He is a leper." It was undoubtedly with a design to make a suitable impression on the mind of the reigning monarch, to guard him against the abuse of his power, and teach him respect for the feelings and sentiments of that people for whose benefit chiefly he was raised to the throne, that such a stigma was fixed upon the dust of his offending predecessors. He was, in this manner, restrained from evil, and excited to good, according as he was fearful of being execrated, or desirous of being honoured after his decease. This public mark of infamy was accordingly put on the conduct of Ahaz: "They buried him in the city, even in Jerusalem, but they brought him not into the sepulchres of the kings of Israel."—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Ver. 27. And Ahaz slept with his fathers, and they buried him in the city, even in Jerusalem; but they brought him not into the sepulchres of the kings of Israel. and Hezekiah his son reigned in his stead.

The Israelites were accustomed to honour in a peculiar manner the memory of those kings who had reigned over them uprightly. On the contrary, some marks of posthumous disgrace followed those monarchs who left the world under the disapprobation of their people. The proper place of interment was in Jerusalem. There, in some appointed receptacle, the remains of their princes were deposited; and, from the circumstance of this being the cemetery for successive rulers, it was said, when one died and was so buried, that he was gathered to his fathers. Several instances occur in the history of the kings of Israel, wherein, on certain accounts, they were not thus interred with their predecessors, but in some other place in Jerusalem. So it was with Ahaz, who, though brought into the city, was not buried in the sepulchres of the kings of Israel. In some other cases, perhaps to mark out a greater degree of censure, they were taken to a small distance from Jerusalem. It is said that Uzziah was buried with his fathers in the field of the burial which belonged to the kings; for they said, He is a leper. (2 Chron. xxvi. 23.) It was doubtless with a design to make a suitable impression on the minds of their kings while living, that such distinctions were made after their decease. They might thus restrain them from evil or excite them to good, according as they were fearful of being execrated, or desirous of being honoured, when they were dead. The Egyptians had a custom in some measure similar to this; it was however general as to all persons, though it received very particular attention, as far as it concerned their kings. It is thus described in Franklin's History of Ancient and Modern Egypt: "As soon as a man was dead, he was brought to his trial. The public accuser was heard. If he proved that the deceased had led a bad life, his memory was condemned, and he was deprived of the honours of sepulture. Thus, that sage people were affected with laws which extended even beyond the grave, and every one, struck with the disgrace inflicted on the dead person, was afraid to reflect dishonour on his own memory, and that of his family. But what was singular, the sovereign himself was not exempted from this public inquest upon his death. The public peace was interested in the lives of their sovereigns in their administration, and as death terminated all their actions, it was then deemed for the public welfare, that they should suffer an impartial scrutiny by a public trial, as well as the most common subject. Even some of them were not ranked among the honoured dead, and consequently were deprived of public burial. The Israelites would not suffer the bodies of some of their flagitious princes to be carried into the sepulchres appropriated to their virtuous sovereigns. The custom was singular: the effect must have been powerful and influential. The most haughty despot, who might trample on laws human and divine in his life, saw, by this solemn investigation of human conduct, that at death he also would be doomed to infamy and execration."

What degree of conformity there was between the practice of the Israelites and the Egyptians, and with whom the custom first originated, may be difficult to ascertain and decide, but the conduct of the latter appears to be founded on the same principle as that of the former, and as it more circumstantially detailed, affords us an agreeable explanation of a rite but slightly mentioned in the scriptures.—BURDER.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Ver. 3. He took counsel with his princes and his mighty men to stop the waters of the fountains, which were without the city; and they did help him. 4. So there was gathered much people together, who stopped all the fountains, and the brook that ran through the midst of the land, saying, Why should the kings of Assyria come and find much water?

That stream which flowed from Siloam is, I presume, the brook that Hezekiah speaks of, which in the time of the crusades was not attempted to be stopped up. What the cause of that was we are not told, but it seems the waters of some springs without the city were conveyed into Jerusalem at the time; and that Solomon in his reign had attempted to do the like, and had effected it: as to part of the water of the springs of Bethlehem, it was no wonder then that Hezekiah should think of introducing the waters of Siloam in like manner into the city, in order at once to deprive the besiegers of its waters, and benefit the inhabitants of Jerusalem by them. Probably it was done in the same manner that Solomon brought the waters of Bethlehem thither, that is, by collecting the water of the spring or springs into a subterraneous reservoir, and from thence, by a concealed aqueduct, conveying them into Jerusalem, with this difference, that Solomon took only part of the Bethlehem water, leaving the rest to flow into those celebrated pools which remain to this day; whereas Hezekiah turned all the water of Siloam into the city, absolutely stopping up the outlet into the pool, and filling it up with earth, that no trace of it might be seen by the Assyrians. Which seems indeed to be the account of the sacred writer, 2 Chron. xxxii. 30, "The same Hezekiah also stopped the upper watercourse of Gihon, (which is another name for Siloam, and brought it straight down to the west side of the city of David." Thus our translators express it: but the original may as well be rendered, "Hezekiah stopped the upper going out (שֶׁנֶה מוֹטָא) of the waters of Gihon, and directed them underneath, (נֶחֱלָה לֵמַטָּח), to the west of the city of David;" and so Pagninus and Arias Montanus understand the passage; he stopped up, that is, the outlet of the waters of Gihon into the open air, by which they were wont to pass into the pool of Siloam, and became a brook; and by some subterraneous contrivance directed the waters to the west side of Jerusalem.—HARMER.

Ver. 5. Also he strengthened himself, and built up all the wall that was broken, and raised it up to the towers, and another wall without, and repaired Millo in the city of David, and made darts and shields in abundance.

See on 2 Sam. 5. 9.

Ver. 8. With him is an arm of flesh: but with us is the LORD our God, to help us, and to fight our battles. And the people rested themselves upon the words of Hezekiah, king of Judah.

The margin has, for rested upon, "leaned." "I lean (from sarukirathu) on the words of that good man." "All people gladly lean on the words of that just judge." "Who would lean on the words of that false man?" "Alas! we leaned upon his words, and have fallen into trouble." "My husband, have I not leaned upon thy words? Yes, and therefore I have not fallen."—ROBERTS.

EZRA.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 14. Now, because we have maintenance from the king's palace, and it was not meet for us to see the king's dishonour, therefore have we sent and certified the king.

Literally, "salted with the salt of his palace." Some have supposed that the words refer to their receiving a stipend from the king of Persia, which was wont to be paid in salt; others suppose it expresses an acknowledgment that they were preserved by that king's protection, as flesh is preserved by salt. And many pieces of collateral learning are introduced to embellish these conceits. It is sufficient, to put an end to all these conjectures, to recite the words of a modern Persian monarch, whose court Chardin attended some time about business. "Rising in wrath against an officer, who had attempted to deceive him, he drew his sabre, fell upon him, and hewed him in pieces, at the feet of the grand vizier, who was standing, and whose favour the poor wretch courted by this deception. And looking fixedly upon him, and the other great lords that stood on each side of him, he said, with a tone of indignation, 'I have then such ungrateful servants and traitors as these to eat my salt. Look on this sword, it shall cut off all these pernicious heads.' (Tome iii. p. 149.)

The Persian great men do not receive their salaries, it is well known, in salt; and the officer that was killed was under the immediate protection of the grand vizier, not the prince: our English version has given, then, the sense, though it has not literally translated the passage. It means the same thing as eating one's bread signifies here in the West, but, perhaps, with a particular energy. I beg leave to introduce one remark here, of a very different nature, that we may learn from this story, that Samuel's hewing Agag in pieces, though so abhorrent from our customs, differs very little, in many respects, from this Persian execution. Samuel was a person of high distinction in Israel: he had been their judge, or supreme governor under God; he was a prophet too; and we are ready to think his sacred hands should not have been employed in the actual shedding of blood. How strange would it be in our eyes, if we should see one of our kings cutting off the head of a traitor with his own hands; or an archbishop of Canterbury stabbing a foreign captive prince! But different countries have very different usages. Soliman, king of Persia, who hewed this unfaithful officer in pieces, reigned over a much larger and richer country than Judea, and at the same time was considered by his subjects as sacred a person as Samuel; supposed to be descended from their prophet Mohamed, to reign by a divine constitution, and to be possessed. We are assured by this writer in another place, of a kind of prophetic penetration and authority.—I have said, it appears so signify the same thing as eating one's bread, in the West, but, probably, with some particular kind of energy, marking out not merely the obligations of gratitude, but the strictest ties of fidelity. For as the letter was written not only by some of the great officers on the western side of the Euphrates, but in the name of the several colonies of people that had been transplanted thither, the Dinaites, the Apharsathchites, the Tarpelites, &c. ver. 9, 10, it is not to be supposed these tribes of people all received their food from the palace, or a stipend for their support; but with great adulation they might pretend they considered themselves as held under as strong engagements of fidelity to the kings of Persia, as if they had eaten salt in his palace.

The following story from D'Herbelot will explain this, if the views of these ancient Persians may be supposed to correspond with those of the Persians of the ninth century.

Jacob ben Laith, the founder of a dynasty of Persian princes called the Sofarides, rising, like many other of the ancestors of the princes of the East, from a very low state to royal power, being in his first setting out in the use of arms no better than a freebooter or robber, is yet said to have maintained some regard to decency in his depredations, and never to have entirely stripped those that he robbed, always leaving them something to soften their affliction. Among other exploits that are recorded of him, he is said to have broken into the palace of the prince of that country, and having collected a very large booty, which he was on the point of carrying away, he found his foot kicked something, which made him stumble. He imagined it might be something of value, and putting it to his mouth, the better to distinguish what it was, his tongue soon informed him it was a lump of salt. Upon this, according to the morality, or rather superstition of the country, where the people considered salt as a symbol and pledge of hospitality, he was so touched, that he left all his booty, retiring without taking away any thing with him. The next morning, the risk they had run of losing many valuable things, being perceived, great was the surprise, and strict the inquiry, what should be the occasion of their being left. At length Jacob was found to be the person concerned, who having given an account, very sincerely, of the whole transaction to the prince, he gained his esteem so effectually, that it might be said with truth, that it was his regard for salt that laid the foundation of his after fortune. The prince employed him as a man of courage and genius in many enterprises, and finding him successful in all of them, he raised him, by little and little, to the chief posts among his troops, so that at that prince's death, he found himself possessed of the command in chief, and had such interest in their affections, that they preferred his interests to those of the children of the deceased prince, and he became absolute master of that province, from whence he afterward spread his conquests far and wide." When the Apharsathchites, the Tarpelites, and the other transplanted tribes, told Artaxerxes, the Persian monarch, that they were salted with the salt of his palace, it appears, according to these things, to mean, that they considered themselves as eating his bread, on account of being put and continued in possession of a considerable part of the Jewish country, by him and his predecessors; and that their engagements of fidelity to him were indeed as strong, as if they had eaten salt in his palace.—HARNER.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 7. They sent a letter unto him, wherein was written thus: Unto Darius the king, all peace.

The people of the East are always very particular as to the way in which they commence a letter. Thus, they take into consideration the rank of the individual to whom they write, and keep in view also what is their object. "To you who are respected by kings." "To him who has the happiness of royalty." "To the feet of his excellency, my father, looking towards the place where he is worshipping, I write." A father to his son says, "Head of all blessings, chief of life, precious pearl." When people meet each other on the road, they say, "Salam, peace to you." Or, when they send a message, or ask a favour, it is always accompanied by a salam.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 2. And there was found at Achmetha, in the palace that is in the province of the Medes, a roll, and therein was a record thus written.

This passage proves the great antiquity of the custom of making copies to be deposited in the archives, of the important ordinances of the magistrats, and particularly of charters, granted either to individuals or whole communities. Thus, in an inscription on an ancient marble, quoted by Thomas Smith, it is said of a privilege granted for a separate sepulchre, "Of this inscription two copies have been made, one of which is deposited in the archives." In the same manner, elsewhere, "A copy of this inscription shall be deposited in the archives."—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 11. Also I have made a decree, that whosoever shall alter this word, let timber be pulled down from his house, and, being set up, let him be hanged thereon.

Lud. de Dien observes, that there is no proper construction in the words which we render, and being set up; he would therefore translate them, after the Seventy, "and standing, let him be beat upon it," or "whipped," as the manner was among the Persians and other nations. Among the Jews, they who were beaten, did not stand, but lay down. Deut. xxv. 2. If a greater punishment be here meant, then he makes the first words refer to the wood, and the latter to the man. "And from above, let it fall upon him;" that is, the stake being lifted up, shall be stuck into his body, and come out at his fundament. This was a cruel practice among the eastern people, and is yet continued there.—BURNER.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 21. Then I proclaimed a fast there at the river of Ahava, that we might afflict ourselves before our God, to seek of him a right way for us, and for our little ones, and for all our substance.

The whole valley was covered with the tents of the pilgrims; for a very few, compared with their numbers, could find lodgings in the building. These several encampments, according to their towns or districts, were placed a little apart, each under its own special standard. Their cattle were grazing about, and the people who attended them, in their primitive eastern garbs. Women appeared, carrying in water from the brooks, and children were sporting at the tent doors. Towards evening, this pious multitude, to the number of eleven hundred at least, began their evening orisons, literally shouting their prayers, while the singing of the hymns, responded by the echoes from the mountains, was almost deafening. At intervals, during the devotion, matchlocks, muskets, and pistols, were repeatedly fired, division answering division, as if it were some concerted signal. This mixture of military and religious proceeding, produced an effect perfectly novel to a European eye, in the nineteenth century; though it might have been more than sufficiently familiar to that of a knight-companion in the thirteenth, when the crusades covered every hauberk with a pilgrim's amice. But the recollection of what country I saw these in, conjured up a very different image. I was in the land of the Medes, on the very spot to which the ten tribes were brought in captivity about two thousand years ago; and from which, in the fulness of time, the scattered remnants were collected, (after the first return, B. C. 536, by command of Cyrus,) and led back to their native land, on the decree of Artaxerxes.

xerxes the king, when Ezra gathered them together to the river that runneth to Ahava, and there they abode in their tents three days; and he viewed the people and the priests. And he proclaimed a fast there, that they might afflict themselves before God, to seek of him a right way for them, and for their little ones, and for their substance. And the Lord was entreated of them, and he delivered them from the hand of the enemy, and of such as lay in wait by the way. And Ezra, and those with him, came to Jerusalem. We see in this account, from the book of Ezra, chap. viii. that the wild tribes of the mountains were then regarded as banditti; and that no decrees of safe-conduct from the king would have more effect in those days, than in the present, to protect a rich caravan from ambush and depredation. But I must own, there are some points of observation in the encampment before me, which a little disturbed the resemblance between its holy grouping, and that which followed the really pious ordinance of the sacred scribe of Israel. The Mohammedan evening prayer over, all was noise of another description; bustle and riotous merriment, more like preparations of a fair, than a worship; showing at once the difference in spirit between the two religions. In the one, the moral law walked hand in hand with the ceremonial; and the mandate of worshipping the one God, in purity of heart, and in strictness of practice, was unvaryingly asserted in the chastisement or welfare of the people; and so we see it was acknowledged by the seemly and humble joy under pardon, with which the recalled Israelites returned to the land of their temple. But here the performance of certain rites seemed to be all in all. The preachers of the multitude holding forth, that as they advance nearer to the shrines of their pilgrimage, so in due proportion their sins depart from them; and thus every step they approach, the load becomes lighter and lighter, till the last atom flies off the moment they fall prostrate before the tomb of the prophet, or saint; and from which holy spot they rise perfectly clear, free, and often too willing to commence a new score, to be as readily wiped away.—SIR R. K. PORTER.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 3. And when I heard this thing, I rent my garment and my mantle, and plucked off the hair of my head and of my beard, and sat down astonished.

Oriental mourners divested themselves of all ornaments, and laid aside their jewels, gold, and every thing rich and splendid in their dress. The Grecian ladies were directed in this manner to mourn the death of Achilles: "Not clothed in rich attire of gems and gold, with glittering silks or purple." This proof of humiliation and submission Jehovah required of his offending people in the wilderness: "Therefore, now put off thy ornaments from thee, that I may know what to do unto thee. And the children of Israel stripped themselves of their ornaments by the Mount Horeb." Long after the time of Moses, that rebellious nation again received a command of similar import: "Strip you, and make you bare, and gird sackcloth upon your loins."—PAXTON.

Ver. 6. And said, O my God! I am ashamed and blush to lift up my face to thee, my God: for our iniquities are increased over our head, and our trespass is grown up unto the heavens.

"Ah, that fellow's sins are on his head: how numerous are the sins on his head. Alas! for such a head as that. Who can take them from his head? His iniquity is so great, you may see it on his head." Does a man wish to extenuate his crime, to make himself appear not so great a sinner as some suppose, he asks, "What! has my guilt grown up to heaven? not! no!" "Abominable wretch, your guilt has reached to the heavens." "Can you call that little, which has grown up to the heavens?"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 8. And now for a little space grace hath been showed from the Lord our God, to leave us a remnant to escape, and to give us a nail in his holy place, that our God may lighten our eyes, and give us a little reviving in our bondage.

See on Isa. 22. 23.

The margin has, "or a pin," that is, "a constant and sure abode." It is worthy of notice, that the Tamul translation has it, "a hut in his holy place." To "lighten" the eyes signifies to give comfort, to strengthen, to refresh. A father says to his son, when he wishes him to do any thing, "My child, make these eyes light." "O woman, enlighten my eyes, lest I be swallowed up with sorrow." "O that our eyes were clear! who will take away the darkness from my eyes?"—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1. Now when Ezra had prayed, and when he had confessed, weeping and casting himself down before the house of God, there assembled unto him out of Israel a very great congregation of men, and women, and children: for the people wept very sore.

People on their arrival from England are astonished at the apparent devotion of the Hindoos, when they see them cast themselves down before their temples. Those of high rank, and in elegant attire, do not hesitate to prostrate themselves in the dust, before the people. How often, as you pass along, may you see a man stretched his full length on the ground, with his face in the dust, pouring out his complaint, or making his requests unto the gods. It matters not to him who or what may be near him; he heeds not, and moves not, till his devotions are finished.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 9. Then all the men of Judah and Benjamin gathered themselves together unto Jerusalem within three days: it was the ninth month, and the twentieth day of the month; and all the people sat in the street of the house of God, trembling because of this matter, and for the great rain.

What a marked illustration we have of this passage every wet monsoon. See the people on a court-day, or when they are called to the different offices on business. The rain comes on; they have only a piece of cotton round their loins, and a small leaf, which they carry over their heads: they all run in a stooping position (as if that would save them from the rain) to the nearest tree, and there they sit in groups, huddled together, and trembling "for the great rain."—ROBERTS.

NEHEMIAH.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 11. O LORD, I beseech thee, let now thine ear be attentive to the prayer of thy servant, and to the prayer of thy servants, who desire to fear thy name; and prosper, I pray thee, thy servant this day, and grant him mercy in the sight of this man: for I was the king's cupbearer.

Honigant supposes that Nehemiah repeated this prayer, which he had often before used, now again in silence, while he administered the cup to the king in his office. The office of cupbearer was a place of great honour and advantage in the Persian court, because of the privilege which it gave him who bore it, of being daily in the king's presence, and the opportunity which he had thereby of gaining his favour, for procuring any petition he should make to him. That it was a place of great advantage seems evident by Nehemiah's gaining those immense riches which enabled him for so many years, out of his own purse only, to live in his government with great splendour and expense, without burdening the people. According to Xenophon, the cupbearer with the Persians and Medes used to take the wine out of the vessels into the cup, and pour some of it into his left hand, and drink it, that if there was any poison in it, the king might not be hurt; and then he delivered it to him upon three fingers.—BURDER.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 2. Wherefore the king said unto me, Why is thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick? this is nothing else but sorrow of heart.

When friends, servants, or acquaintances, have a request to make, or a secret to disclose, they walk about with a gloomy countenance, and never speak but when spoken to. Their object is to induce you to ask what is the matter, because they think you will then be disposed to listen to their complaint.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 7. Moreover, I said unto the king, If it please the king, let letters be given me to the governors beyond the river, that they may convey me over, till I come into Judah.

No person of consequence travels in the East without a letter, or kattali, i. e. a command from the Raza, the governor, the collector, or officer in authority, to the different chiefs of the districts through which he may have to travel. Were it not for this, there would often be a difficulty in getting supplies, and there would generally be a great delay; the officers would be insolent and overbearing, and the purveyors would demand thrice the sum the articles were worth. The letters in question are generally in duplicate, so that one precedes the traveller, and the other is in his possession. Thus, when he arrives at the choultry or rest-house, there will always be people to receive him, who are ready to furnish him with supplies, and coolies to help him on his journey. Sometimes they declare they are in the greatest want; they cannot get rice, they have neither fish nor fowls, and are brought to the lowest ebb of misery.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 8. And the king granted me, according to the good hand of my God upon me.

The hand is sometimes taken in an ill sense for inflicting punishments, and sometimes in a good sense, for we extend favours to men with the hand. Thus Drusus explains Psalm lxxxviii. 5, cut off from thy hand, that is, fallen from thy grace and favour. Pindar thus uses the hand of God, for his help and aid, θεου οιν παροχοσ, by the hand of God: which the scholiast interprets, by the power and help of God. Thus Nehemiah is here to be understood.—BURDER.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 3. Now Tobiah the Ammonite was by him, and he said, Even that which they build, if a fox go up, he shall even break down their stone wall.

When men deride the workmanship of a mason, they say, "Che! why, if a dog or a jackal run against that wall, it will fall." "A wall! why, it will not keep out the jackals."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 14. And I looked, and rose up, and said unto the nobles, and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people, Be not ye afraid of them: remember the LORD which is great and terrible, and fight for your brethren, your sons and your daughters, your wives and your houses.

The ancients appear to have done more to excite the valour of their soldiers, than merely exhorting them to be courageous. This will appear in the following citation: "A circumstance which greatly tends to inflame them with heroic ardour, is the manner in which their battalions are formed. They are neither mustered nor imbodied by chance: they fight in clans, united by consanguinity, a family of warriors: their tenderest pledges are near them in the field. In the heat of the engagement, the soldier hears the shrieks of his wife, and the cries of his children. These are the darling witnesses of his conduct; the applauders of his valour, at once beloved and valued. The wounded seek their mothers and their wives: undismayed at the sight, the women count each honourable scar, and suck the gushing blood: they are even hardy enough to mix with the combatants, administering refreshment, and exhorting them to deeds of valour." (Tacitus, De Mor. Germ.)—BURDER.

Ver. 21. So we laboured in the work: and half of them held the spears, from the rising of the morning till the stars appeared.

Thus did the people labour from the earliest dawn till the latest glimpse of evening light. "Well, Tamby, have you found your cattle?" "Found them? no! and I wandered from the rising east, till the stars appeared." "At what time do you intend to leave the temple?" "Not till the stars appear." "When do you expect the guests?" "Immediately when the stars appear."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 13. Also I shook my lap, and said, So God shake out every man from his house, and from his labour, that performeth not this promise, even thus be he shaken out and emptied.

When men or women curse each other, they shake the lap, i. e. their cloth, or robe, and say, "It shall be so with thee." Does a man begin to shake his sali, or waistcloth, in the presence of another, the other will say, "Why do you shake your cloth here? go to some other place." "What! can you shake your lap here? do it not, do it not." "Yes, yes; it is all true enough; this misery has come upon me through that wretched man shaking his cloth in my presence." The natives always carry a pouch, made of the leaf of the cocoa, or other trees, in their lap; in one part of which they keep their money, and in another their areca-nut, betel leaf, and tobacco. It is amusing to see how careful they are never to have that pouch empty; for they have an idea, that so long as a single coin shall be found in it, (or any of the articles alluded to,) the attraction will be so great, that the contents of the pouch will not be long without companions. See the Englishman, who wants any thing out of a pouch or bag; if he cannot soon find the article he requires, he shakes out the whole: not so the Hindoo; he will fumble and grope for an hour, rather than shake out the whole. "Do that! why, who knows how long the pouch will remain empty?" It is therefore evident, that to shake the lap conveyed with it the idea of a curse.—ROBERTS.

Instead of the fibula that was used by the Romans, the Arabs join together with thread, or with a wooden bodkin, the two upper corners of this garment; and after having placed them first over one of their shoulders, they then fold the rest of it about their bodies. The outer fold serves them frequently instead of an apron, in which they carry herbs, loaves, corn, and other articles, and may illustrate several allusions made to it in scripture; thus, "One of the sons of the prophets went out into the field, to gather herbs, and found a wild vine, and gathered there of wild gourds, his lapful." And the Psalmist offers up his prayer, that Jehovah would "render unto his neighbours sevenfold into their bosom, their reproach." The same allusion occurs in our Lord's direction to his disciples: "Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom." It was also the fold of this robe which Nehemiah shook before his people, as a significant emblem of the manner in which God should deal with the man who ventured to violate his oath, and promise to restore the possessions of their impoverished brethren: "Also, I shook my lap, and said, So God shake out every man from his house, and from his labour, that performeth not this promise, even thus be he shaken out and emptied."—PAXTON.

He shook the dust out of the foreskirts of his garment, as a symbol of what follows. A similar rite was used in the case of peace and war, when the Roman ambassadors proposed the choice of one to the Carthaginians, as having either in their bosom to shake out. (Florus, l. ii. c. 6. Livy, l. xxi. c. 18.) "When the Roman ambassadors entered the senate of Carthage, they had their toga gathered up in their bosom. They said, We carry here peace and war: you may have which you will. The senate answered, You may give which you please. They then shook their toga, and said, We bring you war. To which all the senate answered, We cheerfully accept it."—BUNDEA.

Ver. 14. Moreover from the time that I was appointed to be their governor in the land of Judah, from the twentieth year even unto the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes the king, that is, twelve years, I and my brethren have not eaten the bread of the governor.

Nehemiah did not eat that bread which properly belonged to him as the governor. When the Orientals say they eat the rice of a person, it denotes they are under obligations to him. People who have formerly been employed by you often come and say, "Ah, my lord, how long it is since I had the pleasure of eating your rice." Those who are in the service of the government, are said to eat the rice of the king. A servant, who is requested to injure his master, says, "No, no; have I not eaten his rice for many days?" Of a person who has been faithful to a superior, it is said, "Yes, yes; he has eaten his rice, or he would not have been so true to him."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 15. But the former governors that had been before me were chargeable unto the people, and had taken of them bread and wine, besides forty shekels of silver; yea, even their servants bare rule over the people: but so did not I, because of the fear of God.

The demanding provisions with roughness and severity by such as travel under the direction of government, or authorized by government to do it, is at this day so practised in the East, as greatly to illustrate several passages of scripture. When the Baron De Tott was sent, in 1767, to the camp of the Tartars, by the French ministry, as resident of France with that Tartar prince, he had a mikmandar, or conductor, given him by the pacha of Kutchim, upon his entering the Turkish territories, whose business it was to precede and prepare the way for him, as is usually done in those countries to ambassadors, and such as travel gratis, at the expense of the porte, or Turkish court. This conductor, whose name, it seems, was Ali Aga, made great use of his whip, when he came among the poor Greeks of Moldavia, to induce them to furnish out that assistance and those provisions he wanted for the baron; for though it was represented as travelling at the expense of the porte, it was really at the expense of the inhabitants of those towns or villages to which he came. The baron appears to have been greatly hurt by that mode of procedure with those poor peasants, and would rather have procured what he wanted with his money, which he thought would be sufficiently efficacious, if the command of the mikmandar should not be sufficient without the whip. The baron's account of the success of his efforts is a very droll one, which he has enlivened by throwing it into the form of dialogues between himself and the Greeks, and Ali Aga and those peasants, in which he has imitated the broken language the Greeks made use of, pretending not to understand Turkish, in order to make it more painful. It would be much too long for these papers, and quite unnecessary for my design, to transcribe these dialogues; it is sufficient to say, that after the jealousy of the poor oppressed Greeks of their being to be pillaged, or more heavily loaded with demands by the Turks, had prevented their voluntarily supplying the baron for his money, Ali Aga undertook the business, and upon the Moldavian's pretending not to understand the Turkish language, he knocked him down with his fist, and kept kicking him while he was rising; which brought him to complain, in good Turkish, of his beating him so, when he knew very well they were poor people, who were often in want of necessities, and whose princes scarcely left them the air they breathed. "Pshaw! thou art joking, friend," was the reply of Ali Aga, "thou art in want of nothing, except of being well basted a little oftener; but all in good time. Proceed we to business. I must instantly have two sheep, a dozen of fowls, a dozen of pigeons, fifty pounds of bread, four oques of butter, with salt, pepper, nutmeg, cinnamon, lemons, wines, salad, and good oil of olive, all in great plenty." With tears the Moldavian replied, "I have already told you that we are poor creatures, without so much as bread to eat. Where must we get cinnamon?" The whip, it seems, was taken from under his habit, and the Moldavian beaten till he could bear it no longer, but was forced to fly, finding Ali Aga inexorable, and that these provisions must be produced; and, in fact, we are told, the quarter of an hour was not expired, within which time Ali Aga required that these things should be produced, and affirmed to the baron that they would be brought before the primate, or chief of the Moldavians of that town, who had been so severely handled, assisted by three of his countrymen; all the provisions were brought, without forgetting even the cinnamon.

May not this account be supposed to illustrate that passage of Nehemiah, chap. v. 15: The former governors that had been before me, were chargeable unto the people, and had taken of them bread and wine, besides forty shekels of silver; yea, even their servants bare rule over the people: but so did not I, because of the fear of God. It is evident something oppressive is meant. And that it related to the taking bread from them, or estates in general, together with wine, perhaps sheep, fowls, pigeons, butter, fruit, and other things, when probably they were travelling, or sojourning in some place at a distance from home. And that the like impious and unrighteous demand had, from time to time, been made upon them by the servants of these governors, whom they might have occasion to send about the country. I cannot account for the setting down the precise number of forty, when speaking of shekels, but by supposing that the word besides, here, אשר acher, should have been translated afterward, which it more commonly, if not more certainly, signifies; and means, that afterward they were wont to commute this demand for provisions into money, often amounting to forty shekels. It is certain it would not mean the whole annual allowance to the governor by the children of the captivity; that would have been much too small; nor could it mean what every householder was to pay annually towards the governor's support, for fifty shekels was as much as each mighty man of wealth was assessed at by Menahem, when he wanted to raise a large sum of money for the king of Assyria, and when Israel was not in so low a state as in the time of Nehemiah: it must then, surely, mean the value of that quantity of estates and wine they might charge any town with, when single towns were charged with the support of the governor's table for a single repast, or a single day, which it is natural to suppose could only be when they thought fit to travel from place to place. This, it seems, their servants took the liberty too to require, when they were sent on a journey. And if they that belonged to the officers of the king of Persia enforced their requisitions in a manner similar to that made use of by the people belonging to the Turkish governors of provinces, when they travel on a public account among the Greeks of Moldavia, it is no wonder that Nehemiah observes, with emotion, in this passage, Yea, even their servants bare rule over the people: but so did not I, because of the fear of God.—HARMER.

Ver. 17. Moreover, there were at my table a hundred and fifty of the Jews and rulers, besides those that came unto us from among the heathen that are about us. 18. Now that which was prepared for me daily was one ox and six choice sheep; also fowls were prepared for me, and once in ten days store of all sorts of wine: yet for all this required not I the bread of the governor, because the bondage was heavy upon this people.

Nehemiah calculated the expenses of his table, not by the money he paid, but by the provisions consumed by his guests. Such is still the practice in the East. So De la Motraye informs us of the seraglio at Constantinople: "One may judge of the numbers who live in this palace, by the prodigious quantity of provisions consumed in it yearly, which some of the hatchets, or cooks, assured me amounted to more than 30,000 oxen, 20,000 calves, 60,000 sheep, 16,000 lambs, 10,000 kids, 100,000 turkeys, geese, and goslings, 200,000 fowls and chickens, 100,000 pigeons, without reckoning wild-fowl or fish, of the last of which he only named 130,000 calcam-bats, or turbot."—BURDEK.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 5. Then sent Sanballat his servant unto me, in like manner, the fifth time, with an open letter in his hand.

A letter has its Hebrew name from the circumstance of its being rolled or folded together. The modern Arabs roll up their letters, and then flatten them to the breadth of an inch, and instead of sealing them, paste up their ends. The Persians make up their letters in a roll about six inches long, a bit of paper is fastened round it with gum, and sealed with an impression of ink. In Turkey, letters are commonly sent to persons of distinction in a bag or purse; to equals they are also enclosed, but to inferiors, or those who are held in contempt, they are sent open or unenclosed. This explains the reason of Nehemiah's observation: "Then sent Sanballat his servant unto me, with an open letter in his hand." In refusing him the mark of respect usually paid to persons of his station, and treating him contemptuously, by sending the letter without the customary appendages, when presented to persons of respectability, Sanballat offered him a deliberate insult. Had this open letter come from Geshem, who was an Arab, it might have passed unnoticed, but as it came from Sanballat, the governor had reason to expect the ceremony of enclosing it in a bag, since he was a person of distinction in the Persian court, and at that time governor of Judea.—PAXTON.

Norden tells us, that when he and his company were at Essanen, an express arrived there, despatched by an Arab prince, who brought a letter directed to the reys, (or master of their barque,) enjoining him not to set out with his barque, or carry them any farther, adding, that in a day's time he should be at Essanen, and there would give his orders relative to them. "The letter, however, according to the usage of the Turks," says this author, "was open; and as the reys was not on board, the pilot carried it to one of our fathers to read it." Sanballat's sending his servant, then, with an open letter, which is mentioned Neh. vi. 5, doth not appear an odd thing, it should seem; but if it was according to their usages, why is this circumstance complained of, as it visibly is? Why indeed is it mentioned at all! Why! because, however the sending letters open to common people may be customary in these countries, it is not according to their usages to send them so to people of distinction. So Dr. Pococke, in his account of that very country where Norden was when this letter was brought, gives us, among other things, in the 57th plate, the figure of a Turkish letter put into a satin bag, to be sent to a great man, with a paper tied to it, directed and sealed, and an ivory button tied on the wax. So Lady Montague says, the bassa of Belgrade's answer to the English ambassador, going to Constantinople, was brought to him in a purse of scarlet satin. The great emir, indeed, of the Arabs, according to D'Arvieux, was not wont to enclose his letters in these bags, any more than to have them adorned with flourishes; but that is supposed to have been owing to the impoliteness of the Arabs; and he tells us, that when he acted as secretary to the emir, he supplied these defects, and that his doing so was highly acceptable to the emir. Had this open letter, then, come from Geshem, who was an Arab, it might have passed unnoticed; but as it was from Sanballat, the enclosing it in a handsome bag was a ceremony Nehemiah had reason to expect from him, since he was a person of distinction in the Persian court, and then governor of Judea; and the not doing it was the greatest insult, insinuating, that though Nehemiah was, according to him, preparing to assume the royal dignity, he should be so far from acknowledging him in that character, that he would not even pay him the compliment due to every person of distinction. Chardin gives us a like account of the eastern letters, adding this circumstance, that those that are unenclosed as sent to common people, are usually rolled up; in which form their paper commonly appears. A letter in the form of a small roll of paper, would appear very odd in our eyes, but it seems very common there. If this is the true representation of the affair, commentators have given but a poor account of it. Sanballat sent him a message, says one of them, "pretending, it is likely, special respect and kindness unto him, informing him what was laid to his charge." So far Mr. Harmer.

Contrast with this open letter to Nehemiah the closed, rolled, or folded letter, sent by Sennacherib to Hezekiah, 2 Kings xix. 14. We read, verse 9, "He sent messengers to Hezekiah, saying,"—"And Hezekiah received the [sepher] letter at the hand of the messenger, and read it: and Hezekiah went up into the house of the Lord, and spread it before the Lord." It was therefore folded or rolled, and no doubt enclosed in a proper envelope; and I would not be certain whether this action of taking a letter from its case is not expressed here by the word peresh, which signifies to divide, to separate. Consider also the passage, Isaiah xxix. 11: "And the vision shall be to you, as the word of a [sepher], the same as the letter spread by Hezekiah] letter that is sealed—sealed up in a bag, closely—which is given to a man of learning to read, but he says, 'It is sealed!—how should I know what information it contains? I merely can discover to whom it is directed;' while the unlearned cannot even read the address. We see such occurrences daily in the streets of London: messengers sent with letters, desire passengers to read the directions for them.—Observe, the messengers sent to Hezekiah are described as saying, when in fact, they say nothing, but only deliver a letter containing the message."—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 10. Afterward I came unto the house of Shemaiah, the son of Delaiah, the son of Meshetabeel, who was shut up; and he said, Let us meet together in the house of God, within the temple; and let us shut the doors of the temple: for they will come to slay thee; yea, in the night they will come to slay thee.

By the house of God, within the temple, (as it is in the text, Nehem. vi. 10.) Shemaiah certainly meant the sanctuary; and to advise Nehemiah to retreat thither, he had a good pretence, because it was both a strong and a sacred place, being defended by a guard of Levites, and, by its holiness, privileged from all rude approaches; but his real design herein might be, not only to disgrace Nehemiah, and dishearten the people, when they saw their governor's cowardice, but to prepare the way likewise for the enemies' assaulting and taking the city, when there was no leader to oppose them; to give countenance to the calumny that had been spread abroad, of his affecting to be made king, because he fled upon the report of it; and perhaps, by the assistance of some other priests, that were his confederates, either to destroy him, or to secure his person until the city was betrayed into the enemies' hands.—STACKHOUSE.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1. Now it came to pass, when the wall was built, and I had set up the doors, and the porters, and the singers, and the Levites were appointed, 2. That I gave my brother Hanani, and Hananiah the ruler of the palace, charge over Jerusalem: (for he was a faithful man, and feared God above many.)

Nehemiah, very likely, was now returning to Shushan, to give the king an account of the state of affairs in Judea; and therefore he took care to place such men in the city as he knew would faithfully secure it in his absence. Hanani is said to be his brother; but he chose his officers, not out of partial views to his own kindred, but because he knew that they would acquit themselves in their employment with a strict fidelity. Hanani had given proof of his zeal for God and his country, in his taking a tedious journey from Jerusalem to Shushan, to inform Nehemiah of the sad state of Jerusalem, and to implore his helping hand to relieve it, chap. 1. And the reason why Nehemiah put such trust and confidence in Hananiah, was, because he was a man of conscience, and acted upon religious principles, which would keep him from those temptations to perfidiousness, which he might probably meet with in his absence, and against which a man destitute of the fear of God has no sufficient fence.—STACKHOUSE.

Ver. 3. And I said unto them, Let not the gates of Jerusalem be opened until the sun be hot; and while they stand by, let them shut the doors, and bar them: and appoint watches of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, every one in his watch, and every one to be over against his house.

In the hot countries of the East, they frequently travel in the night, and arrive at midnight at the place of their destination. Luke xi. 5. Mark xiii. 35. Probably they did not therefore usually shut their gates at the going down of the sun, if they did so at all through the night. Thevenot could not, however, obtain admission into Suez in the night, and was forced to wait some hours in the cold, without the walls. Doubdan, returning from the river Jordan to Jerusalem, in 1652, tells us, that when he and his companions arrived in the valley of Jehosaphat, they were much surprised to find that the gates of the city were shut, which obliged them to lodge on the ground at the door of the sepulchre of the Blessed Virgin, to wait for the return of day, along with more than a thousand other people, who were obliged to continue there the rest of the night, as well as they. At length, about four o'clock, seeing everybody making for the city, they also set forward, with the design of entering by St. Stephen's gate; but they found it shut, and above two thousand people, who were there in waiting, without knowing the cause of all this. At first they thought it might be too early, and that it was not customary to open so soon: but an hour after a report was spread that the inhabitants had shut their gates because the peasants of the country about, had formed a design of pillaging the city in the absence of the governor and of his guards, and that as soon as he should arrive, the gates should be opened.—BURDER.

Ver. 4. Now the city was large and great, but the people were few therein, and the houses were not built.

One reason why the bulk of the Jews (who were originally pastoral, and lovers of agriculture) might rather choose to live in the country than at Jerusalem, was, because it was more suited to their genius and manner of life; but at this time their enemies were so enraged to see the walls built again, and so restless in their designs to keep the city from rising to its former splendour, that it terrified many from coming to dwell there, thinking themselves more safe in the country, where their enemies had no pretence to disturb them.—STACKHOUSE.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 10. Then he said unto them, Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared: for this day is holy unto our Lord: neither be ye sorry; for the joy of the Lord is your strength.

The eastern princes, and the eastern people, not only invite their friends to feasts, but it is their custom to send a portion of the banquet to those that cannot well come to it, especially their relations, and those in a state of mourning. This sending of portions to those for whom nothing was prepared, has been understood by those commentators I have consulted, to mean the poor; sending portions, however, to one another, is expressly distinguished in Esth. ix. 22, from gifts to the poor. There would not have been the shadow of a difficulty in this, had the historian been speaking of a private feast, but he is describing a national festival, where every one was supposed to be equally concerned: those, then, for whom nothing was prepared, it should seem, means those that were in a state of mourning. Mourning for private calamities being here supposed to take place of rejoicing for public concerns. But it is not only to those that are in a state of mourning that provisions are sometimes sent; others are honoured by princes in the same manner, who could not conveniently attend to the royal table, or to whom it was supposed not to be convenient. So when the grand emir found it incommoded Monsieur D'Arvioux to eat with him, he complaisantly desired him to take his own time for eating, and sent him what he liked from his kitchen, and at the time he chose. And thus, when King David would needs suppose, for secret reasons, too well known to himself, that it would be inconvenient for Uriah to continue at the royal palace, and therefore dismissed him to his own house, "there followed him a mess of meat from the king." 2 Sam. xi. 8, 10.—HARMER.

Ver. 37. And it yieldeth much increase unto the kings whom thou hast set over us because of our sins: also they have dominion over our bodies, and over our cattle, at their pleasure, and we are in great distress.

These people attribute all their losses and afflictions to their sins. Has a man lost his wife or child, he says, "Enpövatín-niemiäyäm, for the sake of my sins, this evil has come upon me." "Why, friend, do you live in this strange land?" "Because of my sins." No people can refer more to sin as the source of their misery, and yet none appear more anxious to commit it. "The sins of my ancestors, the sins of my ancestors, are in this habitation," says the old sinner, who wishes to escape the sight of his own.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 15. In those days saw I in Judah some treading wine-presses on the sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and lading asses; as also wine, grapes, and figs, and all manner of burdens, which they brought into Jerusalem on the sabbath-day: and I testified against them in the day wherein they sold victuals.

In peaceful times, the press in which the grapes and olives were trodden, was constructed in the vineyard: but in time of war and danger, it was removed into the nearest city. This precaution the restored captives were reduced to take for their safety, at the time they were visited by Nehemiah. In a state of great weakness themselves, without an efficient government or means of defence, they were exposed to the hostile machinations of numerous and powerful enemies. For this reason, many of the Jews brought their grapes from the vineyards, and trod them in Jerusalem, the only place of safety which the desolated country afforded. "In those days," said Nehemiah, "saw I in Judah, some treading wine-presses on the sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and lading asses; and also wine, grapes, and figs, and all manner of burdens, which they brought into Jerusalem on the sabbath-day." Had these wine-presses been at a distance from Jerusalem, Nehemiah, who so strictly observed the precept of resting on that day, would not have seen the violation of which he complains.

Our translators, in Mr. Harmer's opinion, seem to have been guilty of an oversight in the interpretation of this verse, which plainly supposes, that sheaves of corn were brought into Jerusalem at the very time men were treading the wine-presses. This, he observes, is a strange anachronism, since the harvest there was finished in or before the third month, and the vintage was not till the seventh. But, it may be replied in favour of our translators, that by Mr. Harmer's own admission, they have at present a species of corn in the East, which is not ripe till the end of summer; which made Rauwolf say, it was the time of harvest when he arrived at Joppa, on the thirteenth of September. But if they have such a species of corn now, it is more than probable they had it then; for the customs and management of the Orientals suffer almost no alteration from the lapse of time, and change of circumstances. If this be admitted, the difficulty vanishes: and there is nothing incongruous or absurd in supposing that Nehemiah might see his countrymen bringing this late grain in sheaves from the field, to tread it out in the city, for fear of their numerous and malicious foes, who might have set upon them; had they not taken this precaution, as the Arabs frequently do on the present inhabitants, and seized the heaps on the barn-floor. Mr. Harmer translates the Hebrew term, parcels of grapes; but as the word signifies a heap of any thing, it may with equal propriety be rendered parcels or sheaves of corn, especially as grapes are mentioned afterward. It is true, our author makes them dried grapes, but for the word dried he has no authority from the original text; there is no good reason, therefore, to find fault with our translators in this instance.—PAXTON.

Though the conveniences they have in the wine countries for pressing their grapes, were frequently in peaceful times in their vineyards, yet in times of apprehension these conveniences were often in the cities themselves. Greece, to the present day, is frequently alarmed, and always under apprehension from corsairs: accordingly we find, that though the plantations of olive-trees belonging to Athens are large, and at some distance from thence, yet the mills for grinding and pressing the olives are in that town; and this, though, according to his description, the great olive-grove, or wood of these trees, as Dr. Richard Chandler calls it, watered by the Cephissus, is about three miles from the city, and has been computed as at least six miles long. The same reason that can induce men to fetch their olives from a distance into their towns, must operate more or less forcibly with regard to their grapes. This was, in particular, the state of things at the time Nehemiah visited the children of the captivity. They had many enemies about them, and those very spiteful; and they themselves were very weak. For this reason, many of them trod their grapes in Jerusalem itself: "In those days saw I in Judah some treading wine presses on the sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and lading asses; and also wine, grapes, and figs, and all manner of burdens, which they brought into Jerusalem on the sabbath-day." Had these wine-presses been at a distance from Jerusalem, he that so strictly observed the precept of resting that day would not have seen that violation of it. They appear, by that circumstance, as well as by the other particulars mentioned there, to have been within the walls of Jerusalem. The words of Nehemiah are to be understood as signifying, "In those days saw I in Judah some treading wine-presses on the sabbath, and bringing in parcels of grapes for that purpose in baskets, which they had laden on asses, and also jars of wine, pressed elsewhere, dried grapes and figs, and all manner of burdens of victuals, which they sold on the sabbath;" the squeezing the grapes for wine, and drying them for raisins, being, it seems, at least frequently attended to at one and the same time. So when Dr. Chandler set out from Smyrna to visit Greece, in the end of August, the vintage was just begun, "the black grapes being spread on the ground in beds, exposed to the sun to dry for raisins; while in another part, the juice was expressed for wine, a man, with feet and legs bare, treading the fruit in a kind of cistern, with a hole or vent near the bottom, and a vessel beneath it to receive the liquor." (Travels in Greece.)

If the same custom obtained in Judea then, which it seems is practised in Greece now, and that the vintage was just then finishing, Nehemiah must have been particularly galled; for it seems they finish their vintage with dancing, and therefore I presume with songs, and probably music. For speaking of the Greek dances, of which some are supposed of very remote antiquity, and of one in particular, called the crane, he says, "the peasants perform it yearly in the street of the French convent, where he and his companions lodged at that time, at the conclusion of the vintage; joining hands, and preceding their mules and their asses, which are laden with grapes in panniers, in a very curved and intricate figure; the leader waving a handkerchief, which has been imagined to denote the clew given by Ariadne;" the dance being supposed to have been invented by Theseus, upon his escape from the labyrinth.

Singing seems to have been practised by the Jews in their vineyards, and shouting when they trod the grapes, from what we read, Isaiah xvi. 10: but whether dancing too, and whether they carried their profanation of the sabbath this length, in the time of Nehemiah, we are not informed. Some may have supposed that the words of Jeremiah, ch. xxxi. 4, 5, refer to the joy expressed by the Jews in the time of vintage: "Again, I will build thee, and thou shalt be built, O virgin of Israel; thou shalt again be adorned with thy tabrets, and shalt go forth in the dances of them that make merry. Thou shalt yet plant vines upon the mountains of Samaria; the planters shall plant, and eat them as common things." Vines and dancing are here joined together.—BORDER.

Ver. 25. And I contended with them, and cursed them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair, and made them swear by God, saying, Ye shall not give your daughters unto their sons, nor take their daughters unto your sons, or for yourselves.

In Judea, the punishment of infamy consisted chiefly in cutting off the hair of evil-doers: yet it is thought that pain was added to disgrace, and that they tore off the hair with violence, as if they were plucking a bird alive. This is the genuine signification of the Hebrew word used by Nehemiah in describing his conduct towards those Jews who had violated the law by taking strange wives: "And I contended with them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair." This kind of punishment was common in Persia. King Artaxerxes, instead of plucking off the hair of such of his generals as had been guilty of a fault, obliged them to lay aside the tiara. The Emperor Domitian caused the hair and beard of the philosopher Apollonius to be shaved.—PAXTON.

ESTHER.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 5. And when these days were expired, the king made a feast unto all the people that were present in Shushan the palace, both unto great and small, seven days, in the court of the garden of the king's palace; 6. Where were white, green, and blue hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble: the beds were of gold and silver, upon a pavement of red, and blue, and white, and black marble.

In the houses of the fashionable and the gay, the lower part of the walls is adorned with rich hangings of velvet or damask, tinged with the liveliest colours, suspended on hooks, or taken down at pleasure. A correct idea of their richness and splendour may be formed from the description which the inspired writer has given of the hangings in the royal garden at Shushan, the ancient capital of Persia: "Where were white, green, and blue hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble." The upper part of the walls is adorned with the most ingenious wreathings and devices, in stucco and fret-work. The ceiling is generally of wainscot, painted with great art, or else thrown into a variety of panels, with gilded mouldings. In the days of Jeremiah the prophet, when the profusion and luxury of all ranks in Judea were at their height, their chambers were ceiled with fragrant and costly wood, and painted with the richest colours. Of this extravagance, the indignant seer loudly complains: "Wo unto him that saith, I will build me a wide house and large chambers, and cutteth him out windows; and it is ceiled with cedar, and painted with vermilion." The floors of these splendid apartments were laid with painted tiles, or slabs of the most beautiful marble. A pavement of this kind is mentioned in the book of Esther: at the sumptuous entertainment which Abasuerus made for the princes and nobles of his vast empire, "the beds," or couches, upon which they reclined, "were of gold and silver, upon a pavement of red, and blue, and white, and black marble." Plaster of terrace is often used for the same purpose; and the floor is always covered with carpets, which are, for the most part, of the richest materials. Upon these carpets, a range of narrow beds, or mattresses, is often placed along the sides of the wall, with velvet or damask bolsters, for the greater ease and convenience of the company. To these luxurious indulgences the prophets occasionally seem to allude: Ezekiel was commanded to pronounce a "wo to the women that sew pillows to all arm-holes;" and Amos denounces the judgments of his God against them "that lie upon beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches, and eat the lambs out of the flock, and the calves out of the midst of the stall."—PAXTON.

To give some idea of the grandeur of this feast, we may remark, that in eastern countries their houses are built round a court, in which, upon extraordinary occasions, company is entertained, being strewed with mats and carpets. And as the court lies open to the sky, it is usual, in the summer, to have it sheltered from the heat of the sun, by a large awning or veil, which being extended upon ropes reaching across the court, from one side of the top of the house to the other, may be folded or unfolded at pleasure. The Psalmist seems to allude to some covering of this kind, Ps. 104. 2: "Who stretcheth out the heavens like a curtain." Is. 40. 2 (Shaw's Travels, p. 247.) Now the Persian king entertained the whole city of Shushan, great and small, for seven days together, in the court of the garden of the king's palace. In that garden we must suppose a very spacious area, probably containing many acres, curiously paved, and having lofty columns of marble, erected in rows at proper distances; to the tops of those columns were fixed rings of silver, through which they drew purple cords of fine linen, across from row to row, and from pillar to pillar; and over those cords they spread large sheets of delicate calico, possibly painted with blue, which would make a very splendid and beautiful sky over all the court, and a delightful shade to all the guests. Instead of mats and carpets, they had beds, or couches, of gold and silver, to sit upon, and were served with wine in vessels of gold. This is probably the idea we are to entertain of the furniture of this gorgeous banquet.—TAYLOR'S CONCORDANCE.

Dr. Russel does not represent the pavement of the courts as all mosaic work, and equally adorned, but he tells us, that it is usually that part that lies between the fountain and the arched alcove on the south side, that is thus beautified, supposing that there is but one alcove in a court; however, it should seem in some other parts of the East, there are several of these alcoves opening into the court. Maundrell, who calls them duans, in his account of the houses of Damascus, says expressly, that they have generally several on all sides of the court, "being placed at such different points, that at one or other of them you may always have either the shade or the sun, which you please." Are not these alcoves, or duans, of which, according to this, there might be several in the court of the palace of Abasuerus, what the sacred writer means by the beds adorned with silver and gold? Esth. i. 6. I shall elsewhere show, that the bed where Esther was sitting, and on which Haman threw himself, must more resemble the modern oriental duans, or divans, than the beds on which the Romans reclined at their entertainments; and consequently it is more natural to understand those beds of these alcoves, or duans, richly adorned with gold and silver, while on the lower variegated pavements carpets were also laid, for the reception of those that could not find a place in these duans; on which pavements, Dr. Shaw tells us, they are wont, in Barbary, when much company is to be entertained, to strew mats and carpets.—HARMER.

Ver. 9. Also Vashti the queen made a feast for the women in the royal house which belonged to King Ahasuerus.

The women are not permitted to associate with the other sex at an eastern banquet; but they are allowed to entertain one another in their own apartments. When Ahasuerus, the king of Persia, treated all the people of his capital with a splendid feast, Vashti, the queen, we are informed, "made a banquet for the women in the royal house, which belonged to King Ahasuerus. This, observes Chardin, is the custom of all the East; the women have their feasts at the same time, but apart from the men. And Maillet informs us, in his letters, that the same custom is observed in Egypt. This is undoubtedly the reason that the prophet distinctly mentions "the voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride;" he means that the noise of nuptial mirth was heard in different apartments. The personal voices of the newly married pair cannot be understood, but the noisy mirth which a marriage feast commonly excites; for in Syria, and probably in all the surrounding countries, the bride is condemned to absolute silence, and fixed by remorseless etiquette to the spot where she has been seated. When the banquet was finished, and the guests had removed, the poor came in and ate up the fragments, so that nothing was lost. This custom will account for the command to the servants, in the parable of the supper, "Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor, and the maimed.

and the halt, and the blind. And the servant said, Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded, and yet there is room. And the lord said unto the servant, Go out into the highways, and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled." These poor and destitute persons were called to the entertainment only before the time when, according to the custom of the country, they were expected to attend.—PAXTON.

Females, in the East, never have their feasts in the same room as the men, because it would be highly indecorous towards their lords, and they would not be able to go to those lengths of merriment, as when alone. On meeting, they embrace, and smell each other; and after they are seated, comes the betel-leaf, the chunam, and the arcaunuts. Have their lords given them any new jewels or robes; they are soon mentioned, as a proof of the favour they are in; and after they have finished their food, shroots and scandal become the order of the day.—ROBERTS.

It may be taken as a general rule, that wherever our translators have inserted a number of words in italic, they have been embarrassed to make sense of the passage; and some have been inclined to think, that in proportion to the number of words inserted, is the probability of their having missed the true import of the place. Without adopting this notion, we may venture to ask the reader, whether he has been satisfied with the ideas communicated in the first chapter of Esther?—"The king made a feast to all the people that were present at Shushan, the palace; both unto great and small, seven days, in the court of the garden of the king's palace; where were white, green, and blue hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen, and purple, to silver rings and pillars of marble; the beds were of gold, and silver, upon a pavement of red, and blue, and white, and black marble." What are we to understand by all this? hangings fastened to silver rings, to pillars of marble? cords made of fine linen? beds of gold and silver, laid on the pavement? &c. Commentators give very little information on this passage: and it is much better to trust at once to ourselves, than to transcribe their conjectures.

The first thing observable is the canopy covering the court: it was of white canvass, (carpas, כַּרְפָּס) the braces of it were blue, (כֶּחָמֶר) that is, the cords, &c. used to support this canopy, and to keep it in its place, properly extended, &c. over head. Secondly, in the court below were pavilions, platforms, or railed divisions [the word chebeli (חֵבֵלִים) signifies the railed deck of a ship] of linen [or, hung with linen] and of aragaman, [calico? fine cotton?] upon railings of silver pillars—smaller pillars (atili, אֲתִילִים) silvered over, and columns of white marble; and the divan cushions were embroidered with gold and silver: these were placed upon mustabys of porphyry (red marble) and white marble, and round-spotted marble, and marble with wandering, irregular veins. To justify this description, we shall first consider the canopy; the reader will judge of its probability and use by the following quotations:—

"Among the ruins remaining at Persepolis, is a court, containing many lofty pillars: one may even presume that these columns did not support any architrave, as Sir John Chardin has observed, but we may venture to suppose, that a covering of tapestry, or linen, was drawn over them, to intercept the perpendicular projection of the sunbeams. It is also probable that the tract of ground where most of the columns stand, was originally a court before the palace, like that which was before the king's house at Susa, mentioned Esther, chap. v. and through which a flow of fresh air was admitted into the apartments."—(Le Bruyn.) This idea of Le Bruyn, formed almost on the spot, supports our suggestion of a canopy covering the court. It is confirmed also by the custom of India. We have been told by a gentleman from whom we requested information on this subject, that "at the festival of Darma Rajah, in Calcutta, the great court of a very large house is overspread with a covering made of canvass, lined with calico; and this lining is ornamented with broad stripes, of various colours, in which (in India, observe) green predominates. On occasion of this festival, which is held only once in three years, the master of the house gives wine and cake, and other refreshments, to the English gentlemen and ladies who wish to see the ceremonies; he also gives payment, as well as hospitality, to those who perform them." That such a covering would be necessary in hot climates we may easily suppose; nor is the supposition enfeebled by remarking, that the coliseum, or Flavian amphitheatre, at Rome, has still remaining on its walls the marks of the masts, or scaffoldings, which were erected when that immense area was covered with an awning, as it was during the shows exhibited there to the Roman public. The word rendered brace (חֵבֵל) signifies to catch, to lay hold of, to connect; it may be thought that these braces went from side to side of the house; were fastened to proper projections, high in the sides of the building; and, passing under the white canvass, blue braces must have had an ornamental effect. In the lower part of the court the preparations consisted in what may be called a railed platform on a mustaby: what these were the reader will understand, by an extract from Dr. Russel's History of Aleppo.

"Part of the principal court is planted with trees, and flowering shrubs; the rest is paved. At the south end is a square basin of water, with jets d'eau, and close to it, upon a stone mustaby, is built a small pavilion: or the mustaby being only railed in, an open divan is occasionally formed on it. [Note, a mustaby is a stone platform, raised about two or three feet above the pavement of the court.] This being some steps higher than the basin, a small fountain is usually placed in the middle of the divan, the mosaic pavement round which being constantly wetted by the jet d'eau, displays a variety of splendid colours, and the water, as it runs to the basin through marble channels, which are rough at bottom, produces a pleasing murmur. Where the size of the court admits of a larger shrubbery, temporary divans are placed in the grove, or arbours are formed of slight latticed frames, covered by the vine, the rose, or the jasmine; the rose shooting to a most luxuriant height, when in full flower, is elegantly picturesque. Facing the basin, on the south side of the court, is a wide, lofty, arched alcove, about eighteen inches higher than the pavement, and entirely open to the court. It is painted in the same manner as the apartments, but the roof is finished in plain or gilt stucco; and the floor round a small fountain is paved with marble of sundry colours, with a jet d'eau in the middle. A large divan is here prepared, but being intended for the summer, chints and Cairo mats are employed instead of cloth, velvet, and carpets. It is called, by way of distinction, The Divan, and by its north aspect, and a sloping painted shed projecting over the arch, being protected from the sun, it offers a delicious situation in the hot months. The sound, not less than the sight, of the jets d'eau, is extremely refreshing; and if there be a breath of air stirring, it arrives scented by the Arabian jasmine, the henna, and other fragrant plants, growing in the shrubbery, or ranged in pots round the basin. There is usually on each side of the alcove a small room, or cabinet, neatly fitted up, and serving for retirement. These rooms are called kubbe, whence probably the Spaniards derived their al coba, which is rendered by some other nations in Europe, alcove." In another part Dr. Russel gives a print of a mustaby, with sundry musicians sitting on it, on which he observes, "The front of the stone mustaby is fitted with marble of different colours. Part of the court is paved in mosaic, in the manner represented in the print." This print "shows, in miniature, the inner court of a great house. The doors of the kaah, and part of the cupola, appear in front; on the side, the high arched alcove, or divan, with the shed above; the marble facing of the mustaby, the mosaic pavement between that and the basin, and the fountain playing."

This account of Dr. Russel's harmonizes perfectly with the history in Esther, and we have only to imagine that the railings, or smaller pillars of the divan, on the mustaby in the palace of Ahasuerus, were of silver, (silver-gilt.) while the larger, called columns, placed at the corners, or elsewhere, were of marble; the flat part of the mustaby also being overspread with carpets, &c. on which, next the railings, were cushions richly embroidered, for the purpose of being leaned against. These things, mentioned in the scripture narration, if placed according to the doctor's account, enable us to comprehend the whole of the Bible description, and justify every word in it. That the last three words describe three different kinds of marble, of which the mustaby of Ahasuerus was composed, is evident from the signification of their roots. And as to the linen which was appended to the railings, with its accompanying aragaman, we may ask, if this word signifies purple, what was the subject of it, silk, worsted, or cotton? Was it the chints of Dr. Russel? or was it of the diaper kind, that is, figured linen? or was it calico? which, on the whole, we think it was.—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

Ver. 11. To bring Vashti the queen before the king, with the crown royal, to show the people and the princes her beauty: for she was fair to look on.

The Persians, on festival occasions, used to produce their women in public. To this purpose Herodotus relates a story of seven Persians being sent to Amyntas, a Grecian prince, who received them hospitably, and gave them a splendid entertainment. When, after the entertainment, they began to drink, one of the Persians thus addressed Amyntas: "Prince of Macedonia, it is a custom with us Persians, whenever we have a public entertainment, to introduce our concubines and young wives." On this principle Ahasuerus gave command to bring his queen Vashti into the public assembly.—BURDER.

Ver. 12. But the queen Vashti refused to come at the king's commandment by his chamberlains: therefore was the king very wroth, and his anger burned in him.

When a person is speaking to you, on almost any subject, he keeps saying every moment, "Be not angry, my lord;" or, "Let not your anger burn." Judah said to Joseph, "Let not thine anger burn." "Go not near that man; his anger is on fire." "Well, well, what is the matter with that fellow?" "Not much; some one has put the torch to his anger." "Go, throw some water on that fire, or it will not soon be out."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 9. And the maiden pleased him, and she obtained kindness of him; and he speedily gave her her things for purification, with such things as belonged to her, and seven maidens, which were meet to be given her, out of the king's house: and he preferred her and her maids unto the best place of the house of the women.

After these presents followed eleven caroches (coaches) full of young maidens, slaves to serve the bride: these caroches were covered and shut, and either of them attended by eunuchs, Moors: after these followed twenty-eight virgins' slaves, attired in cloth of gold, and accompanied by twenty-eight blacke eunuchs all on horsebacke, and richly clad. After which were seen two hundred and forty mules, loaden with tents of tapestry, cloath of gold, sattin, velvet, with the ground of gold, with many cushions, which are the chaires the ladies of Turkie use, with many other rich and sumptuous moueables. (Knolles's History of the Turks.)—BURDER.

Ver. 11. And Mordecai walked every day before the court of the women's house, to know how Esther did, and what should become of her.

The apartments of the women are counted sacred and inviolable, over all the East; it is even a crime to inquire what passes within the walls of the harem, or house of the women. Hence, it is extremely difficult to be informed of the transactions in those sequestered habitations; and a man, says Chardin, may walk a hundred days, one after another, by the house where the women are, and yet know more what is done there than at the farther end of Tartary. This sufficiently explains the reason of Mordecai's conduct, who "walked every day before the court of the women's house, to know how Esther did, and what should become of her."—PAXTON.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 7. In the first month, (that is the month Nisan,) in the twelfth year of King Ahasuerus, they cast Pur, that is, the lot, before Haman, from day to day, and from month to month, to the twelfth month, that is the month Adar.

It was customary in the East, by casting lots into an urn, to inquire what days would be fortunate, and what not, to undertake any business in. According to this superstitious practice, Haman endeavoured to find out what time in the year was most favourable to the Jews, and what most unlucky. First he inquired what month was most unfortunate, and found the month Adar, which was the last month in the year, answerable to our February. There was no festival during this month, nor was it sanctified by any peculiar rites. Then he inquired the day, and found the thirteenth day was not auspicious to them, ver. 13. Some think there were as many lots as there were days in the year, and for every day he drew a lot; but found none to his mind, till he came to the last month of all, and to the middle of it. Now this whole business was governed by providence, by which these lots were directed, and not by the Persian gods, to fall in the last month of the year; whereby almost a whole year intervened between the design and its execution, and gave time for Mordecai to acquaint Esther with it, and for her to intercede with the king for the reversing, or suspending his decree, and disappointing the conspiracy.—PATRICK.

Ver. 10. And the king took his ring from his hand, and gave it unto Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, the Jews' enemy.

This he did both as a token of affection and honour. With the Persians, for a king to give a ring to any one, was a token and bond of the greatest love and friendship imaginable. It may be this was given to Haman to seal with it the letters that were or should be written, giving orders for the destruction of the Jews. Among the Romans, in aftertimes, when any one was put into the equestrian order, a ring was given to him, for originally none but knights were allowed to wear them. It was sometimes used in appointing a successor in the kingdom; as when Alexander was dying, he took his ring from off his finger, and gave it to Perdicas, by which it was understood that he was to succeed him.—BURDER.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 6. And the king said unto Esther at the banquet of wine, What is thy petition? and it shall be granted thee: and what is thy request? even to the half of the kingdom it shall be performed.

The time of drinking wine in the East, is at the beginning, not at the close of entertainments, as it is with us. Sir John Chardin has corrected an error of a French commentator, as to this point, in his manuscript note on Esther v. 6. It seems the commentator had supposed the banquet of wine meant the dessert, because this is our custom in the West; but he observes, "that the eastern people, on the contrary, drink and discourse before eating, and that after the rest is served up, the feast is quickly over, they eating very fast; and every one presently withdrawing. They conduct matters thus at the royal table, and at those of their great men." Dr. Castell, in his Lexicon, seems to have been guilty of the same fault, by a quotation annexed to that note.

Chardin's account agrees with that of Olearius, who tells us, that when the ambassadors he attended were at the Persian court, "at a solemn entertainment, the floor of the hall was covered with a cotton cloth, which was covered with all sorts of fruits and sweetmeats, in basins of gold. That with them was served up excellent Shiras wine. That after an hour's time, the sweetmeats were removed, to make way for the more substantial part of the entertainment, such as rice, boiled and roasted mutton, fowl, game, &c. That after having been at table an hour and a half, warm water was brought, in a ewer of gold, for washing; and grace being said, they began to retire without speaking a word, according to the custom of the country, as also did the ambassadors soon after." This is Olearius's account, in short: by which it appears, that wine was brought first; that the time of that part of the entertainment was double to the other; and that immediately after eating they withdrew. This was the practice of the modern court of Persia, and probably might be so in the days of Ahasuerus. Unluckily, Diodati and Dr. Castell did not attend to this circumstance, in speaking of the banquet of wine prepared by Queen Esther.—HARNER.

Ver. 9. Then went Haman forth that day joyful and with a glad heart: but when Haman saw Mordecai in the king's gate, that he stood not up, nor moved for him, he was full of indignation against Mordecai.

This is, indeed, a graphic sketch of eastern manners. The colours are so lively and so fresh, that they might have been but the work of yesterday. See the native gentleman, at the head of his courtly train: he moves along in pompous guise, and all who see him arise from their seats, take off their sandals, and humbly move in reverence to him. To some he gives a graceful wave of the hand; to others not a word nor a look. Should there be one who neither stands up nor moves to him, his name and place of abode will be inquired after, and the first opportunity eagerly embraced to glut his revenge. The case of Mutoo-Chadde-Apaa, modeliar of the Dutch governor Van de Graaff's gate, is illustrative of this disposition. A Moorman of high bearing and great riches had purchased the rent of the pearl fishery of the bay of Ondachy, and, in consequence, was a person of great influence among the people. The proud modeliar was one day passing along the road, where was seated on his carpet the renter of the pearl fishery. He arose not, moved not to him, when passing by, and the modeliar's soul was fired with indignation. He forth with resolved upon his ruin, and, by deeply-formed intrigues, too well succeeded. The rent was taken from the Moorman; the money he had advanced to the headmen, the officers, the boatmen, the divers, and others, was lost; his estates were sold; and, to make up the deficiency, he himself was disposed of by auction for four hundred and twenty-five rix-dollars, and the modeliar became the purchaser.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 12. Haman said moreover, Yea, Esther the queen did let no man come in with the king unto the banquet that she had prepared but myself; and to-morrow am I invited unto her also with the king.

The kings of Persia very seldom admitted a subject to their table. Athenæus mentions it as a peculiar honour, which no Grecian enjoyed before or after, that Artaxerxes condescended to invite Timogoras, the Cretan, to dine even at the table where his relations ate; and to send sometimes a part of what was served up at his own; which some persons looked upon as a diminution of his majesty, and a prostitution of their national honour. Plutarch, in his life of Artaxerxes, tells us, that none but the king's mother, and his real wife, were permitted to sit at his table; and he therefore mentions it as a condescension in that prince, that he sometimes invited his brothers. Haman, the prime minister of Ahasuerus, had therefore some reason to value himself upon the invitation which he received, to dine with the king: "Haman said, moreover, Yea, Esther the queen let no man come in with the king, into the banquet which she had prepared, but myself; and to-morrow am I invited unto her also with the king." The same ambitious minister received another mark of great distinction from his master: "The king took his ring from his hand, and gave it unto Haman." This he did, both as a token of affection and honour; for when the king of Persia gives a ring to any one, it is a token and bond of the greatest love and friendship. "Here also," says Mr. Forbes, "we see an exact description of the mode of conferring honour on the favourite of a sovereign, a princely dress, a horse, and a ring; these are now the usual presents to foreign ambassadors, and between one Indian prince and another.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1. On that night could not the king sleep; and he commanded to bring the book of records of the Chronicles; and they were read before the king.

That which was practised in the court of Ahasuerus, in the passage now referred to, appears to have been customary in the Ottoman porte. "It was likewise found in the records of the empire, that the last war with Russia had occasioned the fitting out of a hundred and fifty galliots, intended to penetrate into the sea of Azoph; and the particulars mentioned in the account of the expenses not specifying the motives of this armament, it was forgotten that the ports of Azoph and Taganrag stood for nothing in the present war; the building of the galliots was ordered, and carried on with the greatest despatch." (Baron De Tott).

"The king has near his person an officer, who is next to be his historiographer; he is also keeper of his seal, and is obliged to make a journal of the king's actions, good or bad, without comment of his own upon them. Thus, when the king dies, or at least soon after, is delivered to the council, who read it over, and erase every thing false in it, while they supply every material fact that may have been omitted, whether purposely or not." (Bruce.)—BUNTER.

Ver. 7. And Haman answered the king, For the man whom the king delighteth to honour, 8. Let the royal apparel be brought which the king useth to wear, and the horse that the king rideth upon, and the crown royal which is set upon his head: 9. And let this apparel and horse be delivered to the hand of one of the king's most noble princes, that they may array the man with whom the king delighteth to honour, and bring him on horseback through the street of the city, and proclaim before him, Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour.

Pitts gives an account of a cavalcade at Algiers, upon a person's turning Mohammedan, which is designed to do him, as well as their law, honour. "The apostate is to get on horseback, on a stately steed, with a rich saddle and fine trappings; he is also richly habited, and hath a turban on his head, but nothing of this is to be called his own; only there are given him about two or three yards of broadcloth, which is laid before him on the saddle. The horse, with him on his back, is led all round the city, which he is several hours in doing. The apostate is attended with drums and other music, and twenty or thirty sergeants. These march in order, on each side of the horse, with naked swords in their hands. The crier goes before, with a loud voice giving thanks to God for the proselyte that is made." The conformity of custom in the instance now cited, and the passage alluded to in Esther, must appear remarkable.—BUNTER.

Herodotus relates, that the kings of Persia had horses peculiar to themselves, that were brought from Armenia, and were remarkable for their beauty. If the same law prevailed in Persia as did in Judea, no man might ride on the king's horse, any more than sit on his throne, or hold his sceptre. This clearly discovers the extent of Haman's ambition, when he proposed to bring "the royal apparel which the king used to wear, and the horse that the king rode upon, and the crown which is set upon his head." The crown royal was not to be set on the head of the man, but on the head of the horse; this interpretation is allowed by Aben Ezra, by the Targum, and by the Syriac version. No mention is afterward made of the crown, as set upon the head of Mordecai, nor would Haman have dared to advise what, by the laws of Persia, could not be granted. But it was usual to put the crown royal on the head of a horse led in state; and this we are assured is a custom in Persia, as it is with the Ethiopians, to this day; from them it passed into Italy; for the horses which the Romans yoked in their triumphal chariots were adorned with crowns.—PAXTON.

Very few English readers are sufficiently aware of the importance attached to the donation of robes of honour in the East. They mark the degree of estimation in which the party bestowing them holds the party receiving them; and sometimes the conferring or the withholding of them leads to very serious negotiation, and misunderstandings. "The prince of Shiraz," says Mr. Morier, "went in his greatest state to Kalaat Poushan, there to meet and to be invested with the dress of honour, which was sent him by the king, on the festival of No-Rouz. Although the day of the festival had long elapsed, yet the ceremony did not take place until this time, as the astrologers did not announce a day sufficiently fortunate for the performance of an act of so much consequence as this is looked upon to be throughout Persia. All the circumstances attendant upon the reception of a Kalaat being the great criterions by which the public may judge of the degree of influence which the receiver has at court, every intrigue is exerted during the preparation of the Kalaat, that it may be as indicative of the royal favour as possible. The person who is the bearer of it, the expressions used in the firman, which announces its having been conferred, the nature of the Kalaat itself, are all circumstances that are examined and discussed by the Persian public. A common Kalaat consists of a caba, or coat; a kummer-band, or zone; a gouch-peech, or shawl for the head;—when it is intended to be more distinguishing, a sword or a dagger is added. To persons of distinction, rich furs are given, such as a catabece, or a coardee; but when the Kalaat is complete, it consists exactly of the same articles as the present which Cyrus made to Syennesis, namely, a horse with a golden bridle, ἵππῳ χρυσοῦ ἀλίνῳ; a golden chain, ἀργύρεον χρυσῶν; a golden sword, ἀσπίδα χρυσῶν; besides the dress, the σκεῦος ἡγεμονίας, which is complete in all its parts. Such, or nearly such, was the Kalaat which the prince went out to meet; and consequently he gave as much publicity to it as he could devise. . . . The prince himself was conspicuous at a distance, by a parasol being borne over his head, which, to this day, is a privilege allowed only to royalty, and is exemplified by the sculptures at Persepolis, where the principal personage is frequently designated by a parasol carried over him. . . . The road, about three miles, was strewn with roses, and watered; both of which are modes of doing honour to persons of distinction; and, at very frequent intervals, glass vases, filled with sugar, were broken under his horses' feet. The treading upon sugar is symbolical, in their estimation, of prosperity; the scattering of flowers was a ceremony performed in honour of Alexander, on his entry into Babylon, and has perhaps some affinity to the custom of cutting down branches off the trees, and strewing them in the way, as was practised on our Saviour's entry into Jerusalem, Mark xi. 5. The other circumstance, 'the spreading of garments in the way,' is used in the scriptures as announcing royalty."

In another passage, Mr. Morier observes, that the Persian plenipotentiary to the signature of a treaty with Russia, "at first was at a loss how to make himself equal in personal distinctions (and numerous titles) to the Russian negotiator; but recollecting that, previous to his departure, his sovereign had honoured him by a present of one of his swords, and of a dagger set with precious stones, to wear which is a peculiar distinction in Persia; and besides, had clothed him with one of his own shawl robes, a distinction of still greater value, he therefore designated himself in the preamble of the treaty as endowed with the special gifts of the monarch, lord of the dagger set in jewels, of the sword adorned with gems, and of the shawl coat already worn. This may appear ridiculous to us, but it will be remembered that the bestowing of dresses as a mark of honour among eastern nations, is one of the most ancient customs recorded both in sacred and profane history. We may learn how great was the distinction of giving a coat already worn, by what is recorded of Jonathan's love for David: 'And Jonathan stripped himself of the robe that was upon him, and gave it to David, and his garments, even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle,' (1 Sam. xviii. 4;) and also in the history of Mordecai, we read, 'For the man whom the king delighted to honour, let the royal apparel be brought which the king used to wear,' &c. Esther v. 7, 8."

The reader will be pleased with these additional circumstances and authorities: but, perhaps, he will do well to consider the sword, the bow, and the girdle of Jonathan, as military appendage: and as peculiarly referring to the military exploits of David. The history of Mordecai having taken place in Persia, every custom of that country, by which it may be illustrated, is the more strictly appropriate and acceptable.—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 7. And the king arising from the banquet of wine in his wrath, went into the palace-garden: and Haman stood up to make request for his life to Esther the queen; for he saw that there was evil determined against him by the king.

"When the king of Persia," says Tavernier, "orders a person to be executed, and then rises, and goes into a woman's apartment, it is a sign that no mercy is to be hoped for." But even the sudden rising of the king in anger, was the same as if he had pronounced the sentence of death. Olearius relates an instance of it, which occurred when he was in Persia. Schah Sefi once felt himself offended by unseasonable jokes, which one of his favourites allowed himself in his presence. The king immediately rose and retired, upon which the favourite saw that his life was forfeited. He went home in confusion, and in a few hours afterward the king sent for his head.—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 8. Then the king returned out of the palace-garden into the place of the banquet of wine; and Haman was fallen upon the bed whereon Esther was. Then said the king, Will he force the queen also before me in the house? As the word went out of the king's mouth, they covered Haman's face.

The majesty of the kings of Persia did not allow malefactors to look at them. As soon as Haman was so considered, his face was covered. Some curious correspondent examples are collected together in Poole's Synopsis, in loc. From Pococke we find the custom still continues. Speaking of the artifice by which an Egyptian boy was taken off, he says, "A man being brought before him like a malefactor just taken, with his hands behind him as if tied, and a napkin put over his head, as malefactors commonly have, when he came into his presence, suddenly shot him dead."—BURDER.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 10. And he wrote in the king Ahasuerus' name, and sealed it with the king's ring; and sent letters by posts on horseback, and riders on mules, camels, and young dromedaries.

See on Job 9. 25.

Ver. 15. And Mordecai went out from the presence of the king in royal apparel of blue and white, and with a great crown of gold, and with a garment of fine linen and purple: and the city of Shushan rejoiced and was glad.

See on Dan. 5. 29.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 19. Therefore the Jews of the villages, that dwelt in the unwall'd towns, made the fourteenth day of the month Adar a day of gladness and feasting, and a good day, and of sending portions one to another.

See on Nehem. 8. 10.

On the first of the Hindoo month of July, also on the first day of the new moon of their October, the people send portions of cakes, preserves, fruits, oil, and clothes, one to another.—ROBERTS.

The eastern princes and people not only invite their friends to feasts, but "it is their custom to send a portion of the banquet to those that cannot well come to it, especially their relations, and those in a state of mourning." (Charidia.) Thus when the grand emir found it incommoded M. D'Arvieux to eat with him, he desired him to take his own time for eating, and sent him from his kitchen, what he liked, and at the time he chose.

This was the name, after the Babylonish captivity, of the twelfth month, nearly answering to our February, O. S. and perhaps so called from the richness or exuberance of the earth in plants and flowers at that season, in the warm eastern countries. "As February advances, the fields, which were partly green before, now, by the springing up of the latter grain, become entirely covered with an agreeable verdure; and though the trees continue in their leafless state till the end of this month, or the beginning of March, yet the almond, when latest, being in blossom before the middle of February, and quickly succeeded by the apricot, peach, &c. gives the gardens an agreeable appearance. The spring now becomes extremely pleasant." (Russel's Nat. Hist. of Aleppo.)—BURDEA.

Ver. 26. Wherefore they called these days Purim, after the name of Pur.

This festival was to be kept two days successively, the fourteenth and fifteenth of the month Adar, ver. 21. On both days of the feast the modern Jews read over the Megillah, or book of Esther, in their synagogues. The copy there read must not be printed, but written on veilum, in the form of a roll; and the names of the ten sons of Haman are written on it in a peculiar manner, being ranged, they say, like so many bodies hanged on a gibbet. The reader must pronounce all these names in one breath. Whenever Haman's name is pronounced, they make a terrible noise in the synagogue: some drum with their feet on the floor, and the boys have mallets, with which to knock and make a noise. They prepare themselves for their carnival by a previous fast, which should continue three days, in imitation of Esther's, Esther iv. 16, but they have mostly reduced it to one day.—JENNINGS.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 3. For Mordecai the Jew was next unto the king Ahasuerus, and great among the Jews, and accepted of the multitude of his brethren, seeking the wealth of his people, and speaking peace to all his seed.

Sir John Malcolm tells us, that the sepulchre of Esther and Mordecai stands near the centre of the city of Hamadan. It is a square building, terminated by a dome, with an inscription in Hebrew upon it, translated and sent to him by Sir Gore Ouseley, late ambassador to the court of Persia. It is as follows: "Thursday, fifteenth of the month Adar, in the year 4174 from the creation of the world, was finished the building of this temple, over the graves of Mordecai and Esther, by the hands of the good-hearted brothers, Elias and Samuel, the sons of the deceased Ismael of Kashan."

A more particular and recent account of this tomb will be found in the following extract: "This tomb is regarded by all the Jews, who yet exist in the empire, as a place of particular sanctity; and pilgrimages are still made to it at certain seasons of the year, in the same spirit of holy penitence with which, in former times, they turned their eyes towards Jerusalem. Being desirous of visiting a place, which Christians cannot view without reverence, I sent to request that favour of the priest, under whose care it is preserved. He came to me immediately on my message, and seemed pleased with the respect manifested towards the ancient people of his nation, in the manner with which I asked to be admitted to their shrine. I accompanied the priest through the town, over much ruin and rubbish, to an enclosed piece of ground, rather more elevated than any in its immediate vicinity. In the centre was the Jewish tomb; a square building of brick, of a masque-like form, with a rather elongated dome at the top; the whole seems in a very decaying state; falling fast to the mouldered condition of some wall fragments around, which, in former times, had been connected with, and extended the consequence of the sacred enclosure. The door that admitted us into the tomb is in the ancient sepulchral fashion of the country, very small; consisting of a single stone of great thickness, and turning on its own pivots from one side. Its key is always in possession of the head of the Jews, resident at Hamadan; and doubtless has been so preserved, from the time of the holy pair's interment, when the grateful sons of the captivity, whose lives they had rescued from universal massacre, first erected a monument over the remains of their benefactors, and obeyed the ordinance of gratitude, in making the anniversary of their preservation, a lasting memorial of heaven's mercy, and the just faith of Esther and Mordecai. "So God remembered his people, and justified his inheritance. Therefore those days shall be unto them, in the month Adar, the fourteenth and fifteenth day of the same month, and with an assembly, and joy, and with gladness before God, according to the generation for ever among his people." Esth. x. 12, 13. The pilgrimage yet kept up, is a continuation of this appointed assembling. And thus having existed from the time of the event, such a memorial becomes an evidence to the fact, more convincing, perhaps, than even written testimony; it seems a kind of eyewitness. The original structure, it is said, was destroyed at the sacking of the place, by Timour; and soon after that catastrophe, when the country became a little settled, the present unobtrusive building was raised on the original spot. Certain devout Jews of the city stood at the expense; and about a hundred and fifty years ago, (nearly five hundred after its re-erection,) it was fully repaired by a rabbi of the name of Ismael. On passing through the little portal, which we did in an almost doubled position, we entered a small arched chamber, in which are seen the graves of several rabbis: probably, one may cover the remains of the pious Ismael; and, not unlikely, the others may contain the bodies of the first rebuilders, after the sacrilegious destruction by Timour. Having trod lightly by their graves, a second door of such very confined dimensions presented itself at the end of this vestibule, that we were constrained to enter it on our hands and knees, and then standing up, we found ourselves in a larger chamber to which appertained the dome. Immediately under its concave, stand two sarcophagi, made of a very dark wood, carved with great intricacy of pattern, and richness of twisted ornament, with a line of inscription in Hebrew, running round the upper ledge of each. Many other inscriptions, in the same language, are cut on the walls, while one of the oldest antiquity, engraved on a slab of white marble, is let into the wall itself. The priest assured me it had been rescued from the ruins of the first edifice, at its demolition by the Tartars; and, with the sarcophagi themselves, was preserved on the same consecrated spot." (Sir R. K. Porter.)—BURDEA.

JOB.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 3. His substance also was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels, and five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she-asses, and a very great household; so that this man was the greatest of all the men of the east.

It is remarkable that in this passage female asses only are enumerated; the reason is, because in them great part of their wealth consisted; the males being few, and not held in equal estimation. We find that the former were chosen for riding by the natives of these parts: and the ass of Balaam is distinguished as a female. They were probably led to this choice for convenience; for, where the country was so little fertile, no other animal could subsist so easily as this: and there was another superior advantage in the female; that whoever traversed these wilds upon a she-ass, if he could but find for it sufficient browse and water, was sure to be rewarded with a more pleasing and nutritious beverage.—BRYANT.

Ver. 4. And his sons went and feasted in their houses every one his day; and sent and called for their three sisters, to eat and to drink with them.

Literally, "were wont and held a banquet-house;" which is not exactly an English idiom. The original phrase literally signifies, "a banquet-house," or "open house for feasting;" and hence Tyndal renders it, "made banquettes;" which is not perfectly literal, but far less paraphrastic than our common rendering, "went and feasted in their houses."—GOON.

Ver. 5. And it was so, when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them, and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt-offerings according to the number of them all: for Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. Thus did Job continually.

The feasting continued till they had been at each other's house in turn. Something like this is practised by the Chinese, who have their co-fraternities, which they call the brotherhood of the month; this consists of thirty, according to the number of days therein, and in a circle they go every day to eat at one another's houses by turns. If one man have not conveniences to receive the fraternity in his own house, he may provide for it at another; and there are many public-houses very well provided for this purpose.—BURDER.

Ver. 7. And the LORD said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the LORD, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and walking up and down in it.

In our common version, "From going to and fro;" but this is not the exact meaning of the Hebrew  $\text{וּבְרֹאשׁוֹ}$ ; which, as is well observed by Schultens, imports not so much the act of going forward and backward, as of making a circuit or circumference; of going round about. It is hence justly rendered in the Spanish, "De cercar por la tierra," "From encircling or encompassing the earth;" to which is added, in the Chaldaic paraphrase, "to examine into the works of the sons of man." The Hebrew verb  $\text{וּבְרֹאשׁוֹ}$  is still in general use among Arabic writers, and, in every instance, implies the same idea of gyration, or circumbulation.—GOON.

Ver. 10. Hast thou not made a hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land.

It is said of a man who cannot be injured, "Why attempt to hurt him? is there not a hedge about him?" "You cannot get at the fellow, he has a strong hedge about him." "Yes, yes; the modeliar has become his hedge."—ROBERTS.

To give the original verb the full force of its meaning, it should be derived from the science of engineering, and rendered, "Hast thou not raised a palisado about him?" The Hebrew verb  $\text{סָבַב}$  implies, to fence with sharp spikes, palisades, or thorns; and hence the substantive  $\text{סָבַב}$  is used for spikes, palisades, or thorns themselves. The Arabian writers employ the same term, and even the same idiom, still more frequently than the Hebrews. In the Arabic version of the passage before us, the metaphor is varied still further; but the observations thus offered will render the variation not difficult of comprehension: thus, instead of being interpreted as above, "Hast thou not made a fence about him?" it is translated in the Arabic copy, "Hast thou not protected him with thy hand?" The Syriac runs to the same effect, while the Chaldee paraphrast translates, "Hast thou not overcovered him with thy word?"

In the latter clause of this verse, the words, "increased in the land," are, in the Hebrew, "overflowed the land." Our common version merely gives the sense of the original, without the figure, whose force and elegance render it highly worthy of being retained. The Hebrew  $\text{פָּרַז}$  does not simply mean to increase, but to burst or break forth as a torrent; and hence to overflow or exundate its boundaries. The word is used in the same rendering in many parts of the Bible, in which it cannot be otherwise translated. The following instance may suffice, from the standard English text, 2 Sam. v. 20: "The Lord hath broken forth upon mine enemies before me, as the breach of waters; therefore he called the name of that place Baal-Perazim." The Arabians employ, to this hour, the very same term to express the mouth or embouchure, the most rapid and irresistible part of a stream, in proof of which, Goliath, with much pertinency, brings the following complement from Gjanhari, the whole of which is highly applicable, and where the word mouth, in the second line, is in the original expressed by this very term:—

"His rushing wealth overflowed him with its heaps:
So, at its mouth, the mad Euphrates sweeps."

Dr. Stock has caught something of the idea, though it is not so clearly expressed as it might have been:

"And his possessions burst out through the land."

So the versions of Junius and Tremellius, and Piscator, "Et pecus ejus in multitudinem eruperit in terra."—"And his cattle, for multitude, have burst forth through the land." The Hebrew  $\text{סָבַב}$  substance or possession, is often used for cattle, as the earliest substance or possession. So cattle, among ourselves, is said by the etymologists to be derived from capitativa.—GOON.

Ver. 12. And the LORD said unto Satan, Behold, all that he hath is in thy power; only upon himself put not forth thine hand. So Satan went forth from the presence of the LORD.

The subject proposed by the writer of the ensuing poem is the trial and triumph of the integrity of Job; a character of whose origin no certain documents have descended to us, but who, at the period in question, was chief magistrate, or emir, as we should style him in the present day, of the city of Uz; powerful and prosperous beyond all the sons of the East, and whose virtue and piety were as eminently distinguished as his rank. Of the four characters introduced into the poem, as his friends, Eliphaz, Bildad, Zophar, and Elihu, the first three are denominated, in all the Greek translations of the poem, kings of the respective cities or districts to which their names are prefixed; and the last is particularized, in the Chaldee paraphrase, as a relation of Abraham, and was probably, therefore, a descendant of Baz, the second son of Nahor, the brother of Abraham, as conjectured by Bochart. There are some critics, however, and of great distinction for learning and piety, who, in opposition to these biographical remarks, contend that the whole of the poem, as well in its characters as in its structure, is fabulous. Such especially is the opinion of Professor Michaelis, whose chief arguments are derived from the nature of the exordium, in which Satan appears as the accuser of Job; from the temptations and sufferings permitted by the great Governor of the world to befall an upright character; from the roundness of the numbers by which the patriarch's possessions are described, as seven thousand, three thousand, one thousand, and five hundred; and from the years he is said to have lived after his recovery from disease. It may perhaps be thought to demand a more subjugating force than is lodged in these arguments, to transmute into fable what has uniformly been regarded as fact, both in Europe and Asia; for perhaps upwards of four thousand years; which appears to have descended as fact, in a regular stream of belief, in the very country which forms the scene of the history, from the supposed time of its occurrence to the present day; the chief character in which is represented as having had an actual existence, and is often associated with real characters, as Noah, Abraham, Ismael, Isaac, Jacob, and Solomon, in various parts of the book which is there held most sacred, and which, so far as it is derived from national history or tradition, is entitled to minute attention; and (which should seem long since to have settled the question definitely) a character which, precisely in the same manner, is associated with real characters in the authoritative pages of the Old Testament. "It is altogether incredible," observes M. Michaelis, "that such a conversation ever took place between the Almighty and Satan, who is supposed to return with news from the terrestrial regions." But why should such a conversation be supposed incredible? The attempt at wit in this passage is somewhat out of place; for the interrogation of the Almighty, "Hast thou fixed thy view upon my servant Job, a perfect and upright man?" instead of aiming at the acquisition of news, is intended as a severe and most appropriate sarcasm upon the fallen spirit. "Hast thou, who, with superior faculties and a more comprehensive knowledge of my will, hast not continued perfect and upright, fixed thy view upon a subordinate being, far weaker and less informed than thyself, who has continued so?" The attendance of the apostate at the tribunal of the Almighty is plainly designed to show us, that good and evil angels are equally amenable to him, and equally subject to his authority;—a doctrine common to every part of the Jewish and Christian scriptures, and, except in the mythology of the Parsees, recognised by perhaps every ancient system of religion whatever. The part assigned to Satan in the present work is that expressly assigned to him in the case of Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden, and of our Saviour in the wilderness; and which is assigned to him generally, in regard to mankind at large, by all the Evangelists and Apostles, whose writings have reached us, both in their strictest historical narratives, and closest argumentative inductions. And, hence, the argument which should induce us to regard the present passage as fabulous, should induce us to regard all the rest in the same light, which are imbued with the same doctrine;—a view of the subject which would sweep into nothingness a much larger portion of the Bible than I am confident M. Michaelis would choose to part with. The other arguments are comparatively of small moment. We want not fable to tell us that good and upright men may occasionally become the victims of accumulated calamities; for it is a living fact, which, in the mystery of providence, is perpetually occurring in every country: while as to the roundness of the numbers by which the patriarch's possessions are described, nothing could have been more ungraceful or superfluous than for the poet to have descended to units, had even the literal numeration demanded it. And, although he is stated to have lived a hundred and forty years after his restoration to prosperity, and in an era in which the duration of man did not perhaps much exceed that of the present day, it should be recollected, that in his person, as well as in his property, he was specially gifted by the Almighty: that, from various passages, he seems to have been younger than all the interlocutors, except Elihu, and much younger than one or two of them; that his longevity is particularly remarked, as though of more than usual extent; and that, even in the present age of the world, we have well-authenticated instances of persons having lived, in different parts of the globe, to the age of a hundred and fifty, a hundred and sixty, and even a hundred and seventy years.

It is not necessary for the historical truth of the book of Job, that its language should be a direct transcript of that actually employed by the different characters introduced into it; for in such case we should scarcely have a single book of real history in the world. The Iliad, Shah Nameh, and the Lusiad, must at once drop all pretensions to such a description; and even the pages of Sallust and Cesar, of Rollin and Hume, must stand upon very questionable authority. It is enough that the real sentiment be given, and the general style copied; and this, in truth, is all that is aimed at, not only in our best reports of parliamentary speeches, but, in many instances, (which indeed is much more to the purpose,) by the writers of the New Testament, in their quotations from the Old. The general scope and moral of the ensuing poem, namely, that the troubles and affliction of the good man are, for the most part, designed as tests of his virtue and integrity, out of which he will at length emerge with additional splendour and happiness, are common to eastern poets, and not uncommon to those of Greece. The Odyssey is expressly constructed upon such a basis; and, like the poem before us, has every appearance of being founded upon real history, and calls in to its aid the machinery of a sublime and supernatural agency. But in various respects the poem of Job stands alone and unrivalled. In addition to every corporeal suffering and privation which it is possible for man to endure, it carries forward the trial, in a manner and to an extent which has never been attempted elsewhere, into the keenest faculties and sensations of the mind; and mixes the bitterest taunts and accusations of friendship, with the agonies of family bereavement and despair. The body of other poems consists chiefly of incidents; that of the present poem of colloquy or argument, in which the general train of reasoning is so well sustained, its matter so important, its language so ornamented, the doctrines it develops so sublime, its transitions from passion to passion so varied and abrupt, that the want of incidents is not felt; and the attention is still riveted, as by enchantment. In other poems, the supernatural agency is fictitious, and often incongruous: here the whole is solid reality, supported, in its grand outline by the concurrent testimony of every other part of the scriptures; an agency not obtrusively introduced, but demanded by the magnitude of the occasion; and as much more exalted and magnificent than every other kind of similar interference, as it is more veritable and solemn. The suffering hero is sublimely called forth to the performance of his part, in the presence of men and of angels; each becomes interested, and equally interested, in his conduct; the Almighty assents to the trial, and for a period withdraws his divine aid; the malice of Satan is in its full career of activity; hell hopes, earth trembles, and every good spirit is suspended with awful anxiety. The wreck of his substance is in vain; the wreck of his family is in vain; the scalding sores of a corroding leprosy are in vain; the artillery of insults, reproaches, and railing poured forth from the mouth of bosom friends, are in vain. Though at times put in some degree off his guard, the holy sufferer is never completely overpowered. He sustains the shock without yielding; he still holds fast his integrity. Thus terminates the trial of faith:—Satan is confounded; fidelity triumphs; and the Almighty, with a magnificence well worthy of the occasion, unveils his resplendent trihnaal, and crowns the afflicted champion with his applause.

This poem has been generally supposed to possess a dramatic character, either of a more or a less perfect degree; but, in order to give it such a pretension, it has uniformly been found necessary to strip it of its magnificent exordium and close, which are unquestionably narrative; and even then the dramatic cast is so singularly interrupted by the appearance of the historian himself, at the commencement of every speech, to inform us of the name of the person who is about to take up the argument, that many critics, and among the rest Bishop Lowth, are doubtful of the propriety of referring it to this department of poetry, though they do not know where else to give it a place. In the present writer's view of the subject, it is a regular Hebrew epic; and, were it necessary to enter so minutely into the question, it might easily be proved to possess all the more prominent features of an epic, as collected and laid down by Aristotle himself; such as unity, completion, and grandeur in its action; loftiness in its sentiments and language; multitude and variety in the passions which it develops. Even the characters, though not numerous, are discriminated, and well supported; the milder and more modest temper of Eliphaz is well contrasted with the forward and unrestrained violence of Bildad; the terseness and brevity of Zophar with the pent-up and overflowing fulness of Elihu; while in Job himself we perceive a dignity of mind that nothing can humiliate, a firmness that nothing can subdue, still habitually disclosing themselves, amidst the mingled tumult of hope, fear, rage, tenderness, triumph, and despair, with which he is alternately distracted. I throw out this hint, however, not with a view of ascribing any additional merit to the poem itself, but merely to observe, so far as a single fact is possessed of authority, that mental taste, or the internal discernment of real beauty, is the same in all ages and nations; and that the rules of the Greek critic are deduced from a principle of universal impulse and operation.

Nothing can have been more unfortunate for this most excellent composition, than its division into chapters, and especially such a division as that in common use; in which not only the unity of the general subject, but, in many instances, that of a single paragraph, or even of a single clause, is completely broken in upon and destroyed. The natural division, and that which was unquestionably intended by its author, is into six parts, or books; for in this order it still continues to run, notwithstanding all the confusion it has encountered by sub-arrangements. These six parts are, An opening or exordium, containing the introductory history and decree concerning Job;—three distinct series of arguments, in each of which the speakers are regularly allotted their respective turns;—the summing up of the controversy;—and the close or catastrophe, consisting of the suffering hero's grand and glorious acquittal, and restoration to prosperity and happiness.—Good.

Ver. 14. And there came a messenger unto Job, and said, The oxen were ploughing, and the asses feeding beside them.

Heb. "She-asses." In our common version, which seems borrowed from Tyndal, asses: yet why the sex, which is so expressly mentioned in the original and the Septuagint, and is copied into every version with which I am acquainted, excepting these two, should be here suppressed, I know not. Female asses, on account of their milk, were much more highly esteemed, at all times, in the East, than males, a few of which only appear to have been kept for continuing the breed; and hence, perhaps, they are not noticed in ver. 3 of this chapter, which gives us a catalogue of the patriarch's live-stock. She-asses, moreover, on account of their milk, were generally preferred for travelling. The ass of Balaam is expressly declared to have been female, Numb. xxii. 21; as is that of Abraham, Gen. xxii. 3.—Good.

Ver. 15. And the Sabeans fell upon them, and took them away; yea, they have slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

Heb. "And the Sabean rushed forth"—a poetic expression for "the Sabeans," or "Sabean tribe." The Syriac version gives us, "a band or company rushed forth," the word Sabean being omitted. Saba, or Sheba, was a town or city of Arabia Deserta; and the Sabeans and Chaldeans were wont to wander in distinct bands or hordes, upon predatory excursions, over the whole of the border country, and perhaps, at times, as far as from the banks of the Euphrates to the outskirts of Egypt. The Bedouin Arabs of the present day present us with the best specimens of these parties of irregular plunderers. Both are equally entitled to the appellation of Kedarines; the root of which, in Arabic as well as in Hebrew, implies assault, incursion, tumult; and both either have employed, or still continue to employ, as a covering for their tents, a coarse brown hair cloth, obtained from their dark-coloured and shaggy goats; whence the fair bride of Solomon, in the song of songs,— "Brown am I, but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem!

As the tents of Kedar."—Good.

Ver. 20. Then Job arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped.

These are two of the actions by which great distress or agony of mind has, in all ages, been accustomed to be expressed in the East. In addition to these, sometimes the hair of the beard was also shaven or plucked off, as was done by Ezra, on his arrival at Jerusalem, on finding that the Hebrews, instead of keeping themselves a distinct and holy people, after their return from captivity, had intermixed with the nations around them, and plunged into all their abominations and idolatries. Ezra ix. 3. And sometimes, instead of shaving the hair of the head, the mourner, in the fulness of his humiliation and self-abasement, threw the dust, in which he sat, all over him, and purposely covered his hair with it. See Job ii. 12. After shaving the head, when this sign of distress was adopted, a vow was occasionally offered to the Almighty, in the hope of obtaining deliverance. This seems to have been a frequent custom with St. Paul, who did both, as well at Cenchrea as at Jerusalem, and in both places probably on this very account. See Acts xviii. 18. and xxi. 24.—Good.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 4. And Satan answered the LORD, and said, Skin for skin; yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life.

The Arabs set the exploits of their chiefs in the dialogue form, like the book of Job. The Cingalese often spend hours at night in reciting alternately the exploits of Buddha, and of their gods and devils. I have often been disturbed by them. This passage, imperfectly explained by most commentators, is, by Mr. Robinson, set in so clear a light, that the reader will be better satisfied with a quotation, than an abridgment. "Before the invention of money, trade used to be carried on by barter, that is, by exchanging one commodity for another. The man who had been hunting in the woods for wild beasts, would carry their skins to market, and exchange them with the armourer for so many bows and arrows. As these traffickers were liable to be robbed, they sometimes agreed to give a party of men a share for defending them; and skins were a very ancient tribute. With them they redeemed their own shares of property and their lives. It is to one or both of these customs, that the text alludes, as a proverb. Imagine one of these primitive fairs. A multitude of people from all parts, of different tribes and languages, in a broad field, all over-spread with various commodities to be exchanged. Imagine this fair to be held after a good hunting season, and a bad harvest. The skimmers are numerous, and clothing cheap. Wheat, the staff of life, is scarce, and the whole fair dreads a famine. How many skins this year will a man give for this necessary article, without which, he and his family must inevitably die? Why, each would add to the heap, and put 'skin upon skin, for all' the skins 'that a man hath, will be give for his life.' Imagine the wheat growers, of whom Job was one, carrying home the skins, which they had taken for wheat. Imagine the party engaged to protect them, raising the tribute, and threatening if it were not paid, to put them to death. What proportion of skins would these merchants give, in this case of necessity? Skin upon skin, all the skins that they have, will they give for their lives. The proverb then means, that we should save our lives at any price.—CALLAWAY.

Ver. 7. So went Satan forth from the presence of the LORD, and smote Job with sore biles, from the sole of his foot unto his crown.

Respectable people have the greatest possible dread and disgust at biles, and all cutaneous diseases. Here, then, we see the princely Job the victim of a loathsome disorder, sitting among the ashes and broken earthen vessels, the impure refuse of the kitchen and other places. See the poor neglected object who is labouring under similar diseases at this day, from the head to the foot; he is covered with scales and blotches, around his loins is a scanty rag, he wanders from one lonely place to another, and when he sees you, stretches out a hand towards you, and another to his sores, and piteously implores help!—ROBERTS.

Ver. 7. So went Satan forth from the presence of the LORD, and smote Job with sore biles, from the sole of his foot unto his crown. 8. And he took him a potsherd to scrape himself withal; and he sat down among the ashes.

A remarkable disease mentioned in the scriptures is that which was inflicted on Job, and of which he so feelingly complains in several parts of his book. Commentators have differed as to its peculiar nature; but the best informed have fixed upon elephantiasis, as a disease well known in eastern countries, and corresponding with the hints which Job gives of it in his conversations with his friends. The following is an abridgment of what is said of it by Dr. Heberden and Michaelis. It begins with a sudden eruption of tubercles or tumours of different sizes, of a red colour, attended with great heat and itching, on different parts of the body, and a degree of fever, by which the skin acquires a remarkably shining appearance: but when the fever abates, the tubercles become either indolent knots, or in some degree scirrhous, and of a livid or copper colour; and after some months they degenerate into fetid ulcers. As the disease advances, the features of the face swell, the hair of the eyebrows falls off, the voice becomes hoarse, the breath exceedingly offensive, the skin of the body is unusually loose, wrinkled, rough, destitute of hairs, and overspread with tumours, and often with ulcers, or else with a thick, moist, scabby crust, upon those which have begun to dry up; and the legs are sometimes emaciated and ulcerated, sometimes affected with tumours, without ulceration, and sometimes swelled like posts, and indurated, having very thin scales, apparently much finer than those in leprosy, only not so white; while the soles of the feet, being thicker than the rest of the skin, feel peculiarly pained by the tumours and ulcers. Such is the state of those afflicted with elephantiasis; nor have they even intermissions of ease by refreshing rest; for as their days are rendered wretched by the distension of the skin by tumours, and a succession of burning, ill-conditioned ulcers, so their nights are tormented by perpetual restlessness or frightful dreams. The accuser of the brethren, therefore, evidently showed his sagacity and malice, when he selected this as the most likely means to provoke Job to impatience. But having described the leading features of the disease, let us next attend to the hints that are given us in the book of Job, and see whether the one corresponds with the other. In ch. ii. 7, 8, we are told, that "Satan smote Job with sore biles, from the sole of his foot even to his crown; and that he took a potsherd to scrape himself." This is evidently descriptive of elephantiasis, in its most active and rapid state, when the body is covered with tumours, which break into ulcers, and the skin becomes scaly. In ch. vi. 4, Job complains, that "the arrows of the Almighty were within him, and that the poison thereof drank up his spirit;" thereby comparing the pain he felt to that experienced from poisoned arrows; while the infection of the disease, like the influence of poison, spreads itself over the whole frame. It was formerly mentioned as an attendant on elephantiasis, that the patient could obtain no refreshing sleep, but was tormented with restlessness and frightful dreams. Accordingly, Job, in ch. vii. 3, 4, 13, 14, 15, complains in the following mournful manner: "I am made to possess months of vanity, and wearisome nights are appointed to me. When I lie down, I say, When shall I arise, and the night be gone? and I am full of tossings to and fro unto the dawning of the day.—When I say, My bed shall comfort me, my couch shall ease my complaint; then thou scarest me with dreams, and terrifiest me through visions: so that my soul chooseth strangling, and death rather than my life." The itchinness of ill-conditioned ulcers has often been ascribed to animalcules, and their stench is intolerable. Accordingly, Job says, in ch. vii. 5, "My flesh is clothed with worms and clods of dust; my skin is broken, and become loathsome." It was said that the tumours and ulcers were peculiarly painful on the soles of the feet, from the thickness of the skin in those parts; and to that he refers in ch. xiii. 27, where he says, "Thou settest a print upon the heels of my feet;" literally, "Thou impritest thyself, that is, thy wrath, on the soles of my feet." It was noticed that the skin in elephantiasis, when the disease hath become general, is loose, rough, and wrinkled; and Job, ch. xvi. 8, complains of this very thing, that "his skin was filled with wrinkles." An offensive breath was noticed as another evil under which the patient laboured; and this was the case with Job, for he complains, in ch. xvii. 1, that "his breath was corrupt; that his days were extinct; and that the grave was ready for him," as for a putrid carcase; adding in verse 4th, "I have said to corruption, Thou art my father; and to the worm, thou art my mother and my sister." The only other notice we have of the disease is in ch. xxx. 17, 30, where we hear him complaining that his bones were pierced with acute pain in the night season; and that his sinews, by their starting, gave him no rest; that his skin was black upon him; and his bones were burnt up with heat; all which accord well with the disease in question, when it hath taken possession of the system, and hath filled the body with livid, copper-coloured, scirrhous tumours, or black corrupted ulcers. Upon the whole, then, it appears probable, that the disease with which Job was afflicted was elephantiasis.—BROWN.

Ver. 8. And he took him a potsherd to scrape himself withal; and he sat down among the ashes.

This self-abasement appears to have been common among the Hebrews, as well as the Arabians or Idumæans, and was so probably among other oriental nations of high antiquity, in cases of deep and severe affliction. The coarsest dress, as of hair or sackcloth, was worn on such occasions; and the vilest and most humiliating situation, as a dust or cinder-heap, surrounded by potsherds and other household refuse, made choice of to sit in. It may easily be conjectured what considerable quantities of potsherds, or fragments of pottery, must have been collected in the dust-heaps above referred to, from a recollection, that in the earlier ages of the world, when the art of metallurgy was but in its infancy, almost all the domestic utensils employed for every purpose were of pottery alone. Pottery may hence be fairly supposed the oldest of the mechanical inventions; and on this account the Hebrew term here made use of (פֶּתֶר, a potter, pottery, or potsherds;) became afterward extended to signify wares of every other kind, or their fabricators, and hence artisans in general, whether in brass, iron, wood, or stone. The same word also, when used in the signification of a potsherd, a fragment or splinter of pottery, was also employed to import a sharp instrument in general, as a rasp, scraper, or scalpel, a sense in which it has to this day descended to the Arabs; for the Arabic word, (identically, as to letters, the same as the Hebrew פֶּתֶר;) as a verb, implies to scrape or rasp with an edged tool, (the purpose to which the פֶּתֶר or shard, was directed in the text; and, as a substantive, a scab, or sharp and morbid incrustation of the skin—the object to which it was applied.—GOON.

Ver. 9. Then said his wife unto him, Dost thou still retain thine integrity? Curse God, and die.

Some suppose this ought to be, bless God and die; but Job would not have reproved his wife for such advice, except she meant it ironically. It is a fact, that when the heathen have to pass through much suffering, they often ask, "Shall we make an offering to the gods for this?" i. e. Shall we offer our devotions, our gratitude, for afflictions? Job was a servant of the true God, but his wife might have been a heathen; and then the advice, in its most literal acceptation, would be perfectly in character. Nothing is more common than for the heathen, under certain circumstances, to curse their gods. Hear the man who has made expensive offerings to his deity, in hope of gaining some great blessing, and who has been disappointed, and he will pour out all his imprecations on the god whose good offices have (as he believes) been prevented by some superior deity. A man in reduced circumstances says, "Yes, yes; my god has lost his eyes; they are put out; he cannot look after my affairs." "Yes," said an extremely rich devotee (V. Chetty) of the supreme god Siva, after he had lost his property, "shall I serve him any more? What! make offerings to him? No, no; he is the lowest of all gods." With these facts before us, it is not difficult to believe that Job's wife actually meant what she said.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 10. But he said unto her, Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What! shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? In all this did not Job sin with his lips.

It is not easy to know to whom Job alludes by "the foolish women;" but in all parts of the East, females are spoken of as being much inferior to man in wisdom; and nearly all their sages have proudly desecrated on the ignorance of women. In the Hindoo book called the Kural, it is said, "All women are ignorant." In other works it is said, "Ignorance is a woman's jewel." "Female wisdom is from the evil one." "The feminine qualities are four: ignorance, fear, shame, and impunity." "To a woman disclose not a secret." "Talk not to me in that way; it is all female wisdom."—ROBERTS.

Sanctius thinks that Job refers to the Idumean women, who, like other heathens, when their gods did not please them, or they could not obtain of them what they desired, would reproach and cast them away, and throw them into the fire, or the water, as the Persians are said to do.—BURGER.

Ver. 11. Now when Job's three friends heard of all this evil that was come upon him, they came every one from his own place; Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite: for they had made an appointment together to come to mourn with him, and to comfort him.

Has a man fallen into some great calamity, his friends immediately go to his house to comfort him. Thus, to the house of mourning for the dead may be seen numbers of people going daily, studying to find out some source of comfort for their afflicted friend. "Whither are you going?" "As a comforter to my friend in sorrow." "How great is his distress! he will not listen to the voice of the comforters."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 12. And when they lifted up their eyes afar off, and knew him not, they lifted up their voice and wept; and they rent every one his mantle, and sprinkled dust upon their heads towards heaven.

See on Josh. 7. 6.

Ver. 13. So they sat down with him upon the ground seven days and seven nights, and none spake a word unto him: for they saw that his grief was very great.

Those who go to sympathize with the afflicted, are often silent for hours together. As there were seven days for mourning in the scriptures, so here; and the seventh is always the greatest. The chief mourner, during the whole of these days, will never speak, except when it is absolutely necessary. When a visitor comes in, he simply looks and bows down his head.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1. After this opened Job his mouth, and cursed his day.

It is to be observed, says Mr. Blackwell, (Inquiry into the Life of Homer,) that the Turks, Arabians, and Indians, and in general most of the inhabitants of the East, are a solitary kind of people; they speak but seldom, and never long without emotion. Speaking is a matter of moment among such people, as we may gather from their usual introductions: for, before they deliver their thoughts, they give notice by saying, I will open my mouth, as here; that is, unloose their tongue. It is thus in Homer, Hesiod, and Orpheus; and thus also Virgil:

—finem dedit ore loquendi.

He made an end of speaking with his mouth.—BURGER.

Ver. 3. Let the day perish wherein I was born, and the night in which it was said, There is a man-child conceived.

Dr. Boothroyd prefers, "Perish the day in which I was born; the night it was said, Lo! a man child." Dr. A. Clarke thinks the word conceive "should be taken in the sense of being born;" and the Tamul translation takes the same view. When a male child is born, the midwife goes outside the house, and says aloud three times, "A male child, a male child, a male child is born!"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 12. Why did the knees prevent me? or why the breasts that I should suck.

This is not to be understood of the mother; but either of the midwife, who received the new-born infant into her lap, or of the father, as it was usual for him to take the child upon his knees as soon as it was born, Gen. 1. 23. This custom obtained among the Greeks and Romans. Hence the goddess Levana had her name, causing the father in this way to own the child.—GILL.

Ver. 14. With kings and counsellors of the earth, which built desolate places for themselves.

This description is intended as a contrast to that contained in the two ensuing lines; and the same sort of contrast is admirably continued throughout the entire passage. The grave is the common receptacle of all; of the patriotic princes who have restored to their ancient magnificence the ruins of former cities, and fixed their palaces in them; and of the sordid accumulators of wealth, which they have not spirit to make use of; of the wicked, who have never ceased from troubling, and of those who have been wearied and worn out by their vexations; of the high and the low, the slave and his task-master, the servant and his lord. This idea has not, in general, been attended to, and hence the passage has not been clearly understood. Our common rendering, "Which built desolate places for themselves," is hardly explicit, though it is literally consonant with most of the versions. Schultens, not adverting to the antithesis intended to subsist between the fourteenth and fifteenth verses, imagines he perceives in the passage a metaphorical reference to the massy pyramids or sepulchres of the Egyptian monarchs, of which several have descended to our own day; and this idea has also been generally followed. But the conception is too recumbent, and far less impressive, as it appears to me, than that now offered. The images and phraseology of this poem, as I have already had occasion to observe, were often copied by the boldest writers of the Jewish people; by King David, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel; and the smallest attention to their respective compositions will show us that the idea here communicated soon became proverbial; and that "the restorer of ruined walls," or "of ancient ruins," was not only a phrase in general acceptation, but regarded as a character of universal veneration and esteem. Thus Isai. lviii. 12:—

And thy descendants shall rebuild the ancient waste.
The foundations prostrate for many ages shall thou raise up:
And thou shalt be called The repairer of ruins,
The restorer of paths to walk in.

So Ezek. xxxvi. 33:—

And I will also cause you to dwell in the cities;
And the ruined wastes shall be rebuilt.

It is useless to quote further: the parallel passages are almost innumerable.—Goon.

Ver. 21. Which long for death, but it cometh not; and dig for it more than for hid treasures.

We are constantly hearing of treasures which have been or are about to be discovered. Sometimes you may see a large space of ground, which has been completely turned up, or an old foundation, or ruin, entirely demolished, in hopes of finding the hidden gold. A man has found a small coin, has heard a tradition, or has had a dream, and off he goes to his toil. Perhaps he has been seen on the spot, or he has consulted a soothsayer; the report gets out; and then come the needy, the old, and the young, a motley group, all full of anxiety, to join in the spoil. Some have iron instruments, others have sticks, and some their fingers to scratch up the ground. At last some of them begin to look at each other with considerable suspicion, as if all were not right, and each seems to wish he had not come on so foolish an errand, and then steal off as quietly as they can. I once knew a deep tank made completely dry, (by immense labour,) in the hope of finding great treasures, which were said to have been cast in during the ancient wars. Passing near, one day, when they had nearly finished their work, and their hopes had considerably moderated, I went up to the sanguine owner, (whose face immediately began to show its chagrin,) and inquired, "Why are you taking so much trouble to empty that tank?" He replied, as calmly as he could, "We are merely cleaning it out." Poor man! I believe he found nothing but stones and bones, and a few copper coins. "Dig for it more than for hid treasures," finds a practical illustration in the East, and is a figure of common use in the language.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 2. If we assay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved? but who can withhold himself from speaking?

The term assay, "to essay or attempt," is peculiarly expressive in the Hebrew, and is derived from the sense of smell exercised by hounds and other animals, in essaying or exploring the track of the prey they are in pursuit of. It is still used among the Arabs for a pleasant smell or odour. Eliphaz means to in-inate his desire to select the very mildest reply he could possibly meet with upon a minute research, such as, while it answered the purpose of exposing the fallacy of the patriarch's reasoning, should hurt his feelings as little as possible.—Goon.

Ver. 6. Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, the uprightness of thy ways, and thy hope?

The clew to the genuine sense of this passage will be obtained by a slight transposition of the latter hemistich: "Is not this fear of thine, thy confidence; and the uprightness of thy ways, thy hope?" Job had before affirmed, chap. iii. 25, 26, "The thing which I greatly feared is come upon me, and that which I was afraid of is come unto me. I was not in safety, neither had I rest, neither was I quiet; yet trouble came;" i. e. I was continually exercised by a godly fear, a holy misgiving; I did not dare to cherish a sentiment of carnal security; even in the height of my prosperity, I was deeply sensible of my exposure to calamity, and lived habitually under a trembling anticipation of its approach. To this Eliphaz alludes; q. d. Here is something for which it is hard to account. "Behold, thou hast instructed many, and thou hast strengthened the weak hands. Thy words have upholden him that was falling, and thou hast strengthened the feeble knees. But now it is come upon thee, and thou faintest; it toucheth thee, and thou art troubled." How is this? Why is thy practice so much at variance with thy precepts? If thou art the man thou claimest to be; if thou hast been governed, as thou allegest, by a prevailing fear of God, and hast never indulged a feeling of self-sufficient security, why is not this thy fear a source of humble confidence to thee in the day of distress? and why does not the recollection of the unimpeachable integrity and uprightness of thy ways, serve as an anchor of hope, amid the tossings of a tried and troubled spirit? This surely were to have been expected from one of thy character. A heart conscious of innocence could not but sustain itself in such a trial; it would be entirely contrary to the analogy of the divine dispensations to suppose that such a one would be the victim of overwhelming judgments; for "remember, I pray thee, who ever perished being innocent? or when were the righteous cast off?" This interpretation makes the whole address of Eliphaz consistent, coherent, and clear, though founded upon the fallacy, that men are invariably dealt with in this world according to their desert.—BUSB.

Ver. 9. By the blast of God thy perish, and by the breath of his nostrils are they consumed.

When people are angry, they distend their nostrils and blow with great force: the action may be taken from some animals, which, when angry, blow violently through their noses. Of a man who is much given to anger, it is said, "That fellow is always blowing through his nose." "You may blow through your nose for a thousand years, it will never injure me." "Go not near the breath of his nostrils, he will injure you."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 15. Then a spirit passed before my face; the hair of my flesh stood up.

This refers to the great fear of Job; but the same effect is often ascribed to great joy. Thus, in Hindoo books, in describing the ecstasy of gods or men, it is often said, "The hair of their flesh stood erect." A father says to his long absent child, "My son, not having seen your lotus face for so long, my hair stands up with joy."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 19. How much less on them that dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, which are crushed before the moth?

It is probable that this means a moth-worm, which is one state of the creature alluded to. It is first enclosed in an egg, from whence it issues a worm, and after a time becomes a complete insect, or moth. The following extracts from Niebuhr may throw light on this passage, that man is crushed by so feeble a thing as a worm:—"A disease very common in Yemen is the attack of the Guiney-worm, or the Vena-Medicensis, as it is called by the physicians of Europe. This disease is supposed to be occasioned by the use of the putrid waters, which people are obliged to drink in several parts of Yemen; and for this reason the Arabians always pass water, with the nature of which they are unacquainted, through a linen cloth, before drinking it. Where one unfortunately swallows any of the eggs of this insect, no immediate consequence follows; but after a considerable time, the worm begins to show itself through the skin. Our physician, Mr. Cramer, was, within a few days of his death, attacked by five of these worms at once, although this was more than five months after we had left Arabia. In the isle of Kerek I saw a French officer named Le Page, who, after a long and difficult journey performed on foot, and in an Indian dress, between Pondicherry and Surat, through the heart of India, was busy extracting a worm out of his body. He supposed that he had got it by drinking bad water in the country of the Mahrattas. This disorder is not dangerous if the person affected can extract the worm without breaking it. With this view it is rolled on a small bit of wood as it comes out of the skin. It is slender as a thread, and two or three feet long. It gives no pain as it makes its way out of the body, unless what may be occasioned by the care which must be taken of it for some weeks. If unluckily it be broken, it then returns into the body, and the most disagreeable consequences ensue, palsy, a gangrene, and sometimes death."—BURDER.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 5. Whose harvest the hungry eateth up, and taketh it even out of the thorns, and the robber swalloweth up their substance.

This seems a manifest allusion to the half-starved Arabs of the desert, who were always ready for plunder, as their descendants are to this day. Such starvelings are thus described by Volney: "These men are smaller, leaner, and blacker, than any of the Bedouins yet known; their wasted legs had only tendons without calves; their belly was glued to their back. In general, the Bedouins are small, lean, and swarthy, more so, however, in the bosom of the desert, than on the borders of the cultivated country. They are ordinarily about five feet two inches high. They seldom have more than about six ounces of food for the whole day. Six or seven dates, soaked in melted butter, a little milk, or curd, serve a man for twenty-four hours; and he seems happy when he can add a small portion of coarse flour, or a little ball of rice. Their camels also, which are their chief support, are remarkably meager, living on the meanest and most scanty provision. Nature has given it a small head, without ears, at the end of a long neck, without flesh: she has taken from its legs and thighs every muscle not immediately requisite for motion; and, in short, has bestowed on its withered body only the vessels and tendons necessary to connect its frame together; she has furnished it with a strong jaw, that it may grind the hardest aliments; and lest it should consume too much, she has straitened its stomach, and obliged it to chew the cud."—BURDEA.

Ver. 7. Yet man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward.

Hebrew, "Sons of the burning coal." The word son, among the Hindoos, is applied to man, and all kinds of animal life. Men of ignoble parentage are called sons of the koddekal, i. e. the mechanics. When animals, reptiles, or insects, are troublesome, they are called passasinudia maggal, sons of the devil; or vease-maggal, sons of the prostitute, or of the treacherous ones. See the ploughman, at his occupation; should the bullocks prove restive, he immediately vociferates the epithets alluded to. Listen to the almost breathless cowherd, who is running after some of his refractory kine, to bring them to the fold, and he abuses them in the most coarse and indelicate language. The man also, who, for the first time, discovers the white ants destroying his property, bawls out with all his might, "Ah! vease-maggal, sons of the prostitute."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 21. Thou shalt be hid from the scourge of the tongue: neither shalt thou be afraid of destruction when it cometh.

Dr. A. Clarke says, "the Targum refers this to the incantations of Balaam: from the injury by the tongue of Balaam thou shalt be hidden." The people live in great fear of the scourge of the tongue, and that independent of an incantation, because they believe the tongues of some men have the power of inflicting a dreadful curse on any object which has incurred their displeasure. Thus, many of the evils of life are believed to come from na-rooru, the curse or the scourge of the tongue. "Have you heard what Kandam's tongue has done for Muttoo?" "No! what has happened?" "Why, some time ago, Kandam promised on his next voyage to bring Muttoo a cargo of rice, but he did not keep his word; Kandam, therefore, became very angry, and said, 'I shall not be surprised at hearing of thy vessel being wrecked.' Muttoo again sailed, without caring for Kandam's tongue; but lo! his vessel has been knocked to pieces on the rocks, and I saw him this morning on his way home, beating his head, and exclaiming, 'Ah! this na-rooru, na-rooru, this evil tongue, this evil tongue, my vessel has gone to pieces on the rocks.'" But the tongues of some men are believed to possess malignant power, not only in imprecations, but also in their blessings and praises. "The other day, when I and some others were sitting with our friend the doctor, one of his daughters came to speak to her father; as she was delivering her message, one of the party exclaimed, 'What a beautiful set of teeth!' and from that moment they began to decay." "Alas! alas! poor old Murager purchased a fine milch cow yesterday, and was driving her along the road this morning, on his way home, when, behold, a fellow met them and said, 'Ah, what large teats!' The cow broke from the string, she rushed to the hedge, and a stake ran through her udder." "Ah, what a miserable man is Valen! a few days ago, as his wife was nursing the infant, he said, 'How comely art thou, my fawn!' when immediately a cancer made its appearance in her breast, from which she can never recover."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 23. For thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field; and the beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee.

See on 2 Kings 3. 19.

In a country where wild beasts are so numerous and so fierce, and where the natives have so few means of defence, can it be a matter of surprise that people on a journey are always under the influence of great fear? The father says to his son, when he is about to depart, "Fear not; the beasts will be thy friends." The dealer in charms says, when giving one of his potent spells, "Be not afraid, young man; this shall make the cruel beasts respect thee."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 25. Thou shalt know also that thy seed shall be great, and thine offspring as the grass of the earth.

When a priest, or an aged person, blesses a young couple, he says, "Your children shall be as the grass, arruga-pilla, (Agrostis Linearis.) Yes; you shall twine and bind yourselves together like the grass."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 26. Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season.

Literally, "in dried up," or, "shrivelled age;" and hence the term here employed, (רָבַץ) is applied by the Arabians to designate the winter season, in which every thing is corrugated or shrivelled. On which account some commentators propose, that the text should be rendered "in the winter of life;" poetically, indeed, but not thoroughly consistent with the metaphor of a shock of corn: which, in close congruity with the emblematic picture of winter, at its season of maturity, is dried up and contracted, and thus far offers an equal similitude of ripe old age; but which forcibly increases the similitude by the well known fact, that, like ripe old age also, it must be committed to the earth in order to spring to newness of life; for, in both cases, "the seed which thou sowest shall not quicken, except it die." Tyndal has given the passage thus: "In a faire age lyke as the corn sheewes are brought into the barne in due season:" whence Sandys,

"Then, full of days, like weighty shocks of corn,
In season reaped, shalt to thy grave be borne."

Nor very differently Schultens, notwithstanding that he admits that the Hebrew (רָבַץ) in itself implies "congestion, accumulation, or heaping together." "Intrabis in decrepita senectute ad tumulum," "Thou shalt enter into the tomb in decrepit age;" meaning, as a shock of corn enters into the barn.—Good.

Great is the desire of the men of the East to see a good old age. Thus the beggars, when relieved, often bless you, and say, "Ah! my lord, may you live a thousand years." "Live, live, till the shakings of age."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 2. Oh that my grief were thoroughly weighed, and my calamity laid in the balances together!

"Ah! my lord, could you weigh my poverty, I am sure you would relieve me." "The sorrows of that man's soul, who can weigh them?" "Alas! if my sorrows could be weighed, thou wouldst pity be shown unto me."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 4. For the arrows of the Almighty are within me, the poison whereof drinketh up my spirit: the terrors of God do set themselves in array against me.

The practice of using poisoned arrows is universal among the interior nations of Southern Africa, to whom the gospel has not reached. The strongest of all the poisons used is that which has been discovered by the most uncivilized of all the nations, the wild Bushmen; a wound from which is attended with great pain and thirst, while the poison is working throughout the system, and attended with great depression. I brought some of the poison with me to England, to see if any antidote against it could be discovered. It has exactly the appearance of black wax, and is found deposited in sheltered corners of rocks, but how it came there is yet unknown. A medical gentleman, who had devoted much attention to the different kinds of known poisons, after delivering some lectures in London on that particular subject, heard of the Bushman poison, and applied to me to furnish him with some of it, that he might analyze it, and endeavor to find out an antidote. I rejoiced that the matter had fallen into such good hands, and immediately forwarded it by post. I received different letters, containing various experiments, but all had failed. I remember the first trial he made of the power of the poison was, by wetting the point of a needle, and, after dipping it into the powder, pricking a bird with it, which died almost immediately. The same experiment was made on a second bird, while some antidote was immediately applied to counteract the effects of the poison. After a short time it also died. Various antidotes were tried in the same way, but all proved equally ineffectual.—CAMPBELL.

Ver. 6. Can that which is unsavoury be eaten without salt? or is there any taste in the white of an egg.

The eastern people often make use of bread, with nothing more than salt, or some such trifling addition, such as summer-savoury dried and powdered. This, Russel says, is done by many at Aleppo. The Septuagint translation of this passage seems to refer to the same practice, when it renders the first part of the verse, "will bread be eaten without salt?"—BRANA.

Ver. 12. Is my strength the strength of stones? or is my flesh of brass?

Is a servant ordered to do a thing for which he has not strength; to undergo great hardships; he asks, "Is my strength as iron? Am I a stone?"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 15. My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook, and as the stream of brooks they pass away; 16. Which are blackish by reason of the ice, and wherein the snow is hid: 17. What time they wax warm they vanish: when it is hot, they are consumed out of their place.

The phrase in this place is a strict orientalism, "My brethren have acted (or played) the flood with me;" and the proverbial form is at least as common now among the Arabians, as it could be when the present poem was composed. Fairly explained, nothing can be more apposite, nothing more exquisite, than the image before us, and the whole of its description. Arabia has but few rivers; Proper Arabia perhaps none; for what in this last country are called rivers, are mere torrents, which descend from the mountains during the rains, and for a short period afterward. A few rivers are found in Yemen, or the southern province; and the Tigris and Euphrates, as touching its northern limits in their passage along Irak Arabi, have occasionally been laid claim to by Arabian geographers. Even the Astam of Najd, or Neged, the province of Sandy Arabia, though laid down as a considerable river in the maps, is a mere brook. Hence the country is chiefly watered and fertilized by exudations of its dry channels, an overflow of which is uniformly regarded as a great treasure and blessing; the inhabitants in the neighbourhood hail its appearance, and prepare to enrich themselves out of its stores, by admitting it into their tanks or reservoirs. But it often happens, that the blessing is converted to a curse; that the torrent rushes with so much abruptness and rapidity, as to carry every thing before it; and that, exhausted by its own violence, its duration is as brief as its stream is rapid, allowing them scarcely time to slake their own thirst, or, at least, to fill their domestic utensils. Fair and specious, therefore, as is its first appearance, it is in the end full of deceit and cruel disappointment: "Et viatores (says Dr. Lowth, upon the passage before us) per Arabæ deserta errantes sitique confectos perfide destituunt," Præl. xii. p. 110—it promises comfort, but overwhelms with mortification. Such (says Job) are the companions who come to visit me in my affliction; they affect to console me, but they redouble my distress.—GOON.

In desert parts of Africa it has afforded much joy to fall in with a brook of water, especially when running in the direction of the journey, expecting it would prove a valuable companion. Perhaps before it accompanied us two miles, it became invisible by sinking into the sand; but two miles farther along, it would re-appear and run as before, and raise hopes of its continuance; but after running a few hundred yards, would finally sink into the sand, not again to rise. In both cases it raised hopes which were not realized; of course it deceived. Perhaps it is to such brooks that Job refers in the 15th verse. There are many in Africa, which are described in verse 17, which run in the winter, or rainy season; but the return of the hot season completely dries them up, which prove often great disappointments to stranger travellers.—CAMPBELL.

Ver. 18. The paths of their way are turned aside; they go to nothing, and perish.

Rendered by Schultens and Reiske, "into the desert, the empty space, or land of nothing;" but the former is the more forcible rendering. The torrent progressively evaporating and branching into fresh outlets, becomes at length itself nothing. The original means equally "nothing," and "a desert," or place of nothing. It is usually rendered in the former signification. I have already observed that the latter is preferred by Reiske and Schultens; but either will answer.

The whole description is directly coincident with a very valuable article inserted by Major Colebrooke, in the seventh volume of Asiatic Researches, and entitled, "On the Course of the Ganges through Bengal." He observes, that the occasional obstructions which the rivers of Bengal meet with, on the return of their periodical flux, produce not unfrequently some very extraordinary alterations in the course and bending of their respective beds, and hence, some equally extraordinary changes in the general face of the country. While some villages that, in common, are scarcely visited by a river, even at its utmost rise, are overflowed and suddenly swept away; others, actually seated on the banks of an arm, and that used to be regularly inundated, are totally deserted, and the inhabitants have to travel over many miles to obtain water. He adds, that the Ganges has evinced changes of this nature, in a greater degree than any other Indian stream; and that even since the survey of Major Rennel, in 1764, it has deviated in its course not less than two miles and a half; whence several of the villages which figure in his map are no longer to be found in the situations assigned them; while islands of considerable magnitude, now inhabited and cultivated, have started into being where the river then rolled its deepest waters.—GOON.

Ver. 28. Now, therefore, be content: look upon me: for it is evident unto you if I lie.

When a person is accused of uttering a falsehood, he says, "Look in my face, and you will soon see I am innocent." "My face will tell you the truth." When the countenance does not indicate guilt, it is said, "Ah! his face does not say so." "The man's face does not contain the witness of guilt."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 2. As a servant earnestly desireth the shadow, and as a hireling looketh for the reward of his work.

The people of the East measure time by the length of their shadow. Hence, if you ask a man what o'clock it is, he immediately goes in the sun, stands erect, then looking where his shadow terminates, he measures the length with his feet, and tells you nearly the time. Thus they earnestly desire the shadow which indicates the time for leaving their work. A person wishing to leave his toil, says, "How long my shadow is in coming." "Why did you not come sooner?" "Because I waited for my shadow."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 2. As a servant earnestly desireth the shadow, and as a hireling looketh for the reward of his work; 3. So am I made to possess months of vanity, and wearisome nights are appointed to me.

The expression, when fairly rendered from the original, is peculiarly forcible: "So much worse is my destiny than that of the bondsman and the hireling, that, while they pant and look early for the night-shade, as the close of their trouble, even the night is not free from troubles to myself."—GOOD.

Ver. 10. He shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more.

Inanimate objects are often spoken of as if they knew their owners. A man who has sold his field, says, "That will not know me any more." Does a field not produce good crops, it is said, "That field doth not know its owner." Has a man been long absent from his home, he asks, when entering the door, "Ah! do you know me?" Does he, after this, walk through his garden and grounds, the servants say, "Ah! how pleased these are to see you!" Has a person been unfortunate at sea, it is said, "The sea does not know him."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 12. Am I a sea, or a whale, that thou settest a watch over me?

Some suppose this alludes to the sea overflowing its banks. But the Orientals also believe that the sea is the dwelling-place of many of their spiritual enemies. Hence they have a deity to watch the shore, whose name is Kali. Numerous enemies, also, are compared to the sea, and wicked chiefs who oppress the people, to timingalam, i. e. a whale. "Ah! that whale, who can escape him?"—ROBERTS.

Crocodiles are very terrible to the inhabitants of Egypt; when therefore they appear, they watch them with great attention, and take proper precautions to secure them, so that they should not be able to avoid the deadly weapons afterward used to kill them. To these watchings, and those deadly after-assaults, I apprehend Job refers, when he says, Am I a whale, (but a crocodile no doubt is what is meant here,) that thou settest a watch over me? "Different methods," says Maillet, "are used to take crocodiles, and some of them very singular; the most common is to dig deep ditches along the Nile, which are covered with straw, and into which the crocodile may probably tumble. Sometimes they take them with hooks, which are baited with a quarter of a pig, or with bacon, of which they are very fond. Some hide themselves in the places which they know to be frequented by this creature, and lay snares for him."—BUCKER.

Ver. 19. How long wilt thou not depart from me, nor let me alone till I swallow down my spittle?

This is a proverb among the Arabians to the present day, by which they understand, Give me leave to rest after my fatigue. This is the favour which Job complains is not granted to him. There are two instances which illustrate the passage (quoted by Schultens) in Harris's Narratives, entitled the Assembly. One is of a person, who, when eagerly pressed to give an account of his travels, answered with impatience, "Let me swallow down my spittle, for my journey hath fatigued me." The other instance is of a quick return made to one who used that proverb, "Suffer me," said the person importuned, "to swallow down my spittle:" to which his friend replied, "You may if you please swallow down even Tigris and Euphrates;" that is, take what time you please.—BUCKER.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 11. Can the rush grow up without mire? can the flag grow without water?

The reed grows in immense numbers on the banks and in the streams of the Nile. Extensive woods of the canes Phragmit and Calama magrostes, which rise to the height of twelve yards, cover the marshes in the neighbourhood of Suez. The stems are conveyed all over Egypt and Arabia, and are employed by the Orientals in constructing the flat terraces of their habitations. Calmet thinks it probable that this extensive region of canes gave name to the Red Sea, which, in those times, entirely inundated the marshes on its borders. Jam Suph is a sea that produces canes; and as the Arabs denote two sorts of canes by the general name buz, the surname being added afterward, Moses, the sacred historian, following the same ancient denominations, did not attend to the specific niceties of botanology. This same leader of the people, underwent the first dangers of his life in a cradle made of the reeds donax or hagni. This information induced Calmet to conclude, that in these reeds, which covered the banks of the Nile, we have what our translation renders the flags, (suph.) in which Moses was concealed in his trunk, or ark of bulrushes, goma. The remarkable height to which they grow, and their vast abundance, lead to the persuasion, that in some thick tuft of them, the future prophet of Israel was concealed. It appears also, from the interrogation of Job, that the goma cannot reach its full stature without an abundant supply of water: "Can the rush—goma, rather the tall strong cane or reed—grow up without water?" This plant, therefore, being a tall reed, is with great propriety associated with the kanah, or cane: "In the habitation of dragons, where each lay, shall be grass, with canes and reeds."—PAXTON.

Ver. 12. While it is yet in his greenness, and not cut down, it withereth before any other herb.

The application of this beautiful similitude is easy, and its moral exquisitely correct and pertinent. As the most succulent plants are dependant upon foreign support for a continuance of that succulence, and in the midst of their vigour are sooner parched up than plants of less humidity; so the most prosperous sinner does not derive his prosperity from himself, and is often destroyed in the highday of his enjoyments, more signally and abruptly than those who are less favoured, and appear to stand less securely.—GOOD.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 18. He will not suffer me to take my breath, but filleth me with bitterness.

Of a cruel master it is said, "When his servants stop to take their breath, he abuses them." "The man grudges me my breath." "What! can I work without taking my breath?" "The toil is always upon me; I have not time for breathing."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 25. Now my days are swifter than a post: they flee away, they see no good.

"Ah! my days are like an arrow." "What is my time? 'tis like the wind." "'Tis like cotton spread in the strong wind." "See that falling leaf; that is life." "'Tis but as a snap of the finger." "Am I not like a flower?" "Yes; it is a stream." "A neer-nulle, i. e. a bubble! how softly it glides along! how beautiful its colours! but how soon it disappears."—ROBERTS.

The common pace of travelling in the East is very slow. Camels go little more than two miles an hour. Those who carried messages in haste moved very differently. Dromedaries, a sort of camel, which is exceedingly swift, are used for this purpose; and Lady M. W. Montague asserts, that they far outrun the swiftest horses. There are also messengers who run on foot, and who sometimes go a hundred and fifty miles in less than twenty-four hours; with what energy then might Job say, "My days are swifter than a post." Instead of passing away with a slowness of motion like that of a caravan, my days of prosperity have disappeared with a swiftness like that of a messenger carrying despatches.—BURTON.

Ver. 26. They are passed away as the swift ships; as the eagle that hasteth to the prey.

"The swift ships." Many interpretations have been given of this expression. The author of the Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, observes, that if it can be rendered supposable that any animal, or class of animals, may be metaphorically called ships, it is the dromedary, well known to Job. The eastern writers apply the term to camels and dromedaries. "The whole caravan being now assembled, consists of a thousand horses, mules, and asses, and of five hundred camels: these are the ships of Arabia; their seas are the deserts." (Sandy's Travels.) "What enables the shepherd to perform the long and tiresome journeys across Africa, is the camel, emphatically called by the Arabs, the ship of the desert: he seems to have been created for this very trade." (Bruce's Travels.) Of the dromedary, which is a kind of camel, Mr. Morgan (History of Algiers) says, "I saw one perfectly white all over, belonging to Lella Oumane, princess of that noble Arab Neja, named Heyl ben Ali, upon which she put a very great value, never sending it abroad but upon some extraordinary occasion, when the greatest expedition was required: having others, inferior in swiftness, for more ordinary messages. They say that one of these Asbaris will, in one night, and through a level country, traverse as much ground as any single horse can perform in ten, which is no exaggeration of the matter, since many have affirmed to me, that it makes nothing of holding its rapid pace, which is a most violent hard trot, for four-and-twenty hours on a stretch, without showing the least sign of weariness or inclination to bait; and that then having swallowed a ball or two of a sort of paste made up of barley-meal, and, may be, a little powder of dry dates among it, with a bowl of water, or camel's milk, if to be had, and which the courier seldom forgets to be provided with in skins, as well for the sustenance of himself as of his pegasus, the indefatigable animal will seem as fresh as at first setting out, and ready to continue running at the same scarcely credible rate, for as many hours longer, and so on from one extremity of the African desert to the other, provided its rider could hold out without sleep, and other refreshments." The following extracts from Arabic poetry, translated by Sir W. Jones, speak the same language:—

"Even now she (the camel) has a spirit so brisk, that she flies with the rein, like a dun cloud driven by the wind, after it has discharged its shower."

"Long is her neck; and when she raises it with celerity, it resembles the stern of a ship, floating aloft on the inflow Tigris."

"Ah, the vehicles which bore away my fair one, on the morning when the tribe of Malee departed, and their camels were traversing the banks of Dedā, resembled large ships."

"Sailing from Adul, or vessels of (the merchant) Ibn Yamin, which the mariner now turns obliquely, and now steers in a direct course."

"Ships which cleave the foaming waves with their prows, as a boy at play divides with his hand the collected earth."—BURTON.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 10. Hast thou not poured me out as milk, and curdled me like cheese?

Much philological learning has been brought to the explanation of this passage. In the preceding verse, Job is speaking of his DEATH. "Wilt thou bring me unto dust again?" But what has the pouring out of milk to do with death? The people of the East pour milk upon their heads after performing the funeral obsequies. Has a father a profligate son, or he never expects to reclaim, he says, in reference to him, "Ah! I have poured milk upon my head," i. e. "I have done with him; he is as one dead to me." "And curdled me like cheese." The cheese of the East is little better than curds: and these also are used at the funeral ceremonies.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 2. No doubt but ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you.

The people of the East take great pleasure in irony, and some of their satirical sayings are very cutting. When a sage intimates that he has superior wisdom, or when he is disposed to rally another for his meager attainments, he says, "Yes, yes; you are the man!" "Your wisdom is like the sea." "You found it in dreams." "When you die, whither will wisdom go?" "You have ALL wisdom!" "When gone, alas! what will become of wisdom?" "O the Nyami! O the philosopher!"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 4. I am as one mocked of his neighbour, who calleth upon God, and he answereth him: the just upright man is laughed to scorn.

Though Job, in his distress, cried unto the Lord, his neighbours mocked him, and laughed him to scorn; showing their own impiety, and belief that God would not answer him. Sometimes, when a heathen (who is supposed to be forsaken of the gods) performs a penance or religious austerity, others will mock him, and say, "Fast for me also; yes, perform the poosy for me, and you shall have all you want." Should a man, who is suffering under the punishment due to his crimes, cry to the gods for help, those who are near reply, (for the gods) "Yes, we are here; what do you want? we will help you." "When the gods come, tell them I am gone home; I could not remain any longer." Thus was the just, the upright Job, laughed to scorn when he called upon God.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 5. He that is ready to slip with his feet is as a lamp despised in the thought of him that is at ease.

The critics are by no means agreed on the import of this passage; and, to say truth, we cannot flatter ourselves with a complete removal of its uncertainty. However, the attempt to explain it is honourable, even though it fail. To us it seems to suggest a comparison between the superabundant splendours of the interior of a wealthy man's dwelling, and the dark, dismal, night-wandering of a way-worn traveller. To add a lamp, however brightly burning, to what Mr. Good calls "the sunshine of the prosperous," were to render that lamp a contempt, a ridicule, whereas the man who stays amid mire and clay, in outer darkness, would rejoice to profit by its lustre. A travelling lamp, though its light be vivid, would be laughed at amid the various elegant illuminations in the interior of a house fitted up with great taste by a man of fashion: nevertheless, however awkward, coarse, and clumsy, it may be, the man who is falling into a quagmire would be extremely thankful for its assistance. This acceptance of the sentiment demands no dislocation of any word in the text: but, whether it completely dissipates the obscurity of the passage, the reader must judge.—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

D'Oyley and Mant quote from Caryl and Poole as follows: "A despised lamp is of the same signification with a smoking firebrand; which last is a proverb for that which is almost spent, and therefore despised and thrown away as useless." In view of these observations, it is worthy of notice, that of a man who is much despised, or who is very contemptible, it is said, "That fellow is like the half-consumed firebrand of the funeral pile." Job, by his enemies, was counted as a despised lamp. When a person is sick unto death, it is said, "His lamp is going out." After death, "His lamp has gone out." When a person is indisposed, should a lamp give a dim light, the people of the house will become much alarmed, as they think it a bad sign. A lamp, therefore, which burns dimly, (as did that of Job,) will be lightly esteemed.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 20. He removeth away the speech of the trusty, and taketh away the understanding of the aged.

The term trusty seems, in this present place, to imply something more than "of the aged," as it is commonly rendered; and rather intimates, "the aged officially convened in public council;" whence it is rendered "senators," by Schultens and Dr. Stock: but elders, or eldermen, is a more general term, and hence more extensively appropriate, as well as more consonant with what ought ever to be the unaffected simplicity of biblical language. Though the term senators includes the idea of age, it includes it more remotely. In Gen. 1. 7, we have a similar use of the term elders: for we are told, that "when Joseph went up into the land of Canaan to bury his father, with him went all the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt;" in other words, the chief officers of state, the privy counsellors, and the entire senate or body of legislators, chosen from the land or people.—Good.

Ver. 22. He discovereth deep things out of darkness, and bringeth out to light the shadow of death.

The author of the poem discovers a great partiality for this figure; the reader can scarcely fail to recollect its occurrence in ch. x. 21, 22. In the present instance, however, it appears to be used in a different sense, and to allude, in characteristic imagery, to the dark and reconcilable plots, the deep and desperate designs, of traitors and conspirators, or other state-villains: for it should be observed, that the entire passage has a reference to the machinery of a regular and political government; and that its general drift is to imprint upon the mind of the hearer the important doctrine, that the whole of the constituent principles of such a government, its officers and institutions, its monarch and princes, its privy-counsellors, judges, and ministers of state; its chieftains, public orators, and assembly of elders; its nobles, or men of hereditary rank; and its stout, robust peasantry, as we should express it in the present day; nay, the deep, designing villains that plot in secret its destruction,—that the nations themselves, and the heads or sovereigns of the nations, are all and equally in the hands of the Almighty; that, with him, human pomp is poverty, human excellence turpitude, human judgment error, human wisdom folly, human dignities contempt, human strength weakness.—Good.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 15. Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him: but I will maintain mine own ways before him.

When a master chastises an affectionate slave, or tells him to leave his service, he says, "My lord, though you slay me, yet will I trust in you." Does a husband beat his wife, she exclaims, "My husband, though you kill me, I will not let you go." "Kill me, my lord, if you please, but I will not leave you: I trust in you." "Oh! beat me not; do I not trust in you?" "What an affectionate wife that is: though her husband cut her to pieces, yet she trusts in him." "The fellow is always beating her, yet she confides in him."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 24. Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and holdest me for thine enemy?

Job, in his distress, makes this pathetic inquiry of the Lord. Should a great man become displeas'd with a person to whom he has been previously kind, he will, when he sees him approaching, avert his face, or conceal it with his hand, which shows at once what is the state of the case. The poor man then mourns, and complains, and asks, "Ah! why does he hide his face?" The wife says to her offended husband, "Why do you hide your face?" The son to his father, "Hide not your face from your son."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 26. For thou writest bitter things against me.

"Ah! the things that man has written against me to the judge, are all kassapu, all bitter." "Oh! that is a bitter, bitter fault." "Who will make this bitterness-sweet?"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 27. Thou puttest my feet also in the stocks, and lookest narrowly unto all my paths; thou settest a print upon the heels of my feet.

The punishment of the stocks has been common in the East from the most remote antiquity, as is seen in all their records. But whether the stocks were formerly like clogs, or as those of the present day, it is impossible to say. Those now in use differ from those in England, as the unfortunate culprit has to lie with his back on the ground, having his feet fast in one pair, and his hands in another. Thus, all he can do is to writhe his body; his arms and legs being so fast, that he cannot possibly move them. A man placed in great difficulty, says, "Alas! I am now in the stocks." "I have put my boy in the tubungu," i. e. stocks; which means, he is confined, or sent to school. To a young man of roving habits, it is said, "You must have your feet in the stocks," i. e. get married. "Alas! alas! I am now in the stocks; the guards are around my path, and a seal is put upon my feet."—ROBERTS. (See Engraving.)

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 4. Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one.

The following are common sayings:—"Who can turn a black crow into a white crane?" "Who can make the bitter fruit sweet?" "Who can make straight the tail of the dog?" "If you give the serpent sweet things, will his poison depart?"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 7. For there is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease.

Trees here appear to be more tenacious of life than in England. See them blown down; yet from the roots fresh shoots spring up. See them sometimes at such an angle (through storms) that their branches nearly touch the ground, and yet they keep that position, and continue to bear fruit. Those trees, also, which have actually been cut down, after a few showers, soon begin to send forth the "tender branch." The plantain-tree, after it has borne fruit once, is cut down; but from its roots another springs up, which, in its turn, also gives fruit, and is then cut down, to make way for another. Thus, in reference to this tree, it may be truly said, Cut it down, but "the tender branch thereof will not cease."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 17. My transgression is sealed up in a bag, and thou sewest up mine iniquity.

The money that is collected together in the treasures of eastern princes is held up in certain equal sums, put into bags, and sealed.—(Chardin.) These are what in some parts of the Levant are called purses, where they reckon great expenses by so many purses. The money collected in the temple in the time of Joash, for its reparation, seems, in like manner, to have been told up in bags of equal value to each other, and probably delivered sealed to those who paid the workmen, (2 Kings xii. 10.) If Job alludes to this custom, it should seem that he considered his offences as reckoned by God to be very numerous, as well as not suffered to be lost in inattention, since they are only considerable sums which are thus kept.—HARMER.

Ver. 19. The waters wear the stones: thou wastest away the things which grow out of the dust of the earth; and thou destroyest the hope of man.

Is a man found fault with because he makes slow progress in his undertaking, he says, "Never mind; the water which runs so softly, will, in time, wear away the stones."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XV.

Ver. 7. Art thou the first man that was born? or wast thou made before the hills?

When a majority of people agree on any subject, should an individual pertinaciously oppose them, it will be asked, "What! were you born before all others?" "Yes, yes; he is the first man: no wonder he has so much wisdom!" "Salut to the first man."—ROBERTS.

Hebrew, "Wast thou born first of mankind?" Such appears to me the true rendering, though it is given differently by different commentators, and will admit of various significations; the word אדם (Adam) being either a proper name, or an appellative for mankind at large; whence some of the oldest versions render the passage, "Wast thou born before Adam?" while the generality, and in my opinion more correctly, give us, "An primus homo natus es?" "Art thou the first-born of men?" or, "Wast thou born first of mankind?"—Good.

Ver. 26. He runneth upon him, even on his neck, upon the thick bosses of his bucklers.

Wrestlers, before they began their combats, were rubbed all over in a rough manner, and afterward anointed with oil, in order to increase the strength and flexibility of their limbs. But as this unction, in making the skin too slippery, rendered it difficult for them to take hold of each other, they remedied that inconvenience, sometimes by rolling themselves in the dust of the Palestra, sometimes by throwing fine sand upon each other, kept for that purpose in Xystæ, or porticoes of the Gymnasia. Thus prepared, they began their combat. They were matched two against two, and sometimes several couples contended at the same time. In this combat, the whole aim and design of the wrestlers was to throw their adversary upon the ground. Both strength and art were employed to this purpose; they seized each other by the arms, drew forward, pushed backward, used many distortions and twistings of the body; locking their limbs in each other's, seizing by the neck or throat, pressing in their arms, struggling, plying on all sides, lifting from the ground, dashing their heads together like rams, and twisting one another's necks. In this manner, the athlete wrestled standing, the combat ending with the fall of one of the competitors. To this combat the words of Eliphaz seem to apply: "For he stretcheth his hand against God" like a wrestler, challenging his antagonist to the contest, "and strengthening himself," rather vaunting himself, stands up laughingly, and boasts of his prowess in the full view of "the Almighty," throwing abroad his arms, clapping his hands together, springing into the middle of the ring, and taking his station there in the adjusted attitude of defiance. "He runneth upon him, even on his neck," or with his neck stretched out, furiously dashing his head against the other; and this he does, even when he perceives that his adversary is covered with defensive armour, upon which he can make no impression: "he runneth upon the thick bosses of his bucklers."—PAXTON.

Ver. 33. He shall shake off his unripe grape as the vine, and shall cast off his flower as the olive.

It would be a valuable acquisition to the learned world, if observations made in Judea itself, or rather, in this case, in the land of Uz, were communicated to us relating to the natural causes which occasion, from time to time, a disappointment of their hopes from their vineyards and olive plantations; and the effects of a violently sultry southeast wind on their most useful or remarkable vegetables. Every much question, however, whether the words of Eliphaz, in the book of Job, xv. 33, refer to any blasting of the vine by natural causes; they seem rather to express his violently taking away the unripe grapes by the wild Arabs, of which I have given an account in the preceding volume. It is certain the word בשר biser, translated here unripe grape, is used to express those grapes that were so far advanced in growth as to be eaten, though not properly ripened, as appears from Jeremiah xxxi. 29, and Ezek. xviii. 2; and the verb שָׁחַט yachas, translated here shake off, signifies removing by violence, consequently cannot be meant of anything done in the natural course of things, but by a human hand; and if so, may as well be applied to the depredations of the Arabs, as the impetuosity or deleterious quality of any wind, the energy of poetry making use of a verb active instead of its passive.

It may not be amiss, before I close, just to take notice, that the vulgar Latin translation was so little apprehensive that grapes, when grown to any considerable size, were wont to drop, that its authors, or correctors, have rendered the words after this manner: "Lædetur quasi vinea in primo flore botrus ejus," that is, "his cluster shall be injured as a vine when it first comes into flower;" intimating, that if any damage is done to the vine at all by an intemperate season, they supposed it would be upon its first flowering. How arduous is the business of translating a foreign poem into English verse! A multitude of circumstances must be attended to by such a translator, when he finds himself obliged, as he often does, to vary the expressions a little, on account of his verse; and, for want of full information as to particular points, he must frequently fail. Mistakes of this kind demand great candour.—HARMER.

A north or northeast wind frequently proves injurious to the olive-trees in Greece, by destroying the blossom. Dr. Chandler says, "We ate under an olive-tree, then laden with pale yellow flowers: a strong breeze from the sea scattered the bloom and incommoded us, but the spot afforded no shelter more eligible." In another place, he observes, "The olive-groves are now, as anciently, a principal source of the riches of Athens. The mills for pressing and grinding the olives are in the town; the oil is deposited in large earthen jars, sunk in the ground, in the areas before the houses. The crops had failed five years successively; when we arrived; the cause assigned was a northerly wind, called Greco-Tramontane, which destroyed the flower. The fruit is set in about a fortnight, when the apprehension from this unpropitious quarter ceases. The bloom in the following year was unburt, and we had the pleasure of leaving the Athenians happy in the prospect of a plentiful harvest."—BURDER.

CHAPTER XVI.

Ver. 3. Shall vain words have an end? or what imboldeneth thee that thou answerest?

The Hebrew has, "words of wind." "His promise! it is only wind." "His words are all wind." "The wind has taken away his words!" "Breath, breath; all breath!"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 4. I also-could speak as ye do: if your soul were in my soul's stead, I could heap up words against you, and shake my head at you.

The whole of this passage is rendered unintelligible, in its usual mode of translating, by attributing a conditional instead of a future tense to it: "I also could speak, &c." or, "But I could speak,"—instead of, "But I will speak," or "talk on."—Good.

Ver. 9. He teareth me in his wrath who hateth me: he gnasheth upon me with his teeth: mine enemy sharpeneth his eyes upon me.

"Has not the cruel man been sharpening his eyes upon me?" "His eyes are like arrows; they pierce my life." "Truly, his cutting eyes are always upon me." "Yes, yes; the eyes of the serpent."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 10. They have gaped upon me with their mouth; they have smitten me upon the cheek reproachfully; they have gathered themselves together against me.

Here is another living picture of eastern manners. See the exasperated man; he opens his mouth like a wild beast, shows his teeth, then suddenly snaps them together. Again he pretends to make another snatch, and growls like a tiger. Should he not dare to come near, he moves his hand, as if striking you on the cheek, and says, "I will beat thy Konnan, i. e. cheek, thou low-rate fellow."—ROBERTS.

From the following extracts, this treatment appears to have been considered very injurious. "Davaç was deeply incensed: nor could I do more than induce him to come to the factory on business while I was there; Mr. Pringle having, in one of his fits, struck him on the cheek with the sole of his slipper, the deepest insult that can be offered to an Asiatic; among whom it is considered as a mark of disrespect to touch even the sole of the foot." (Lord Valentia.) "In the Mahratta camp, belonging to Scindia, his prime minister, Surjee Rao, was murdered in the open bazar: his mistresses were, as usual, stripped of all they possessed; and his favourite one was sent for to court, and severely beaten in the presence of Scindia's wife, who added to the indignity, by giving her several blows herself with a slipper." (Broughton.) "When the vazir declared himself unable to procure the money, Fath Ali Shah reproached him for his crimes, struck him on the face, and with the high wooden heel of a slipper, always iron-bound, beat out several of his teeth." (Sir W. Ouseley.)

The Hindoo, religiously abstaining from animal food and intoxicating liquors, becomes thereby of so very mild a temper, that he can bear almost any thing without emotion, except slipping; that is, a stroke with the sole of a slipper or sandal, after a person has taken it off his foot and spit on it; this is dreaded above all affronts, and considered as no less ignominious than spitting in the face, or bespattering with dirt, among Europeans.—BURNER.

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 1. My breath is corrupt, my days are extinct, the graves are ready for me.

A man far advanced in years, or one who is in deep affliction, says, "The place of burning is near to me, and the wood is laid together for my funeral pile." "How are you, my friend?" "How am I? I will tell you. Go, order them to get the wood together to burn this body." A father sometimes says of his wicked sons, "Yes, I know they desire my death; they have been preparing for the funeral; they are ready to wash me; the bier is at hand, and the wood is prepared." "Why do you all look so anxious? I am not ready for the washing."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 3. Lay down now, put me in a surety with thee; who is he that will strike hands with me?

See on Prov. 6. 1.

The difficulty in this passage has resulted, in the first place, from the abruptness of the transition; and, secondly, from its being, in its common construction, very improperly separated from the preceding verse, and applied to the Almighty instead of to Eliphaz, the last speaker, to whom Job is peculiarly addressing himself. The fair interpretation is, "But if there be any meaning in what ye say—if ye do not revile my character, but believe me to be the oppressor and the hypocrite ye assert—come on: I will still venture to stake myself against any of you. Will any of you venture to stake me against yourselves? Who is he that will strike hands with me? that will dare to measure his deserts with my own? and appeal to the Almighty, in proof that he is a juster man than I am?" It is an argumentum ad hominem, of peculiar force and appropriation, admirably calculated to confound and silence the persons to whom it is addressed. The custom of staking one thing against another is of very early origin, and found in the rudest and simplest modes of social life; hence the pastoral of Theocritus, as well as of Virgil, abound with references to this practice.—GOON.

Ver. 9. The righteous also shall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger.

The idea here suggested is that of purity and holiness. Porphyry observes, that in the Leontian mysteries the initiated had their hands washed with honey, instead of water, to intimate that they were to keep their hands pure from all wickedness and mischief; honey being of a cleansing nature, and preserving other things from corruption.—BURNER.

Ver. 14. I have said to corruption, Thou art my father: to the worm, Thou art my mother and my sister.

Those who retire from the world to spend their lives in a desert place, for the purpose of performing religious austerities, often exclaim to the beasts, "Yes; you are my relations, you are my parents; these are my companions and friends."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 16. They shall go down to the bars of the pit, when our rest together is in the dust.

Literally, to the limbs—"the grasping limbs," "the tremendous claws or talons" of the grave. The imagery is peculiarly bold, and true to the general character under which the grave is presented to us in the figurative language of sacred poetry,—as a monster, ever greedy to devour, with horrid jaws wide gaping for his prey; and, in the passage before us, with limbs in unison with his jaws, and ready to seize hold of the victims allotted to him, with a strength and violence from which none can extricate themselves. The common rendering of fulcra, rectes, or bars, as of a prison, is as unnecessary a departure from the proper figure, as it is from the primary meaning of the original term.—GOON.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Ver. 2. How long will it be ere you make an end of words?

The commentators are not agreed to whom the opening of this speech is addressed. Being in the plural number, it cannot, according to the common forms of Hebrew colloquy, be addressed to Job alone. Le Clerc, however, attempts to prove, that, under particular circumstances, such a form may be admitted, and especially when particular respect is intended. Other interpreters conceive that it is addressed to Job and Eliphaz, to whom Job had been just replying. But the greater number concur in supposing that it relates to the family or domestics of Job, in conjunction with himself, who, it may be conceived, were present, and at least tacitly approving his rebukes: "Tu cum tuâ familiâ," is the explanation of Reiske. It is more probable that it applies to the interlocutors generally.—GOON.

Ver. 4. He tearth himself in his anger: shall the earth be forsaken for thee? and shall the rock be removed out of his place?

"Foolish man, why are you so angry? Will your anger pull down the mountain, or take a single hair from the head of your enemy?" "This evil is only felt in your own heart and house: it is your own destruction."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 5. Yea, the light of the wicked shall be put out, and the spark of his fire shall not shine.

6. The light shall be dark in his tabernacle, and his candle shall be put out with him.

See on 1 Kings 11. 26.

Ver. 8. For he is cast into a net by his own feet, and he walketh upon a snare.

The original implies a snare with pieces of wood, or other substance, put crosswise, or bar-wise, so as to sustain the deceitful covering of turf, or other soil, put over it to hide the mischief it conceals. The term is used Exod. xxvii. 4, to express a grating, or net-work of brass. The same kind of snare or pitfall is still frequently employed throughout India, in elephant-hunting.—GOON.

Ver. 15. It shall dwell in his tabernacle, because it is none of his: brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation.

A very singular method of expressing sorrow among the ancients, was by burning brimstone in the house of the deceased. Livy mentions this practice as general among the Romans; and some commentators think it is referred to in these words of Bildad: "Brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation." The idea corresponds with the design of the speaker, which is to describe the miserable end of the hypocrite.—PAXTON.

Ver. 16. His roots shall be dried up beneath, and above shall his branch be cut off.

Man is often described as a tree, and his destruction by the cutting off of the branches. "Alas! alas! he is like a tree whose branches have been struck by the lightning." "He is a tree killed by the shepherds;" which alludes to the practice (in dry weather, when the grass is burned up) of climbing the trees to lop off the branches and leaves for the use of the flocks and cattle. "His branches and shoots are destroyed;" which means, himself and family. "I know all his branches and bunches;" meaning all his connexions. (See on Luke xxiii. 31.)—ROBERTS.

Ver. 17. His remembrance shall perish from the earth, and he shall have no name in the street.

"What kind of a man is Rámar?" "I will tell you: his name is in every street;" which means, he is a person of great fame. "Ah! my lord, only grant me this favour, and your name shall be in every street." "Who does not wish his name to be in the streets?" "Wretch, where is thy name? What dog of the street will acknowledge thee?" "From generation to generation shall his name be in the streets." "Where is thy name written in stone? No: it is written in water."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 19. He shall neither have son nor nephew among his people, nor any remaining in his dwellings.

Heb. "Among his sojournings"—from sojourn, "to sojourn," or "dwell for a short and uncertain period," as in travelling. The idea is peculiarly expressive and forcible: not only among his own people, and in his own settled habitation, shall his name, his memory, his family, be extinguished; but no asylum, no refuge, shall be afforded them in distant countries, and among strangers, with whom he had casually sojourned, and where his memory might be supposed to call forth the hospitalities of friendship. The Jewish history affords innumerable instances of persons compelled to fly from their native homes, and seek an asylum in the bosom of strangers, to whom they were only casually, or even altogether unknown: and, without ranging further, the history of Moses himself, the probable writer of the poem, furnishes us with a memorable example.—GOOD.

The original word for dwellings, Schultens says, signifies a territory of refuge for strangers. The great men among the Arabs called their respective districts by this name, because they took under their protection all defenceless and necessitous persons who fled thither; they prided themselves in having a great number of these clients or dependants. This was an ancient custom in Arabia, and continues to the present day. The Arabian poets frequently refer to it.—BURDER.

CHAPTER XIX.

Ver. 3. These ten times have ye reproached me: you are not ashamed that you make yourselves strange to me.

See on Gen. 31. 7, 8.

Ver. 6. Know now that God hath overthrown me, and hath compassed me with his net.

The allusion here may be to an ancient mode of combat practised among the Persians, Goths, and Romans. The custom among the Romans was this: one of the combatants was armed with a sword and shield, the other with a trident and net; the net he endeavoured to cast over the head of his adversary, in which, when he succeeded, the entangled person was soon pulled down by a noose, that fastened round his neck, and then despatched. The person who carried the net and trident was called Retarius, and the other, who carried the sword and shield, Secutor, or the pursuer, because, when the Retarius missed his throw, he was obliged to run about the ground till he got his net in order for a second throw, while the Secutor followed him, to prevent, and despatch him. The Persians used a running loop, which horsemen endeavoured to cast over the heads of their enemies, that they might pull them off their horses. The Goths used a hoop fastened to a pole. (Olaus Magnus.) "In the old Mexican paintings, we find warriors almost naked, with their bodies wrapped in a net of large meshes, which they throw over the heads of their enemy." (Humboldt.)—BURDER.

Ver. 16. I called my servant, and he gave me no answer: I entreated him with my mouth.

When a man becomes reduced in the world, his slaves no longer obey him: he calls, but they answer not; he looks, and they laugh at him.

Hence the verse—

Kandalum, Paysár
Alitalum, Varar
Kavi-Kavi-Endár.

"Though I call, he comes not; though he sees, he answers not; or, I am engaged, engaged, says he."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 17. My breath is strange to my wife, though I entreated for the children's sake of mine own body.

It is not often that husbands, in these regions, condescend to entreat their wives, but they are sometimes (as when sick or in any way dependant) obliged to humble themselves. He then says, "My wife's breath is not now as mine." "For the sake of your children listen to my words." Nothing is more provoking to a woman than to say she has the breath of a man.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 20. My bone cleaveth to my skin and to my flesh, and I am escaped with the skin of my teeth.

I suppose the above words have given rise to the old English saying, "He has escaped with the skin of his teeth," which denotes he has had great difficulty in avoiding the danger. But have the teeth any skin? It was formerly a custom among the heathen kings to knock out the teeth of their prisoners, or those who had offended them; and to this practice the Psalmist seems to allude: "Thou hast broken the teeth of the ungodly;" and, "Break their teeth, O God! in their mouth." Those who had been thus treated said, "We have escaped with the murasa," i. e. the gums of our teeth. When a man is angry with another, he says, "Take care; I will knock thy teeth out. Thou shalt only have thy gums left." "What!" asks the person thus threatened, "am I thy slave, to have my teeth knocked out?" But the teeth are always spoken of as being very valuable; and by them the people often estimate the worth of any blessing. "Ah! the king might have granted me that favour; his teeth would not have fallen out on that account." "Would his gums have been left, if he had told me that secret?" "Yes, yes, take care, or you will lose your pearls," (teeth.) "See the miserable man; the sickness has left him his gums only."—ROBERTS.

There is scarcely any verse in the whole poem that has more puzzled the commentators, and excited a greater variety of renderings, than this. The word skin is here repeated from the preceding line, for the sake of an iteration; in which figure no poets have more largely indulged than the Asiatics, whether ancient or modern. It is a word of extensive meaning, and implies generally, cuticle, peel, integument, skin; and in the present place more particularly, the gums, which are the proper integuments of the teeth, the substance in which they are first produced, and which, through life, affords a nutritious covering to their base. It may also be rendered film, although I do not think this the direct sense of the term in the present passage; it rather implies integuments generally, and has been preferred by the original writer to any other term expressive of the same meaning, on account, as I have already observed, of the iteration hereby produced.—GOOD.

In the celebrated inscription on the pillar at Delhi, called the Lat of Peeroz Shah, is the following passage, exhibiting a similar hyperbole in different terms: "Blades of grass are perceived between thine adversary's teeth." (Asiatic Researches.) The author of the Fragments subjoined to Calmer's Dictionary, thus paraphrases the passage: "My upper row of teeth stands out so far as to adhere to my upper lip, that being so shrivelled and dried up, as to sink upon my teeth, which closely press it." He observes, if our translation be right, it may receive some illustration from the following instances of those who did not escape with the skin of their teeth. "Prithwinarayan issued an order to Surupratana, his brother, to put to death some of the principal inhabitants of the town of Ciriapur, and to cut off the noses and lips of every one, even the infants who were not found in the arms of their mothers; ordering, at the same time, all the noses and lips that had been cut off to be preserved, that he might ascertain how many souls there were, and to change the name of the town to Naskatapur, which signifies, the town of cut noses. The order was carried into execution with every mark of horror and cruelty, none escaping but those who could play on wind instruments: many put an end to their lives in despair; others came in great bodies to us in search of medicines; and it was most shocking to see so many living people with their teeth and noses resembling the skulls of the deceased." (Asiatic Res.)—BURDEA.

Ver. 23. O that my words were now written!
oh that they were printed in a book! 24. That they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever!

The most ancient way of writing was upon the leaves of the palm-tree. Afterward they made use of the inner bark of a tree for this purpose; which inner bark being in Latin called liber, the Greek βιβλος, from hence a book, hath ever since, in the Latin language, been called liber, and in the Greek, βιβλος, because their books anciently consisted of leaves made of such inner barks. The Chinese still make use of such inner barks, or rinds of trees, to write upon, as some of their books brought into Europe plainly show. Another way made use of among the Greeks and Romans, and which was as ancient as Homer, (for he makes mention of it in his poems,) was to write on tables of wood, covered over with wax. On these they wrote with a bodkin, or stile of iron, with which they engraved their letters on the wax; and hence it is that the different ways of men's writings or compositions are called different styles. This way was mostly made use of in the writing of letters or pistles; hence such epistles are in Latin called tabellæ, and the carriers of them tabellarii. When their epistles were thus written, they tied the tables together with a thread or string, setting their seal upon the knot, and so sent them to the party to whom they were directed, who, cutting the string, opened and read them. It is observable also, that anciently they wrote their public records on volumes or rolls of lead, and their private matters on fine linen and wax. The former of these customs we trace in Job's wish, "O that my words were now written! O that they were printed in a book! that they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever!" There is a way of writing in the East, which is designed to fix words on the memory, but the writing is not designed to continue. The children in Barbary that are sent to school, make no use of paper, Dr. Shaw tells us, but each boy writes on a smooth, thin board, slightly daubed over with whitening, which may be wiped off or renewed at pleasure. There are few that retain what they have learned in their youth; doubtless things were often wiped out of the memory of the Arabs in the days of Job, as well as out of their writings. Job therefore says, "O that they were written in a book," from whence they should not be blotted out! But books were liable to injuries, and for this reason he wishes his words might be even graven in a rock, the most lasting way of all. Thus the distinction between writing and writing in a book, becomes perfectly sensible, and the gradation appears in its beauty, which is lost in our translation, where the word printed is introduced, which, besides its impropriety, conveys no idea of the meaning of Job, records that are designed to last long not being distinguished from less durable papers by being printed.—BURDEA.

The word rock, which our translators have made use of, seems to me to be more just than that used by Schultens. It is certain that the word בֶּהָר, which is in the original, signifies in other places of the book of Job, a rock; and never there, or anywhere else in the scriptures, that I am aware of, and I have with some care examined the point, does it signify a small sepulchral stone, or monumental pillar. On the other hand, I am sure the words that are used for this purpose, when the sacred writers speak of the sepulchral stone on Rachel's grave; of the pillar erected by Absalom to keep up his memory; and of that monument which marked out the place where the prophet was buried that prophesied against the altar of Jeroboam, and which continued to the days of Josiah; are different. Nor can the using this term appear strange, if we consider the extreme antiquity of the book of Job; since it is easy to imagine, that the first inscriptions on stones were engraved on some places of the rocks, which were accidentally smoothed, and made pretty even. And, in fact, we find some that are very ancient, engraved on the natural rock, and what is remarkable, in Arabia, where it is supposed Job lived. This is one of the most curious observations in that account of the prefetto of Egypt, which was published by the late bishop of Clogher; and is, in my apprehension, an exquisite confirmation of our translation, though there is reason to think neither the writer nor editor of that journal thought of this passage, and so consequently claims a place in this collection.

The prefetto, speaking in his journal of his disengaging himself at length from the mountains of Faran, says, "they came to a large plain, surrounded however with high hills, at the foot of which we reposed ourselves in our tents, at about half an hour after ten. These hills are called Gebel el Mokalah, that is, the Written Mountains: for, as soon as we had parted from the mountains of Faran, we passed by several others for an hour together, engraved with ancient unknown characters, which were cut in the hard marble rock, so high as to be in many places at twelve or fourteen feet distance from the ground: and though we had in our company persons who were acquainted with the Arabic, Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, Coptic, Latin, Armenian, Turkish, English, Illyrican, German, and Bohemian languages, yet none of them had any knowledge of these characters; which have nevertheless been cut into the hard rock, with the greatest industry, in a place where there is neither water, nor any thing to be gotten to eat. It is probable, therefore, these unknown characters contain some very secret mysteries, and that they were engraved either by the Chaldeans, or some other persons long before the coming of Christ."

The curious bishop of Clogher, who most laudably made very generous proposals to the Antiquarian Society, to engage them to try to decipher these inscriptions, was ready to imagine they are the ancient Hebrew characters, which the Israelites, having learned to write at the time of giving the law, diverted themselves with engraving on these mountains, during their abode in the wilderness. There are still in Arabia several inscriptions in the natural rock; and this way of writing is very durable, for these engravings have, it seems, outlived the knowledge of the characters made use of; the practice was, for the same reason, very ancient as well as durable; and if these letters are not so ancient as the days of Moses, which the Bishop of Clogher supposes, yet these inscriptions might very well be the continuation of a practice in use in the days of Job, and may therefore be thought to be referred to in these words of his, O that they were graven . . . in the rock for ever!—HARMER.

Ver. 23. O that my words were now written! oh that they were printed in a book! 24. That they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever! 25. For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: 26. And though, after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: 27. Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another; though my reins be consumed within me.

It has been the fashion with a class of interpreters and divines, pleased perhaps to associate their own with the celebrated names of Grotius, Le Clerc, and Warburton, to explode from this passage any reference to a future life, or the expectation of the Messiah; and no slight contempt has been expressed for the credulity and mental servitude (very candidly taken for granted) of those who entertain the belief of such a reference. This has, however, been the opinion of the greater number of scripture critics, ancient and modern, popish and protestant. The usual objections against this interpretation are, that no vestiges appear in the book of Job, of any acquaintance with the doctrine of a future life; that it would be very extraordinary if there really existed in the mind of the composer of this book, any knowledge of the Redeemer to come, that such a glorious hope should show itself nowhere but in this single passage; and that we cannot reconcile such an avowal with the despondency which appears to have prevailed in the mind of Job; and that the terms employed do not necessarily import more than the persuasion of a deliverance, by divine goodness, from the present calamity, and a restoration to health and happiness, in the present life. To these reasonings we reply,

1. Admitting that there is no intimation of the doctrine of immortality and a future judgment, or of the expectation of a Messiah, in any other part of this book, the consequence does not follow. It should be recollected that, in a poetical book, the matter is disposed considerably according to the taste and choice of the writer; and that a more vivid impression might be made, by presenting a capital circumstance, with its brightness and force collected into one point, than would be produced if it were dispersed through the general composition. The whole texture of this passage, introduced with the most impassioned wish for attention and perpetual remembrance, and sustained in the sublimest style of utterance, is evidently thus contrived to interest and impress in the highest degree.

Those of our objectors who ascribe the date of the poem to the period of the captivity, cannot refuse to admit that the writer possessed whatever knowledge the Jewish nation had with respect to a Messiah and a future state. The writings of Moses and the former prophets, and the greater part of the works of the latter prophets, and the books grouped with the Psalms, were, at this time, the accredited scriptures of the Jews; and few will be so hardy as to affirm, that no intimations occur in those writings of the doctrines which constituted the hope and consolation of Israel. On this (in my opinion, untenable) hypothesis, it would appear highly credible that some very distinct reference to those doctrines would enter materially into the structure of the work.

2. The alleged inconsistency between these expressions of triumphant confidence, as we understand them, and the gloominess and despondency generally prevalent in the speeches of Job, presses equally on our opponents, who confine the passage to the expectation of restored prosperity in the present life. It lies even more against them, for Job, not only before, but in his very last speech, evidently despaired of a restoration to temporal felicity. His property might, indeed, by some wonderful, though almost incredible reverse of God's providence, be retrieved; or, at least, equivalent comforts in that class of things might be obtained; but his children were destroyed; they could not live again: and his own disorder, probably the dreadful oriental leprosy, was incurable and fatal. Yet, between this hopeless condition as to earthly enjoyments, and a vigorous aspiration of the mind after spiritual and immortal blessings, there is no inconsistency. A man must have little judgment, little taste, and less moral sensibility, who does not perceive in these alternations of faith and diffidence, despair and hope, a picture exquisitely just and touching, of the human mind, under the influence of the most agitating conflict between religious principle resting on the belief of invisible existences, and, on the other hand, the dictates of sense, the pressure of misery, and the violence of temptations.

3. But we are not disposed to grant either of the assumptions before mentioned. We have better evidence than the idea of German anti-supernaturalists, or the opinions of English refiners upon theology, that the patriarchs from whom the tradition of divine truths had descended to Job, "confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth, and desired a better country, that is, a heavenly." Nor is it credible that the promise of a Messiah was totally unknown to the true worshippers of Jehovah in Arabia, allied to the family of Abraham, and in the habit of reverentially cherishing the remains of primeval truth. And, besides the possession of the patriarchal religion, what is there to prevent any but a deist from conceiving that God might inspire his faithful and afflicted servant with the knowledge and the joyful confidence which he expresses? Is not such a supposition consonant with all the known scheme and principles of the divine dispensations? Was not the occasion worthy of the interposition? Has it not always been the faith of the Jewish and of the Christian church, that the ultimate sentiments which it is the design of the book of Job to support and illustrate, and which, in the sequel of the book, receive the stamp of divine approbation, form a part of the body of REVEALED TRUTH? There are also many passages in the book which may be rationally urged as recognitions of a future state.

4. The bare assertion that the terms of the passage do not import so much as is usually attributed to them, may be fairly enough met by asserting the contrary. To the unlearned reader, as well as to the critical scholar, the means of judging for himself are industriously presented, in the close version given above, and in the remarks and references subjoined. The words are as plain as in any instance the language of prophecy can be expected to be. It appears to me strictly rational, probable, and in harmony with the great plan of a progressive revelation, to regard this remarkable passage as dictated by the SPIRIT of prophecy, who, "in many portions, and in many modes, spake to the fathers." Let me also entreat the reader's most impartial consideration, whether the sense here maintained is not required, even necessitated, by the words, taken in their fair meaning and connexion; and whether the affixing of a lower interpretation does not oblige those who take this course, to put a manifest force upon the phrases, and upon the marks of pre-eminent importance with which the sacred author has signalized them.

After employing the utmost force and beauty of language to stamp importance upon the words which he was about to utter, and to ensure for them a never-dying attention, the patriarch protests his confidence that the LIVING GOD, the eternal, independent, and unchanging One, would be his VINDICATOR from injustice, and his REDEEMER from all his sorrows; and would restore him from the state of death, to a new life of supreme happiness in the favour and enjoyment of God.

It is not necessary to suppose that Job understood the full import and extent of what he was "moved by the Holy Spirit to speak." The general belief on the divine testimony of a future Saviour from sin and its consequent evils, would place him on a level with other saints, in his own and many succeeding ages, who "died in faith, not receiving the promises" in their clearest development, "but SEEING THEM AFAR OFF." Even when those promises had received many accessions of successive revelations, the Jewish prophets did not apprehend the exact design and meaning of their own predictions; for "they inquired and searched diligently—what or what kind of time, the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify." Our inquiry is, therefore, not so much what the patriarch actually understood, as what the Author of inspiration intended; since it was "not unto themselves, but unto us," that the patriarchs and prophets "ministered those things." "No prophecy of scripture is of self-solution;" but is made gradually plainer by new communications from the same omniscient source, and by the light of events.

Upon this principle, it is proper for us to compare the language of this passage, with the character and declarations of HIM to whom "all the prophets gave witness." He, in the fulness of the times, was manifested, as the REDEEMER from sin and death, the FIRST and the LAST, and the LIVING ONE, the RESURRECTION and the LIFE; who, in the appointed season, "is coming with the clouds, and every eye shall see him; whose voice the dead shall hear, and hearing, shall live."

If, then, the evidence which we can attain in this case, be sufficient to satisfy an impartial judgment, that the passage before us was "given by inspiration of God," as a prophecy of the second coming of the only Redeemer and Judge of mankind; it is no less evidence in point to our present investigation, on the PERSON of the Great Deliverer, than if it directly regarded his first advent:—and it unequivocally designates HIM by the highest titles and attributes of Deity. Upon the hypothesis of those who regard the book of Job as a divine parable, all doctrinal and practical conclusions from it are strengthened, rather than rendered weak or precarious.—J. P. SMITH.

Ver. 24. That they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever!

This probably refers to the ancient practice of writing on stone (by means of an iron instrument) those events which were to be conveyed to posterity. The fact, also, o lead being used, may allude to the fixing of the stone by means of that metal. In all parts of the East are to be found records thus written, many of which have never been deciphered, as they are in the languages not now understood. It is proverbial to say, "The words of the wise are written on stone." "Learning for the young is like a writing in stone."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 26. And though, after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God.

Though worms be not in the original, I believe the translators have acted wisely in supplying the word for the text. Dr. Mason God translates it, "After the disease hath destroyed." But the opinion of the Orientals, as expressed in their ancient writings, and also in those of the present day, is, that worms do exist in the skin, and in all parts of the body, and that they principally cause its destruction. They say the life is first destroyed by them, and afterward the body. A man who is very ill, often exclaims, "Ah! my body is but a nest for worms; they have paths in all parts of my frame." "Ah! these worms are continually eating my flesh." In the ancient medical work called Kurru-Nitich-Sooleram, written by the celebrated Agattiyar, it is said, "The human body contains eighteen kinds of worms:—1. the skin; 2. the flesh; 3. the bones; 4. the blood; 5. (producing) wind; 6. the excrement; 7. the urine; 8. intestines; 9. scrota; 10. abscess; 11. sores (generally); 12. leprosy; 13. itch; 14. cancer; 15. mouth; 16. teeth; 17. scull; and 18. the hair." Is it not a fact that the medical men of England have only of late years discovered that animalcules exist in some of these parts alluded to? and perhaps they may do well also to inquire, whether old Agattiyar be not correct in some of his other opinions.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 28. But ye should say, Why persecute we him? seeing the root of the matter is found in me.

"What is the root of his conversation?" "Is his root right?" "We cannot find out his root?" "Ah! he has a good root."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 16. He shall suck the poison of asps: the viper's tongue shall slay him.

In a country where serpents lurk in every path, and where such numbers of people lose their lives from their bite, can it be a matter of wonder that they are greatly afraid of them, and that their language abounds with figures taken from the destructive power of that reptile? Some modern writers have asserted, that there are very few of them which have poisonous qualities. It is said that some travellers take occasional journeys of several months into Italy, Greece, and Egypt, that they may have an opportunity of writing a book "for the gratification of their friends;" and that it is necessary to contradict, or alter a little, the descriptions of their predecessors, in order to find a sale, or to ensure a modicum of popularity. There may be something like scandal in these observations; but I am quite sure they are not without force in reference to some who have favoured the world with their sketches of the East. To say there are many serpents whose bite is not fatal, is correct; but to assert that there are many whose bite is not poisonous, is nonsense. Perhaps the most harmless of all the tribe is the rat-snake; but its bite always produces giddiness in the head, and a great degree of deadness in the part where the wound has been inflicted. Apologizing for this digression, I observe, that when a man is engaged with another, and yet dare not make a personal attack upon him, he says, "The viper shall bite thee." "From whom art thou? the race of vipers?" "Yes, yes; the poison of the paddevan-pambo, i. e. the heaven-serpent, is in thy mouth." "What! serpent, art thou going to bite me? Chee, Chee! I will break thy teeth."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 17. He shall not see the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter.

See on chap. 29. 6.

Is a man about to leave his native place, to reside in another country in hope of becoming rich, people say to him, "We suppose there are rivers of ghee, and honey and milk, in the town where you are going to live!"—ROBERTS.

In these cool countries we have no idea of butter so liquid as described in these words; it appears among us in a more solid form. But as the plentiful flowing of honey, when pressed from the comb, may be compared to a little river, as it runs into the vessels in which it is to be kept, so, as they manage matters, butter is equally fluid, and may be described in the same way: "A great quantity of butter is made in Barbary, which, after it is boiled with salt, they put into jars, and preserve for use." (Shaw.) Streams of butter then, poured, when clarified, into jars to be preserved, might as naturally be compared to rivers, as streams of honey flowing upon pressure into other jars in which it was kept.—BURDEA.

Ver. 23. When he is about to fill his belly, God shall cast the fury of his wrath upon him, and shall rain it upon him while he is eating.

A man in the East does not, as in England, say he has eaten plentifully, or he has not taken any thing to eat; but he has well filled his belly, or, "to his belly there is nothing." Thus, the beggar at your door stoops a little, then puts his hands on the abdomen, and exclaims, "My lord, for my belly nothing, for my belly nothing!"—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver. 15. What is the Almighty, that we should serve him? and what profit should we have, if we pray unto him?

The heathen sometimes ask us, "Why should we pray to your God? is there anything to be gained by it? When we go to our own temples, we have often fruit given to us; but when we come to yours, nothing is offered: give us something, and we will pray to him." On one of these occasions, a bystander repeated a favourite proverb, "Do you ask for pay when requested to eat sugarcane?" which silenced the jester.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 16. Lo, their good is not in their hand: the counsel of the wicked is far from me.

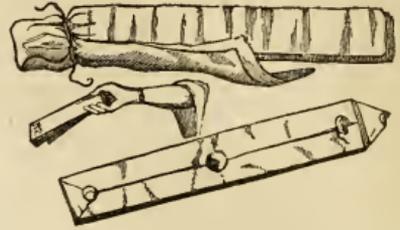

There has been a difficulty of great magnitude supposed in the present and several of the ensuing verses. Reiske, in order to explain it, has recourse to his usual method; and while he changes the division of the letters in the first member of the verse before us, in order so far to obtain an explanation, he transfers the ensuing six verses, from 17 to 22 inclusively, to a place between verses 31 and 32. Other commentators, with less hardihood, suppose a dialogue to be held between the speaker and some imaginary respondent, and have attempted to mark out, by inverted commas, the passages that belong to the respective disputants. There is no necessity for any such expedients: the general drift of the argument is clear: "The righteous, I admit, are generally rewarded with temporal prosperity; but do not, on this account alone, accuse me of hypocrisy and all wickedness, because I am at present a sufferer; for the wicked themselves, in the mysteries of providence, are occasionally allowed to partake of an equal prosperity; they live in happiness, and die in quiet, even while they abjure the Almighty, and laugh at those who serve him. Do not however mistake me—far be it from me to become an advocate for the wicked—I know the slipperiness of their foundation, and that more generally they suffer for their iniquity in the present world, as well in their own persons as in their posterity; I am only anxious to prove that your grand argument is fallacious; that no conclusion can be drawn from the actual prosperity or misery of man, as to the moral rectitude or turpitude of his heart; and that, with a wisdom which it is impossible for mortals to fathom, the Almighty not infrequently allots a similar eternal fate, both to the righteous and the wicked."—GOOD.

Ver. 24. His breasts are full of milk, and his bones are moistened with marrow.

When the mother dies before she has suckled her child, its life has been sometimes preserved by the milk of its father's breast. This curious fact was not unknown to Aristotle, who says, that they have a small quantity of milk, yield it in abundance when their breasts are sucked; that women who are past age, by being often suckled, and even males, have yielded milk in sufficient quantity to nourish an infant. Humboldt declares, in his Personal Narrative, that he saw a man, an inhabitant of Arenas, a village not far from Cumana, Francisco Lozano, who suckled a child with his own milk. "The mother having fallen sick, the father, to quiet the infant, took it into his bed, and pressed it to his bosom. Lozano, then thirty-two years of age, had never remarked till that day that he had milk; but the irritation of the nipple, sucked by the child, caused the accumulation of that liquid. The milk was thick and very sweet. The father, astonished at the increased size of his breast, suckled his child two or three times a-day, during five months. We saw the certificate which had been drawn up on the spot to attest this remarkable fact, eyewitnesses of which are still living, (1799.) They assured us, that during this suckling, the child had no other nourishment than the milk of his father. Lozano, who was not at Arenas during our journey in the missions, came to us at Cumana. He was accompanied by his son, who was then thirteen or fourteen years of age. Mr. Bonpland examined with attention the father's breast, and found it wrinkled like those of women who have given suck." The existence of milk in the breast of a male was known so early as the days of Job: "His breasts are full of milk, and his bones are moistened with marrow."—PAXTON.

The margin has, for breasts, "milkpails." Of a man who is very rich, it is common to say, "His chatties (vessels) are full of milk." But of a good king or governor it is said, "He nourishes like the king whose breasts are full of milk." "Yes; he so rules; that the hearts of the goddess of the earth are full of milk."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 32. Yet shall he be brought to the grave, and shall remain in the tomb. 33. The clods of the valley shall be sweet unto him, and every man shall draw after him, as there are innumerable before him.

How came Job to speak of the clods of the valley, when describing magnificence of burial? I should suppose, in answer to this question, that Job is to be understood, not as intending to mark out the wonted places of their interment, but the manner of ornamenting their sepulchres; planting flowers, and odoriferous herbs or shrubs, on or about their graves: "Clods like those of a valley or torrent, verdant and flowery, shall surround him, and be pleasing to him." The liveliness of eastern poetry here representing the dead, as having the same perceptions as if they were alive in their sepulchres: "He shall watch in the heap of earth, or stones, that cover him," for such the margin of our translation tells us, is the more exact import of the Hebrew: "The clods around him, like those in some pleasant valley, or on the border of some torrent, shall be sweet unto him."—HARMER.

CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 6. For thou hast taken a pledge from thy brother for naught, and stripped the naked of their clothing.

This proverbial form of speech is used when a man drags from another that which is his last resource. "Why do you take this tax from the naked?" "What! take a cloth from the naked? Is there no shame?" How often, also, do we see a man seize another by the cloth on the public road, and swear if he will not instantly pay his debt, he shall be left naked.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 7. Thou hast not given water to the weary to drink, and thou hast withholden bread from the hungry.

It is one of the thirty-two charities of the Hindoos, "to have water ready for the traveller to drink." Hence, on the public roads, in front of the houses of charitable people, may be seen vessels filled with water, for the use of all who pass that way. But respectable men do not drink there; they go inside, and say, "Conjum-taneer," a little water; and it is given to them.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 20. Whereas our substance is not cut down: but the remnant of them the fire consumeth.

There can be little doubt that the reference is to the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah; and as all men are often spoken of as constituting one family or community, so the abandoned inhabitants of these cities are poetically represented as descendants or remnants of the wicked that perished in the flood.—GOOD.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Ver. 11. My foot hath held his steps: his way have I kept, and not declined.

When a man follows another in a path so closely as almost to touch the feet of him who goes before, it is said, "His feet hath laid hold of his steps," intimating that the men are so near to each other, that the feet of him who follows, like unto the fingers of a man's hands, seize the feet of him who goes before. Thus the devoted disciple of a gooroo, or the man who closely pursues another, is said to take hold of the steps of him who goes before. Perhaps the figure may be taken from the great adroitness that the natives of the East have in seizing hold of any thing with their toes! See a man walking along the road: he sees something on the ground, which he wishes to pick up; but he does not stoop, as an Englishman. No! he takes it up between his first and second toes. Look at tailors, shoemakers, or sailors; when they want to twist a cord, they do not tie it to a nail, or ask another person to take hold. No; they make one end fast to the great toe, and perform the other operation with the hands. But the most remarkable illustration of this practice was in the case of Aylpulle, the Kandian chief, who was beheaded near Kandy. When he arrived at the place where he was to be executed, he looked around for some time for a small shrub; and on seeing one, he seized it with his toes, in order to be firm while the executioner did his office.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Ver. 3. They drive away the ass of the fatherless; they take the widow's ox for a pledge.

How various and important are the services which this humble creature renders to his master! He serves him for riding, for bearing his burdens, drawing the plough, treading in the grain into the flooded soil, turning the millstone; and to all these services the female adds the nutritious beverage of her milk. To the poor man, therefore, a single ass might prove an invaluable treasure. In many cases, it was the principal means of support to himself and his family; a circumstance which accounts for the energetic language respecting this animal, in some passages of scripture. To "drive away the ass of the fatherless," Job denounces as a deed of atrocity, which none but a proud and unfeeling oppressor could be guilty of perpetrating.—PAXTON.

Ver. 5. Behold, as wild asses in the desert, go they forth to their work, rising betimes for a prey: the wilderness yieldeth food for them and for their children.

See on Gen. 16. 12.

The passage refers, evidently, not to the proud and haughty tyrants themselves, but to the oppressed and needy wretches, the Bedouins and other plundering tribes, whom their extortion and violence had driven from society, and compelled in a body to seek for subsistence by public robbery and pillage. In this sense the description is admirably forcible and characteristic.—GOOD.

Ver. 8. They are wet with the showers of the mountains, and embrace the rock for want of a shelter.

This exactly agrees with what Niebuhr says of the modern wandering Arabs near Mount Sinai: "Those who cannot afford a tent spread out a cloth upon four or six stakes; and others spread their cloth near a tree, or endeavour to shelter themselves from the heat and the rain in the cavities of the rocks."—BUADÉ.

Ver. 9. They pluck the fatherless from the breast, and take a pledge of the poor.

It used to be said of the cruel king of Kandy, that he would not allow the infant to suck its mother's breast. Of a wicked woman it is said, "She will not allow her own child to suck her." "O the savage husband! he snatches the child from his wife's breast."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 16. In the dark they dig through houses, which they had marked for themselves in the daytime: they know not the light.

The short duration of mud-walled buildings is not the only objection to the use of unburnt brick; for in windy weather the streets are incommoded with dust, and with mire in time of rain. At Damascus, when a violent rain happens to fall, the whole city, by the washing of the houses, becomes as it were a quagmire. So great is the quantity of dust and mire which sometimes accumulates in the streets of an eastern city, that the prophet Zechariah borrows a figure from it, of great force and significance in the ear of an Oriental, to denote the immense riches of Tyre: "Tyre did build herself a strong hold, and heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold as the mire of the streets." The beauty of the figure is lost if we attempt to judge of it by the state of an occidental city in modern times; but it will not be easy to conceive one more strikingly appropriate, if the streets of an eastern city, choked with mire, or suffocated with dust, are considered. Dr. Shaw directs the attention of his readers to the same circumstance, the dissolution of oriental buildings upon a shower, and supposes it may illustrate what Ezekiel observes respecting untempered mortar. When that traveller was at Tozer, in the month of December, they had a small drizzling shower, which continued for the space of two hours; and so little provision was made against accidents of this kind, that several of the houses, which, as usual, were built only with palm branches, mud, and tiles baked in the sun, fell down by imbibing the moisture of the shower. Nay, provided the drops had been either larger, or the shower of a longer continuance, he was persuaded the whole city would have dissolved and dropped to pieces. In his opinion, the phrase "untempered mortar" refers to the square pieces of clay of which the wall is constructed; but on looking at the text, it is evident that it refers to the plaster which is used in the East for covering the walls after they are built. The words of the prophet are: "And one built up a wall, and lo, others daubed it with untempered mortar.—Lo, when the wall is fallen, shall it not be said unto you, Where is the daubing wherewith ye have daubed it?" The view which Chardin gives of this text is, therefore, to be preferred. According to that intelligent traveller, the mud walls fall down in consequence of the rain dissolving the plaster. This plaster hinders the water from penetrating the bricks; but when it has been soaked with wet, the wind cracks it, by which means the rain, in some succeeding shower, gets between and dissolves the whole mass. To this external coating of plaster, the prophet certainly refers, and not to the bricks, of which the wall is constructed; for these, however tempered, never can be supposed to resist the action of violent rains. The ruinous effect of stormy winds and heavy rains upon such frail structures, is well described in the thirteenth verse, and exactly corresponds with the accounts of modern travellers: "Therefore, thus saith the Lord God, I will even rend it with a stormy wind in my fury; and there shall be an overflowing shower in mine anger, and great hailstones in my fury to consume it. So will I break down the wall that ye have daubed with untempered mortar, and bring it down to the ground, so that the foundation thereof shall be discovered, and it shall fall, and ye shall be consumed in the midst thereof: and ye shall know that I am the Lord." The same allusion is involved in the prediction of Amos, where he denounces the judgments of God against a profligate and refractory people: "For, behold, the Lord commandeth, and he will smite the great house with breaches, and the little house with clefts." The palaces of the great and the cottages of the poor, seem to have been constructed of the same fragile material; for they were affected by the storm and the tempest in the same manner, and when the cup of iniquity is full, are dissolved by the same shower.—PAXTON.

Nearly all the houses in the East are made of unburnt bricks, so that there is very little difficulty in making a hole sufficiently large to admit the human body. No wonder, then, that this is the general way of robbing houses. Thus, in the morning, when the inmates awake, they see daylight through a hole in the wall, and immediately know what has been done.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 18. He is swift as the waters; their portion is cursed in the earth: he beholdeth not the way of the vineyards.

From this verse to the end of ver. 24, it is agreed by all the translators, that there is much difficulty and perplexity. "Non nimum, (says Le Clerc,) quam hæc periodo se obscurius quicquam in sanctis scripturis"—"There is hardly any passage in the holy scriptures more obscure than the present." and Schultens fully concurs in the observation. Hence there are no two interpreters, perhaps, who have translated it in precisely the same way, or understood it in the same manner. By many the text has been suspected to be erroneous in several instances; and a sense has been attempted to be extorted by pretended amendments of it. Reiske, here, as on all other occasions, is by far the boldest emendator; there is scarcely a verse into which he has not introduced some alteration, and in some verses an alteration amounting to nearly half the original text. It would be in vain to investigate these numerous renderings, of which no one appears to me to be more perspicuous than another, or to propose a clearer sense than that contained in our common version, obscure and in many parts unintelligible as it is allowed to be. Without dwelling, therefore, upon the misconceptions of my predecessors, I shall at once offer to the reader's attention, with much diffidence, a new interpretation of this contested passage, founded upon a different view of the writers' general scope and intention: and in doing this, while I adhere to the original text, without any amendment, the reader will find, I trust, that I shall be able to extract a very obvious meaning from it, even by such strict and literal rendering. What is the grand point of controversy between the pious patriarch and his too severe companions? I have been compelled to advert to it on various occasions, and especially in the note on chap. xxi. 16, which contains the patriarch's preceding reply. Job is, from first to last, accused by his friends of being an enormous transgressor, because it had pleased the Almighty to visit him with a severe affliction: and when he at first denied his being such a transgressor, he was immediately taxed with gross and open hypocrisy. He defends himself in several of his subsequent answers, from this cruel and unfounded charge, and ably and completely refutes the very ground of the argument, by observing, in chap. xxi. that although it be true that the righteous are often, and for the most part, rewarded sooner or later, in this life, with prosperity, and the wicked punished as they deserve; yet that, in the mystery of providence, the rule by no means holds universally; for that the wicked also are often allowed to be prosperous, even to the latest period of their existence, and the upright to endure an uninterrupted series of pain and affliction. In chapter xxii. the original charge is again, however, advanced against the patriarch by Eli-phaz, who once more advises him to repent of his misdeeds, in order that he might be restored to his former prosperity, and ascribes his vindication of himself to a spirit of obstinacy and rebellion. In the chapter before us, Job reverts to the argument so forcibly opened in his preceding reply: and in enlarging upon it, observes not only that the conduct of providence is inscrutable to us in regard to its dealings with the righteous and the wicked, but in regard to all the different classes of mankind, all the different modes of life they pursue, and all the different events that accompany them. In every scene we behold evil, moral or physical, permitted; in the retirement of the country, and in the crowded city; by sea and by land; it commences in the womb itself, and accompanies man through every stage of his being. We know nothing of the laws of providence; the Almighty often appears to be labouring in vain; and vice and virtue, the righteous and the wicked, to be almost equally, and almost promiscuously, the subject of prosperity and of affliction. The corollary is clear and unanswerable: "How absurd, then, is it to accuse me of being more a sinner than the rest of mankind, from the mere circumstance of my being a severer sufferer than others."—Good.

Ver. 19. Drought and heat consume the snow-waters; so doth the grave those which have sinned.

Literally, "ransack or plunder them." The reference is to those dikes, tanks, or reservoirs of water, which, in eastern countries, are always carefully filled during the periodical exudations of the large rivers, as the Nile, Indus, and Ganges, and preserved to fertilize the soil by occasional irrigations through the rest of the year, and without which there can be no harvest. So Isa. xxxvi. 16:—

Make ye peace with me, and come out to me,
And eat ye, every one of his vine, and every one of his fig-tree;
And drink ye, every one, of the waters of his own cistern, (tank.)
And Jeremiah, still more at large:—

And their nobles sent their little ones to the waters;
They came to the pits, (tanks)—they found no water;
They returned with their vessels empty;
They were ashamed and confounded, and covered their heads.
Behold! chapt was the ground, for there had been no rain on the earth;
The ploughmen were ashamed, they covered their heads.

These exudations were uniformly ascribed, and with great reason, to heavy periodical rains, and sudden thawings of the immense masses of snow deposited in the colder months on the summits of the loftier mountains, and especially of that vast and winding chain of rocks which, under the name of Caucasus and Imaus, runs, in almost every direction, from the eastern verge of Europe to the southern extremity of India. The two physical evils here adverted to, therefore, are among the severest scourges ever inflicted upon man—the failure of the vintage and of the harvest.—Good.

Ver. 21. He evil entreateth the barren that beareth not, and doeth not good to the widow.

It is considered to be very disgraceful for a married woman not to have children; and the evil treatment they receive from their own husbands and others is most shameful. Nothing can be more common than for a poor woman of that description, when she has given offence to another, to be addressed by the term malady, i. e. barren. "Go, barren one, get out of my sight!" "Chee! she cannot have a child."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 24. They are exalted for a little while, but are gone and brought low; they are taken out of the way as all other, and cut off as the tops of the ears of corn.

Wicked men and tyrants may be prosperous for a season, but they will eventually be like the long stubble, having had the ears lopped off. This alludes to the custom, in the East, of taking off the ears of the corn, and leaving the straw, as before, standing on the ground. The grain called kur-rakan is gathered by simply taking off the ears; and rice, where the water still remains in the fields, is gathered in the same way. The proud oppressor, then, in the end, shall be like the long straw standing in its place, having "the ears" cut off, and carried away.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Ver. 5. Dead things are formed from under the waters, and the inhabitants thereof.

What possible sense can be elicited from this passage, as thus rendered? The original for "dead things," (rephaim), properly signifies the mighty dead, and is a common denomination of the dead giants who died before the flood. The spirits of these men are frequently alluded to in the scriptures, in accordance with the popular modes of belief, as incarcerated in the bowels or cavernous recesses of the earth, having been ingulged in the waters of the deluge. Here the speaker is descending, in a sublime and somewhat poetic manner, upon the ubiquity and omnipotence of God. Though seated upon the circle of the heavens, yet his eye penetrates, and his presence visits the profoundest abysses of the globe, and the spirits of the mighty dead, the tenants of these gloomy mansions, quake and quake before him. The true import of the original word rendered "formed" is, to tremble, shake, quake, be put in commotion. It is, therefore, in fact, but saying, that the regions of the dead are perfectly exposed to the omniscient survey of Jehovah, and that the despairing spirits of those who perished under the overwhelming mass of waters in the days of Noah, perpetually quake under the consciousness of his present ire. The ensuing verse is in a similar strain: "Hell (hades, the invisible world) is naked before him, and destruction hath no covering." A kindred figurative mode of representation occurs in Isaiah, ch. xiv. 6, where the approach of the once-dreaded king of Babylon to the dreary mansions of the dead, is spoken of as exciting commotion among the silent occupant's of that nether world. "Hell from beneath is moved for thee to meet thee at thy coming; it stirreth up the dead (rephaim, the mighty dead) for thee, even all the chief ones of the earth." We suppose that the New Testament contains two distinct allusions to the subject of the present passage in Job, if not to the passage itself; the first is James i. 19, "Thou believest there is one God; thou doest well; the devils also believe, and tremble." Here the original word for devils (daimonia, demons) is, as Campbell has shown, the New Testament term for spirits of dead men, especially such as were deified and worshipped after death, the heroes or demigods of antiquity. This view of the subject brings the two passages into very near accordance with each other. The import of both is, that the spirits of these mighty dead tremble in awe before the most high God. The other occurs 1 Pet. iii. 19, 20, "By which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison, which sometime were disobedient, when once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is to say, eight souls, were saved by water." Christ, speaking by his spirit through Noah, and perhaps other good men living before the flood, preached to those ancient sinners, "which were of old, men of renown," but whose spirits, from their having proved disobedient and incorrigible, are now confined in the gloomy abodes of the under world, as in a prison from which there is no escape.—BOSN.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Ver. 8. For what is the hope of the hypocrite, though he hath gained, when God taketh away his soul?

The argument now entered upon is admirably forcible, and in point; it opposes the adverse party with their own weapons. "You accuse me of hypocrisy and of all wickedness, and you accuse me of this acting from a love of gain. How absurd and irrational such a motive! what hope of prosperity can the wicked man indulge? what hope that God should grant him tranquillity?" Ver. 11, "I will teach you his lot by the hand of God himself. Ye yourselves know it, and have seen it." Ver. 13, "Behold! this is the portion of the wicked man," &c.—Good.

Ver. 15. Those that remain of him shall be buried in death; and his widows shall not weep.

Nothing can be bolder, nothing more highly imbued with the spirit of oriental poetry, than the entire couplet: "No sepulchre, no funeral dirge: corruption alone shall be his tomb; his own household shall not bewail him; not even the affectionate females of his harem, his bereft wives and concubines; those of his own rank, who brought with them a dowry upon marriage, and those selected on account of their personal charms, and who were married without dowries." No honourable man was ever interred, in ancient times, and in eastern nations, without the solemnity of public mourners in long procession, loud lamentations, and metrical dirges. But it is probable that the writer, in the present place, more immediately alludes to those shrieks of domestic grief, which are so often to be met with in every quarter of the house, and especially among the females, upon the death of its master; and which is admirably described in the Iliad, upon the fall of Hector. The passage, however, has not been understood by any of the commentators or translators who have concurred in regarding וְיָשָׁב as meaning the remains of his house, instead of the remains of his person; and hence our common version, "those that remain of him," instead of literally, "his remains." Equally erroneous the common version, "shall be buried in death;" in which וְיָשָׁב, here rendered death, means also "mortality," "corruption," "pestilence;" i. e. "corruption alone shall be his tomb, or covering," as just explained above. Reiske, not knowing how to explain this expression upon the common interpretation, suspects, as usual, an error in the reading, and proposes a choice of three amendments; neither of which, however, it is necessary to particularize.—Good.

Ver. 16. Though he heap up silver as the dust, and prepare raiment as the clay.

According to D'Herbelot, Bokteri, an illustrious poet of Cufah, in the ninth century, had so many presents made him in the course of his life, that when he died he was found possessed of a hundred complete suits of clothes, two hundred shirts, and five hundred turbans. This anecdote proves how frequently presents of this kind are made to persons of consideration in the Levant; and at the same time furnishes a beautiful illustration of that passage in the book of Job, where the afflicted patriarch describes the treasures of the East, in his time, as consisting of clothes and money: "Though he heap up silver as the dust, and prepare raiment as the clay; he may prepare it, but the just shall put it on, and the innocent shall divide the silver."—PAXTON.

Ver. 18. He buildeth his house as a moth, and as a booth that the keeper maketh.

Feeble in its structure and materials, short in its duration, and equally incapable of resisting a thunderstorm or shower of rain. So ch. viii. 14:—

"Thus shall his support rot away,
And the building of the spider be his reliance."

The genus phalena, or moth, is divided into plant-moths and cloth-moths; and the latter have been generally supposed to be those immediately alluded to in the present place. I have some doubt of this, but the question is not of consequence; the house or building referred to is, assuredly, that provided by the insect in its larvæ or caterpillar state, as a temporary residence during its wonderful change from a chrysalis to a winged or perfect insect. The slightness of this habitation is well known to every one who has attended to the curious operation of the silkworm, or the tribes indigenous to the plants of our own country, as the emperor-moth, tiger-moth, poplar, or willow-moth, &c. Of these, some construct a solitary dwelling; while others, as the brown-tail-moth, are gregarious, vast numbers residing together under one common web, marshalled with the most exact regularity. The web of the cloth-moth is formed of the very substance of the cloth on which it reposes, devoured for this purpose, and afterward worked into a tubular case, with open extremities, and generally approaching to the colour of the cloth by which the moth-worm is nourished.—Good.

The moth forms her cell in the woollen garment; a frail structure, which is soon destroyed by the devouring energy of the builder. Day after day she consumes the stuff in which her dwelling is placed, till both are involved in one common ruin, and reduced to nothing. Such, in the estimation of Job, is the prosperity of a wicked man: "He buildeth his house as a moth, and as a booth that the keeper maketh." The term which that afflicted patriarch uses in this passage, signifies a moth, and also the constellation Arcturus. Some interpreters accordingly render the words: "the wicked man shall build his house like Arcturus; shall raise, for his accommodation and pleasure, a splendid and magnificent abode, bright as the stars of Arcturus in the shining vault of heaven; but it shall speedily rush into ruin, like a temporary booth, where the keeper of a vineyard watches his property for a little while till the vintage is gathered." But this interpretation by no means accords with the design of the speaker; for it introduces an antithesis into the text, instead of the conjunction, which Job evidently meant, and separates the two comparisons of the same thing, as if they referred to different objects. Hence the common version, which unquestionably expresses the true sense of the clause, is to be preferred: "The wicked man, like the moth, builds his house at the expense of another. He expels his neighbours from their possessions, that he may join house to house, and lay field to field, till there be no place for others to inhabit, except as dependants on his forbearance or bounty, that he may dwell alone, as the sole proprietor, in the midst of the earth." The idea of Job is thus expressed by another prophet: "They covet fields, and take them by violence; and houses, and take them away; so they oppress a man and his house, even a man and his heritage." But his unrighteous acquisitions shall be of short continuance; they shall moulder insensibly away, returning to the lawful owner, or passing into the possession of others.—PAXTON.

Strictly, the mothworm, as it proceeds from the egg before it is changed into the chrysalis, aurelia, or nymph, (Nature Displayed, vol. i. p. 18.) so called from its corroding and destroying the texture of cloth. Job xiii. 28. Isaiah l. 9. li. 8. "The young moth upon leaving the egg, which a papilio has lodged upon a piece of stuff, or a skin well dressed, and commodious for her purpose, immediately finds a habitation and food in the nap of the stuff, or hair of the skin. It gnaws and lives upon the nap, and likewise builds with it its apartment, accommodated both with a front door and a back one; the whole is well fastened to the ground of the stuff, with several cords and a little glue. The moth sometimes thrusts her head out of one opening, and sometimes out of the other, and perpetually devours and demolishes all about her; and when she has cleared the place about her, she draws out all the stakes of this tent, after which she carries it to some little distance, and then fixes it with her slender cords in a new situation. In this manner she continues to live at our expense till she is satiated with her food, at which period she is first transformed into a nymph, and then changes into a papilio, or moth."—BURDER.

Ver. 19. The rich man shall lie down, but he shall not be gathered: he openeth his eyes, and he is not.

The heathen had a conceit that the souls of such persons as had not had the due rites of burial paid them, were not admitted into hades, but were forced to wander a hundred years, a parcel of vagabond ghosts, about the banks of the Styx. Hence we find the ghost of Patroclus supplicating Achilles to give him his funeral rites: "Bury me," says he, "that I may pass as soon as possible through the gates of hades." So speaks Palinurus, in Virgil: "Throw upon me some earth, that at last I may obtain rest in death, in quiet habitations." Here the self-conceited philosopher smiles at the rite of sprinkling the body three times with dust; but this, although misunderstood, and tinged with the fabulous, was borrowed from the Hebrew nation. To gather denotes, as to the dead, the bringing of their souls to Paradise. Although this cannot be effected by mortals, yet they expressed the benevolent wish that the thing might be. On the other hand, Job says of the rich man, he shall lie down, but he shall not be gathered. In the ages which followed, the performance of this rite was termed sealing. Of this we have a bright instance in the second book of Esdras: "Whosoever thou findest the dead, seal them, and bury them;" that is, express the benevolent prayer which is in use among the Jews to this day: "May he be in the bundle of life, may his portion be in Paradise, and also in that future world which is reserved for the righteous." It would also appear, that in this act of sealing a corpse, they either wrote upon the head with ink, or simply made the form with the finger, (Le-hovah.) This at bottom could make no difference in the state of the deceased, but it expressed their desire that such a person might be among those who are written unto life. From a passage in Isaiah, it appears that persons were in use to mark with indelible ink on the hand, the words Le-hovah, the contracted form of this sentence, I am the Lord's. This agrees with what Rabbi Simeon says, "The perfectly just are sealed, and in the moment of death are conveyed to Paradise." This sealing St. Paul applies, as far as wishes can go, to Onesiphorus: "May the Lord grant to Onesiphorus, that he may obtain mercy of the Lord in that day!" "As many," says the same apostle, "as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and upon the Israel of God!" (Gal. vi. 16.)

Such being marked in death with the expression, belonging to the Lord, explains this sentence, "the foundation of the Lord standeth sure, having this seal, the Lord knoweth them that are his." "Hurt not the earth, nor the trees," says the angel in the book of Revelation, "until we have sealed the servants of our God in their foreheads." This seal, we are told, is their father's name: that is, Le-hovah, the Lord's, alluding to the Old Testament form. This name Christ says he himself writes, and by doing so, acts the part of the Kedosh-Israel, opening where none can shut. This sealing, then, is taking them off by death, and placing them in his father's house; for after they are so sealed, we find them before the throne, hungering and thirsting no more, and the Lamb in the midst of them, and leading them forth into pastures.—BRADEN.

See on 2 Sam. 2. 15.

The present female way of expressing joy in the East, by gently applying one of their hands to their mouths, seems to have obtained in the times of remote antiquity, and to be meant in several places of scripture. What their present custom is, appears in the following passage of Pitts, describing the joy with which the leaders of their sacred caravans are received, in the several towns of Barbary through which they pass: "This emir Hagze, into whatsoever town he comes, is received with a great deal of joy, because he is going about so religious a work; and it is, who can have the favour and honour of kissing his hand, or but his garment! He goes attended in much pomp, with flags, kettle-drums, &c. and loud acclamations do, as it were, rend the skies; nay, the very women get upon the tops of the houses to view the parade, or fine show, where they keep striking their fore fingers on their lips, as fast as they can, making a joyful noise all the while, which sounds somewhat like yow, yow, yow, hundreds of times." Others have given us nearly the same account. This seems to me to be referred to in some passages of scripture; and that the sacred writers suppose two different methods of expressing joy by a quick motion of the hand, which is lost in our translation; for I suppose the clapping of the hands in the plural, is a very distinct thing from the clapping the hand in the singular, though our translators have confounded them together. The striking one hand against the other with some smartness, which we mean by the term clapping of the hands, might, and I believe did, obtain anciently, as an expression of joy; not infrequently, if not always, of the malignant kind; so the prophet Jeremiah says of Jerusalem, when it was destroyed, "All that pass by, clap their hands at thee; they hiss and wag their head at the daughter of Jerusalem, saying, Is this the city that men call the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole earth?" Lam. ii. 15. In like manner Job, after describing the sudden destruction of the wicked, says, "Men shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place," Job xxvii. 23.—HARMER.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Ver. 4. The flood breaketh out from the inhabitant; even the waters forgotten of the foot: they are dried up, they are gone away from men.

The mighty flood which man had dammed up, by joining together MOUNTAINS and HILLS, and thus forming an immense basin, had broken down by its weight the gigantic MOUND; had rolled "away from men," and gone in the desert places. The waters of the lake are now "forgotten of the foot, they are dried up;" for the feet of men in walking there think of them no more.—ROBERTS.

Mr. Parkhurst considers this chapter as relating to mineralogy, and renders these words, "a torrent bursteth forth from the rubbish unexpectedly; by the foot they are drawn off, by man they are removed." As an explanation, he adds the following extract from Mr. Hutchinson: "It is hardly credible how great a quantity of water will be sometimes flung upon miners, when they come to break up strata of stone, that have in them many of these cracks, that are so small that they are scarcely discernible. These are indeed the natural conveyances of water, and when once they are opened, it runs incessantly. I have observed such an eruption of water in vast quantity out of stone, that, excepting those cracks, is much too dense and close to let any humidity pass." "The vast profusion of water that sometimes ensues the breaking up of the strata in coal-pits, is well known to those who are in the least conversant in that affair: and what amazing quantities are drawn off from deep mines, either by drains or levels, or raised by engines, is also well known; nay, in digging common wells and ponds, in places where there are no springs above ground, it frequently happens that such a glut of water issues forth as to endanger the lives of the workmen."—BRADEN.

Ver. 6. The stones of it are the place of sapphires; and it hath dust of gold.

THE STONES which form and bind together the MOUNDS and hills are taken from the exact places where sapphires are found. For Jameson informs us, that "the geognostic situation of the sapphire is in alluvial soil, in the vicinity of rocks, belonging to the secondary flötz trap formation, and imbedded in gneiss." In reference to its geographic situation, the same writer says, it is found particularly beautiful in Asia, in the Capelan mountains, in Persia, and the Island of Ceylon. Dr. Davy states, that "the sapphire occurs in considerable abundance in the granitic alluvion of Matura and Saffragam," (in Ceylon.) Thus, the stones of which the mound is formed, are the true geognostic situation where the sapphire is found; and there can be no doubt that the workmen, in hewing and detaching the masses from the rocks, and in joining them to the mountains, did, by this secondary kind of mining, often find the precious sapphire. "And it hath dust of gold." The same mineralogist states, (and it is a well known fact,) "that in Asia the sand of many rivers affords gold," and it is washed down in great quantities from the mountains on the coast of Sumatra, where it is afterward found in the beds of rivers.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 10. He cutteth out rivers among the rocks; and his eye seeth every precious thing.

In our common version, "he cutteth out rivers;" in one or two others, "canals." The exact meaning is, the holloes that are delved by miners in a metallic bed or mountain, often serving as passages to the central chamber. By cleaving such openings as these, the metallurgist may truly be stated, which he could not be in the usual rendering of "cutting out rivers;" "to discover every precious gem."—GOOD.

Savary informs us, the canal Babr Joseph "must have cost immense sums, being in many parts cut through the rock!" Bishop Heber also states that the lake of Ajmeer is formed "by damming up the gore of an extensive valley, and conveying different small rills into it!" Thus, in making his rivers and rivulets through the rocks, in order to convey the water to its destined place, he at the same time sees "every precious thing;" because his work lies in the geognostic situation of those valuable gems.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 11. He bindeth the floods from overflowing; and the thing that is hid bringeth he forth to light.

According to Reiske, "E fonticulo compellit in unum alveum,"—"He driveth them from their spring into a common reservoir." According to the more general interpretation "He bindeth the flood from overflowing." The sense has not been fairly understood. Every one acquainted with mining knows, that, at different depths from the surface, the shaft, or aperture, is so apt to be overflowed with water from surrounding springs, that it is impossible to work it till the water is drawn off; the machinery to accomplish which is sometimes one of the most serious expenses incidental to working a mine. It is to the restraint of these waters, so perpetually oozing or weeping through every pore, that the writer alludes in the present passage.—Good.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Ver. 2. Oh that I were as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me; 3. When his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness.

The winter in Canaan is extremely wet and cold. In the time of the crusades, many of the troops perished through want of provisions, intenseness of the cold, and the heaviness of the winter rains. Fulcherius, who was in the retinue of the prince of Antioch, in his journey to Jerusalem, and saw many of both sexes die, besides numbers of their cattle, says, they were kept wet for four or five days together, by the continual rains. So great is the quantity of rain which occasionally falls, and so intense the cold, that the elements seem to conspire the ruin of every living creature that is exposed to their fury. It is agreed by all those who have written on the subject, that all the winter months in Palestine are rainy; and by consequence, that Judea is not one of those regions where it only rains at the equinoxes. The Hebrew word horeph, accordingly, which we translate winter, in Mr. Harmer's opinion, seems rather to mean precisely the wet season. "O that I were as in months past," says Job, "as in the days when God preserved me, as I was in the days of my winter!" In the days of his moist time, when, as he expresses it, "my root was spread out by the waters, and the dew lay all night upon my branch; my glory was fresh in me." Not in the days of his disgrace then, the days in which he was stripped of his ornaments, as an herb of its leaves and flowers in the winter; but like a plant, in the latter part of the rainy season, before the violent heats come on, which scorch and burn up every green thing. But the term horeph, from the verb haraph, to strip, literally means the stripping season; and signifies that part of the year which strips vegetables of their flowers, fruit, and leaves, and consequently, the earth of its beauty. It is opposed to kailtz, from kultz, to awake, or quicken, the quickening or awakening season, and includes both autumn and winter. It is probable that the cold and rainy season of winter would be an object of desire to Job, when "the heavens are filled with clouds, when the earth swims to rain, and all nature wears a lowering countenance?" It is more natural to render the phrase, in the days of his autumn, which in those climates is a delightful season; for then the heats are abated, the earth is moistened with dew, or refreshed with the first showers of the latter rain, and the various fruits of the earth, to use the beautiful language of inspiration, are ready to drop into the mouth of the eater; or, the fields and trees being stripped of their produce, are heaped on its board. The afflicted patriarch certainly referred to the end of harvest, in allusion to which he might say, with strict propriety, "my root was spread out by the waters, and the dew lay all night upon my branches; my glory was fresh in me."—PAXTON.

The slaughter of Saul filled his camp with terror and mourning: before that, it is probable, his tent might sometimes be distinguished by lights; at least these illuminations are now used in those countries to do honour to princes, and must not here be forgotten. So the tent of the bey of Girge, Norden tells us, was distinguished from the other tents in that encampment, by forty lanterns suspended before it in form of checker-work. So Thevenot, describing the reception of the new bashaw of Egypt under tents, near Cairo, says there were two great trees, on which two hundred lamps hung, at the gate of the little enclosure which surrounded his pavilions, which were lighted in the nighttime; and that there was the same before the tents of the principal officers, as in the caravan of Mecca. In the East, it is now a customary thing; if it was the same anciently, perhaps the words of Job might refer to it, ch. xxix. 2, 3: "Oh that it were with me as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me: when his candle shined upon my head," when I returned prosperous from expeditions against the enemies of my tribe, and had my tent adorned with lamps, "and I passed through the night by the light of it."—HARMER.

Ver. 4. As I was in the days of my youth, when the secret of God was upon my tabernacle.

Job was reverting to the time of his prosperity, as is seen in the preceding verse, "when his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness;" "when my children were about me, when I washed my steps with butter." The Psalmist also is speaking of the prosperity of those who fear the Lord. To say the secret of the king is with such a person, is a strong way of describing the intimacy which exists between them. "Take care how you accuse him to the great man, because his secret is with him." "Alas! alas! his secret is no longer with me; his lamp no longer shines in my heart."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 6. When I washed my steps with butter, and the rock poured me out rivers of oil.

Bottles of goat-skin, with the hairy side inwards, receive the milk of their flocks; and when they wish to make butter, they put the cream into a goat-skin, prepared in the same manner, which they suspend in their tents, and then pressing it to and fro, in one uniform direction, quickly produce a separation of the unctuous from the whey part of the fluid. In the Levant, they tread upon the skin with their feet, which produces the same effect. The last method of separating the butter from the milk, perhaps may throw light upon a passage in Job, of some difficulty: "When I washed my steps with butter, and the rock poured me out rivers of oil." Commentators have observed, what must be obvious to every reader, that the afflicted patriarch meant to say, he once possessed great abundance of these products; but they have not been able to account for the manner of his expression. The way of a great personage was sometimes swept, sometimes strewed with flowers, sometimes watered; but never, as far as we know, moistened with butter. The feet were sometimes anointed with oil, in which odoriferous substances had been infused; but to them, butter was never applied. It is more natural to suppose, that these words of Job referred to the method of churning their milk, by treading upon large skins full of cream, with their bare feet. It conveys a still more lively idea of the exuberant plenty which Job once possessed, if this method was adopted when they had large quantities of milk to churn. A variety of practice very similar to this appears to have prevailed in the ancient vineyards. When a small quantity of grapes was to be pressed, it seems to have been done with the hand; for Pharaoh's butler dreamed that he took the grapes and pressed them in this manner into his master's cup. This, it must be admitted, was only a visionary scene; but we must suppose it corresponded with general custom. So, when they meant to churn a small quantity of cream, they suspended it in a skin, from the roof of the tent; and the female part of the family conducted the process. But when the quantity was very large, as it must have been in the extensive dairies of the patriarchs, who possessed such immense flocks and herds, it was put into a number of skins, and churned by the feet of men. This Mr. Harmer considers as no improbable account, and by no means an unnatural explanation of the phrase, "I washed my steps with butter;" and in the present state of our knowledge, perhaps a more satisfactory one cannot be given. Greece, indeed, lies at a great distance from the land of Uz, and the age when Job flourished is far removed from our times; but as a skin is still the churning vessel used by the Arabs in the Holy Land, as well as in Barbary, and consequently, as their customs admit of little or no variation, the use of skins in churning must belong to a very remote antiquity. And the same reason that might induce the more opulent Greeks, in the time of Chandler, to tread their cream, rather than swing it in the tent, or between two poles, as the Arabs generally do, might also induce the richer proprietors in Asia, who possessed such numerous flocks, to adopt the same custom. The expression, it must be allowed, is highly figurative, but not more so than many others, in which the oriental muse delights. The term washing, when used poetically, is not surely confined to cleansing the feet, by some purifying fluid; for dipping the feet in the blood of the slain, Psalmist calls washing the feet. Hence, to plunge them into cream or butter, or to sprinkle them profusely with it, may be called washing them in butter, with equal propriety; and walking in it, washing the steps.

The butter is carried to market in the same goat-skins in which it is churned. In consequence of this mode of management, it becomes necessary to melt and strain it, in order to separate the impurities; a process by which it acquires a certain rancid taste, disagreeable, for the most part, to strangers, though not to the natives. To this custom of melting the butter, in order to clarify it, Zophar seems to allude, in his description of the state and portion of a wicked man: "He shall not see the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter." As the flowing of honey from the comb into the vessels in which it is to be kept, may, by a bold figure, be compared to a little river; so may clarified butter, when poured into the jars in which it is preserved for use. The wicked man, says Zophar, shall not see the rivulets, much less the rivers, still less the torrents of honey and butter, (as the clause ought to be rendered,) which the righteous may hope to possess. In our excellent translation, the beauty of the climax in this instance is lost; for instead of continuing to rise, it sinks in the close, ending with brook, after mentioning rivers and torrents; but in the original it is equally striking and well conducted.—PAXTON.

These are figurative expressions to denote great prosperity. "The man is so rich, he washes himself with ney," i. e. clarified butter. "Oh, the charitable man, milk and honey accompany his feet." So great was the profusion, "the honey caused the feet to slip," (in the paths,) the creepers danced, the trees nodded their heads, and milk, from the dwellings of the cattle, flowed in streams through the streets. (Scanda Parana.)—ROBERTS.

Ver. 7. When I went out to the gate, through the city, when I prepared my seat in the street.

This intimates that Job was a judge among his people, as the courts of justice in former times were kept in such situations. Who has not seen a great man or a saint thus having his seat prepared in the street? There he goes under a shady tree, or under a veranda, or in a rest-house, with his servant following him, having a mat or a tiger's skin, or that of some other animal under his arm. The seat is prepared, and the crosslegged sage sits to hear and answer questions.—ROBERTS.

Chardin says, it is the custom of Asia not to go into the shops, which are very small, but to sit down in seats prepared for the purpose on the outside, on which cushions are laid for persons of distinction; and he adds, that people of quality cause carpets and cushions to be carried wherever, they please, that they may repose themselves upon them more agreeably. To a custom of this-kind Job seems to refer in his mournful retrospect of departed prosperity: "When I went out to the gate through the city, when I prepared my seat in the street." This patriarch was a prince and a judge among his people, and was, therefore, entitled to take his seat in the gate, which was the ordinary place of hearing causes in the East, attended by a retinue of servants, with carpets and cushions for his accommodation, according to his rank, and the office he sustained.—PAXTON.

Numbers of the Southern Arabs assemble in their markets by way of amusement, and consequently, for conversation: the same custom appears anciently to have obtained, in places of the East, less remote from us than Yemen.

"Notwithstanding this external gravity," says Niebuhr, "the Arabs love a great deal of company; accordingly, one sees them assiduously assembling in the public coffee-houses, and, above all, running to fairs, in which no country, perhaps, more abounds than Yemen; since there is scarcely a village of any consideration to be found, which has not a weekly fair. When the villages are at some distance from each other, their inhabitants assemble on the appointed day in the open fields. Some come hither to buy or to sell; others, who are mechanics of various professions, employ sometimes the whole week in going from one little borough to another, in order to work at these fairs; and finally, many propose to themselves to pass away the time there more agreeably than at home. From this taste of the Arabs for society, and especially of those of Yemen, it is easy to infer that they are more civilized than it may be imagined." Michaelis, the great promoter of Niebuhr's expedition into the East, has taken notice of this passage in his extract from this work, saying, "The public places are, to this day, in Yemen, the places of diversion, and thus serve two uses; just as the gates of cities, which anciently were made their public places, as we are told in the Bible, Gen. xix. 1. Job xxix. 7. Ps. lxxix. 14," &c.—HAMMER.

Ver. 8. The young men saw me, and hid themselves: and the aged arose, and stood up
9. The princes refrained talking, and laid their hand on their mouth.

What a graphic scene is this! When a man of rank passes a crowd, the young people and children conceal themselves behind their seniors, and the aged always arise from their seats. See the man in a court of justice, who is listening to the address of the judge, and his hand is placed on his mouth. To place the hand on the mouth also denotes astonishment; and Major Laing says, when he was at Toma, in Africa, a woman was so much surprised at the sight of a white man, that she "did not stir a muscle till the whole had passed, when she gave a loud halloo of astonishment, and covered her mouth with both her hands."—ROBERTS.

This is a most elegant description, and exhibits most correctly that great reverence and respect which was paid, even by the old and decrepit, to the holy man in passing along the streets, or when he sat in public. They not only rose, which in men so old and infirm was a great mark of distinction; but they stood; they continued to do it, though even the attempt was so difficult.—LOWT.

When the easterns wish to be silent, they place their hand upon their mouth, to express their intentions by action, and their sentiments by attitude. Many instances of this practice are to be found. "In one of the subterranean vaults in Egypt, where the mummies lie buried, they found in the coffin an embalmed body of a woman, before which was placed a figure of wood, representing a youth on his knees, laying a finger on his mouth, and holding in his other hand a sort of chafingdish, which was placed on his head, and in which, without doubt, had been some perfumes." (Maillet.)

"On our taking possession of Rosetta, at an entertainment which was given, a young Greek came up to me, kissed my shoulder, and with his finger on his lips, without uttering a single syllable, slipped privately into my hand a nosegay which he had brought me: this simple demonstration completely unfolded all his sensations, and was expressive of his political situation, his fears, and his hopes." (Denon.)—BURDER.

Ver. 14. I put on righteousness, and it clothed me: my judgment was as a robe and a diadem.

See on Is. 28. 5.

Or turban. This consists of a cap and a sash of fine linen or silk, wound round the bottom of it. This is the usual headress of the Turks, Persians, Arabs, and other eastern nations. Dr. Shaw says, "The Moors and Turks, with some of the principal Arabs, wear upon the head a small hemispherical cap of scarlet cloth. The turban, as they call a long narrow web of linen, silk, or muslin, is folded round the bottom of these caps, and very properly distinguishes, by the number and fashion of these folds, the several orders and degrees of soldiers, and sometimes of citizens, one from another."—BURDER.

Ver. 15. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame.

The man who bestows great charities, is said to be the eyes of the blind, and the feet of the cripples. "True, my lord, I am blind; but you are my eyes." "Ah! sir, shall I not love my eyes?" "O king," says the lame man, "are you not my staff?" "Alas! alas! our eyes have gone," say the blind, when their benefactor is dead. But when a person confides in the wisdom of another, he says, "He is my eyes." "I have two good eyes in the temple."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 19. My root was spread out by the waters, and the dew lay all night upon my branch.

"The precious water of the Cephissus is the property of the waivode only during the season of watering the olive-wood: for the remaining months the owners of the gardens, in a proportion settled by long usage, divert the stream into their grounds, for one, two, or three hours in a week or fortnight, according to the bargain at which they have hired or purchased their land. The instant that the stream is turned into the required channel, a public inspector, who is called Dragaris-too-nen, and is always in attendance, turns his hourglass, and the gardener also measures the time in the same manner; other Greeks frequently being present to prevent collusion, and cut off the rivulet immediately at the expiration of the stipulated hour."—(Hobhouse.)

It is well known that in the hot eastern countries, where it rarely rains during the summer months, the copious dews which fall there during the night, contribute greatly to the nourishment of vegetables in general. "This dew," says Hasselquist, speaking of the excessively hot weather in Egypt, "is particularly serviceable to the trees, which would otherwise never be able to resist this heat; but with this assistance they thrive well, and blossom and ripen their fruit."—BURDER.

CHAPTER XXX.

Ver. 2. Yea, whereto might the strength of their hands profit me, in whom old age was perished?

The Tamul translation has this, "as the strength of the hands being gone by old age." Of a man who has become weak in consequence of age, it is said, "Ah! by reason of old age, the strength of his hands has departed from him." "It is true he is an old man, but the strength of his hand has not perished." But this mode of expression also refers to a man's circumstances. Thus, when a person has lost his property, it is said, "the strength of his hands has gone." "Poor man! he has not any strength in his hands."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 3. For want and famine they were solitary; fleeing into the wilderness in former time desolate and waste: 4. Who cut up mallows by the bushes, and juniper-roots for their meat.

This describes the ignoble state of the parents of those children by whom Job was now held in derision. In the book called Sinhā Manni, there is an account of some princesses, who once had their rice, like jasmine flowers, given them on golden plates; but now they had to go with pots, to beg for the leaves from the hedges for their daily food. A rich man brought to poverty, sometimes asks, "What care I? Can I not go into the desert, and live on roots and leaves?" It is a fact, that numbers do thus live, especially the Vedahs, and those who have retired from men.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 6. To dwell in the cliffs of the valleys, in caves of the earth, and in the rocks.

The oriental shepherd and his family sometimes take up their abode in caves, with which the country, particularly about Askelon, abounds. These caverns are often so capacious as to admit the master and his whole property. In times of imminent danger, the people forsake their towns and villages, and retire with their wives and children, their flocks and herds, into these dark recesses, which have been from time immemorial the refuge of the oppressed. It was in these hiding-places that Baldwin I, King of Jerusalem, in the barbarous age of the crusades, found the inhabitants of many villages, with their flocks and their herds, who had favoured the cause of his enemies, and fled at his approach. In Egypt, such excavations appear to have been the settled abodes of a numerous and peaceful population. Dr. Richardson entered several mountain defiles, on his way to Nubia, where he found "a number of excavations extremely well executed, covered with sculpture, and painted in the most brilliant colours; likewise a number of pits sunk perpendicularly into the rock, all of which have been used as burying-places, and many of them still contain handsome mummy cases, made of wood and stone, beautifully painted in a variety of colours, and covered with curious devices." But besides these, "high up in the front, along the base of the mountain, and over the rocky flat, all the way from Medina Thabou, there are innumerable excavations, many of them large and beautifully formed, painted, and sculptured with many curious devices, illustrative of ancient customs. In one place above Medina Thabou, the doors into these excavations are so numerous and so contiguous, that they resemble a row of houses in a village. They have a long piazza in front, and a large apartment within; and a long shaft running back into the rock. They rise in tiers above each other, according to the different elevations of the mountain. They have evidently been dwellinghouses, and, from the shady piazza in front, the spectator enjoys the most delightful view that can possibly be obtained of the plain of Thebes." In Hindostan, too, the fainting inhabitants are forced to escape from the severe fervours of an eastern noon, into vast artificial caverns, and into grottoes of the most refreshing coolness, which the great and the wealthy cause to be constructed in their gardens.—PAXTON.

Ver. 16. And now my soul is poured out upon me: the days of affliction have taken hold upon me.

"Why are you so dejected, my friend?" "Because the ket-takālam, i. e. the ruinous time, has caught me."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 20. I cry unto thee, and thou dost not hear me: I stand up, and thou regardest me not.

It is extremely mortifying, when a man stands up, not to be noticed. A native gentleman had a case which he wished to bring before the notice of the king of Tanjore, and asked my advice how to act. I recommended him to go to the capital, and wait upon his majesty. On his return, he informed me he had not stated his case to the king; and, upon my blaming him, he asked, "What could I do? I went to a place where I knew he would have to pass; and when he came near, I stood up; but he regarded me not."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 22. Thou liftest me up to the wind; thou caust me to ride upon it, and dissolvst my substance.

This figure is probably taken from the custom of an angry man, who takes any light substance and throws it into the wind, saying to his antagonist, "Thus shall it be with thee."—ROBERTS.

There is a remarkable figurative representation in Job, chap. xxx. 22, thus rendered in our translation: "Thou liftest me up to the wind; thou caust me to ride upon it, and dissolvst my substance." Possibly after we have examined the phraseology of this passage, its force may be further evident, and it may receive additional illustration.

"Thou dost raise me up on high, into the air, by the agency—of—upon—the wind; thou dost make me to ride on it, as on a chariot, or other vehicle; and dost dissolve—disperse—dissipate—my whole—entire—MY ALL: all that I ever was: all that I ever possessed." Such is the power of the original.

This might perhaps be referred to a vapour raised by the wind, which, after being borne about among the clouds, is dissolved, and falls in dew; but, (1.) the wind which raises it, seems rather to describe a storm, and during storms dew does not perceptibly rise. (2.) The current of wind, which, like a chariot, bears away the subject of its power, is a vehement, powerful, rapid blast; as we say, a high wind; and does not agree with the formation, &c. of dew, which is a tranquil, deliberate process. (3.) The word (מֵגֶג) megeg, is applied to express the melting of a solid body; as of the earth with rain, Psalm lxx. 10; of the hills, through intense heat, Nahum i. 5; so Amos ix. 13. Mr. Scott has rendered the passage—

Roused by Almighty force a furious storm—
Upcaught me, whirl'd me on its eddy'ng gust,
Then dash'd me down, and shatter'd me to dust.

Under these considerations, we presume to think the reader will agree with us in referring it to a sandstorm; possibly such as we have noticed in the former number; or, much rather, such as is described by the following information, which the reader will not be displeas'd to peruse, as it stands high among the most picturesque and most terrific descriptions of the kind to be met with. It is from Mr. Bruce.

"On the 14th, at seven in the morning, we left Assa Nagga, our course being due north. At one o'clock we alighted among some acacia-trees, at Waadi el Halboub, having gone twenty-one miles. We were here at once surprised and terrified by a sight surely one of the most magnificent in the world. In that vast expanse of desert, from W. and to N. W. of us, we saw a number of prodigious pillars of sand, at different distances, at times moving with great celerity, at others stalking on with a majestic slowness; at intervals we thought they were coming in a very few minutes to overwhelm us; and small quantities of sand did actually more than once reach us. Again they would retreat so as to be almost out of sight, their tops reaching to the very clouds. There the tops often separated from the bodies; and these, once disjoined, dispersed in the air, and did not appear more. Sometimes they were broken near the middle, as if struck with a large cannon shot. About noon they began to advance with considerable swiftness upon us, the wind being very strong at north. Eleven of them ranged alongside of us about the distance of three miles. The greatest diameter of the largest appeared to me at that distance as if it would measure ten feet. They retired from us with a wind at S. E. leaving an impression upon my mind to which I can give no name, though surely one ingredient in it was fear, with a considerable deal of wonder and astonishment. It was in vain to think of flying; the swiftest horse, or fastest sailing ship, could be of no use to carry us out of this danger, and the full persuasion of this riveted me as if to the spot, where I stood, and let the camels gain on me so much in my state of lameness, that it was with some difficulty I could overtake them.

"The whole of our company were much disheartened, (except Idris,) and imagined that they were advancing into whirlwinds of moving sand, from which they should never be able to extricate themselves; but before four o'clock in the afternoon, these phantoms of the plain had all of them fallen to the ground, and disappeared. In the evening we came to Waadi Dimokea, where we passed the night, much disheartened, and our fear more increased, when we found, upon waking in the morning, that one side was perfectly buried in the sand that the wind had blown above us in the night. The sun shining through the pillars, which were thicker, and contained more sand apparently than any of the preceding days, seemed to give those nearest us an appearance as if spotted with stars of gold. I do not think at any time they seemed to be nearer than two miles. The most remarkable circumstance was, that the sand seemed to keep in that vast circular space surrounded by the Nile on our left, in going round by Chaigie towards Dongola, and seldom was observed much to the eastward of a meridian passing along the Nile through the Magiran, before it takes that turn; whereas the simoon was always on the opposite side of our course, coming upon us from the southeast. The same appearance of moving pillars of sand presented themselves to us this day in form and disposition like those we had seen at Waadi Halboub, only they seemed to be more in number, and less in size. They came several times in a direction close upon us; that is, I believe, within less than two miles. They began, immediately after sunrise, like a thick wood, and almost darkened the sun: his rays shining through them for near an hour, gave them an appearance of pillars of fire."

If my conjecture be admissible, we now see a magnificence in this imagery, not apparent before: we see how Job's dignity might be exalted in the air; might rise to great grandeur, importance, and even terror, in the sight of beholders; might ride upon the wind, which bears it about, causing it to advance, or to recede; and, after all, the wind diminishing, might disperse, dissipate, melt, scatter this pillar of sand, into the undistinguished level of the desert. This comparison seems to be precisely adapted to the mind of an Arab, who must have seen, or have been informed of similar phenomena in the countries around him.—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

Ver. 23. For I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living.

Those expressions in which the grave is described as the house appointed for all living; the long home of man; and the everlasting habitation; are capable of much illustration from antiquity. Montfaucon says, "We observed in the fifth volume of our Antiquity a tomb styled quiesorium, a resting-place. Quiescere, to rest, is often said of the dead in epitaphs. Thus we find in an ancient writer, a man speaking of his master, who had been long dead and buried, cujus ossa bene quiescant; may his bones rest in peace. We have an instance of the like kind in an inscription in Gruter, (p. 696,) and in another, (p. 594,) fecit sibi quiesorium, he made himself a resting-place. This resting-place is called frequently, too, an eternal house. In his lifetime he built himself an eternal house, says one epitaph. He made himself an eternal house with his patrimony, says another. He thought it better (says another) to build himself an eternal house, than to desire his heirs to do it. They thought it a misfortune when the bones and ashes of the dead were removed from their place, as imagining the dead suffered something by the removal of their bones. This notion occasioned all those precautions used for the safety of their tombs, and the curses they laid on those who removed them."—BURDER.

Ver. 25. Did not I weep for him that was in trouble? was not my soul grieved for the poor?

Hebrew, "Should I not then weep for the ruthless day?" The meaning of the preceding verse having been generally misunderstood, that of the present, and, indeed, of the greater part of the remainder of the chapter, which follows consecutively, has been misunderstood also. The exquisite pathos of this interrogative must wind itself into the heart of every reader. The expression, "for the ruthless day," is peculiarly forcible in the original, יָמֵי מָוֶת, "for the stern, rigid, immovable, pitiless, or inexorable day." In the latter clause of this verse, we may understand the Hebrew to signify, "for the rock," not "for the poor," as given by all the translators. The term indeed (סֶלַע) admits of both these senses; but the latter is obviously the true sense in the present place; and for want of attending to this circumstance, the meaning of the passage has been utterly lost: "Should not my soul pine for the marble tomb, or sepulchral rock," in which it was usual to deposit the bodies of all those of higher rank and condition in life; "for the rock of stony recess of darkness and death-shade," as mentioned in ch. xxviii. 3, in which the same term is used, and rendered by every one in the sense now offered.—GOON.

Ver. 27. My bowels boiled, and rested not; the days of affliction prevented me.

People in great distress often say, "My belly, my belly is on fire." "Who will take away this fire?" In cursing each other, "Wretch! thou shalt soon have a fire in thy belly." "Now they are beginning to errikuter," i. e. burn. "Ashes! ashes! thou art all ashes!"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 29. I am a brother to dragons, and a companion to owls.

See on Mic. i. 8.

Dr. Boothroyd prefers, "A brother am I to sea-monsters." Dr. Harris says, the original is variously rendered; dragons, serpents, sea-monsters, and whales. The Tamul trans-lamb has it, "I am a brother to the mali-pambu," i. e. the rock snake, or boc constrictor; and wherever the term dragon occurs, (in that translation,) it is rendered in the same way. Some of these serpents are of immense size, and possess great muscular power. If they once get folded round the body of an animal, it is impossible for it to escape. A gentleman of my acquaintance, when on a shooting excursion, heard a sudden scream; he ran to the spot, and saw a beautiful deer in the embrace of one of these serpents: he took his rifle, and put a ball through its head; its folds instantly became loose, and the deer was set at liberty, but died soon after. He brought the reptile home, and it measured eighteen feet. I know not what induced the translators thus to render it by the name of that monster, except they have taken the idea from the prophets Micah, and Jeremiah: "I will make a wailing like the dragons," and, "they snuffed up wind like dragons;" as the mali-pambu is said to make a dreadful wailing in the night, and when in want of prey, to inhale the wind for food. The sacred writers also describe it as loving to dwell in desert places, which is another feature of its character.—ROBERTS.

When the ancient Hebrews observed the dragons erect, and with expanded jaws fetching a deep inspiration, they interpreted the circumstance as if these animals, with their eyes lifted up to heaven, complained to their Maker of their miserable condition, that, hated by all creatures, and confined to the burning and sterile deserts, they dragged out a tedious and miserable existence. It was perhaps to some idea of this kind that Job referred, when, bemoaning the hardness of his lot, he complained: "I am a brother to dragons, and a companion of owls." He was unable to associate with mankind; cut off from the comforts of life, and doomed to wear out the rest of his days in poverty and wretchedness. The prophet Micah has the same allusion, in the day of his adversity, to the habits of that reptile: "I will make a wailing like the dragons, and mourning as the owls." He may refer also to its hissing, which Elian says is so loud that it alarms and terrifies every creature within hearing.—PAXTON.

Ver. 31. My harp also is turned to mourning, and my organ into the voice of them that weep.

The people of the East are very fond of the yäl, or guitar, also of the binaru, or harp. When a person is in trouble, his instrument is also considered to be in sorrow. Many stories are told of the fascinating powers of the ancient musicians. "There was once a man who neglected all his affairs for the sake of his instrument: at which his wife became much dissatisfied, and asked him, in a taunting way, 'Will you ever gain a tusked elephant and a kingdom by your harp?' He was displeased with her, and said, 'I will.' He then went to the king of Kandy, and on his harp asked his majesty for a tusked elephant and a kingdom. The king was so delighted, that he gave him the elephant and the province of Jaffna. The musician then returned, and founded the town of Yäl-Pänam," i. e. the harp and the songster; or, as some render it, the harp-town, which we call Jaffna.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Ver. 1. I made a covenant with mine eyes; why then should I think upon a maid?

Has a man a strong desire to go on a pilgrimage to a distant temple, and should his friends remonstrate with him, he will say, "I have made a udam-puddiki," (i. e. a covenant with my eyes); "I must go." Does a father reprove his son for improper conduct, he replies, "What can I do? She has made a covenant with my eyes." "My friend, let us have your opinion on this subject."—"I will not." "Why?"—"Because I have made a covenant with my mouth."—ROBERTS.

In Barbary, when the ladies appear in public, they always fold themselves up so closely in their bykes, that even without their veils one can discover very little of their faces. But in the summer months, when they retire to their country-seats, they walk abroad with less caution; though even then, on the approach of a stranger, they always drop their veils, as Rebecca did on the approach of Isaac. But although they are so closely wrapped up, that those who look at them cannot even see their hands, still less their face, yet it is reckoned indecent in a man to fix his eyes upon them; he must let them pass without seeming at all to observe them. An allusion to this rigorous custom, Job says, "I made a covenant with mine eyes; why then should I think upon a maid?" When a lady of distinction, says Hanway, travels on horseback, she is not only veiled, but has generally a servant, who runs or rides before her, to clear the way; and on such occasions, the men, even in the market-places, always turn their backs till the women are passed, it being thought the highest ill manners to look at them.—PAXTON.

Ver. 17. Or have eaten my morsel myself alone, and the fatherless hath not eaten thereof.

It is a very customary, and a very desirable thing in the East, to eat under the shade of trees; and this situation the inhabitants seem to prefer, to taking their repasts in their tents or dwellings: so De la Roque tells us, (p. 203,) "We did not arrive at the foot of the mountain till after sunset, and it was almost night when we entered the plain; but as it was full of villages, mostly inhabited by Maronites, we entered into the first we came to, to pass the night there. It was the priest of the place who wished to receive us; he gave us a supper under the trees, before his little dwelling. As we were at table, there came by a stranger, wearing a white turban, who, after having saluted the company, sat himself down to the table, without ceremony; ate with us during some time, and then went away, repeating several times the name of God. They told us it was some traveller, who, no doubt, stood in need of refreshment, and who had profited by the opportunity, according to the custom of the East, which is to exercise hospitality at all times, and towards all persons."

The reader will be pleased to see the ancient hospitality of the East still maintained, and even a stranger profiting by an opportunity of supplying his wants. It reminds us of the guests of Abraham, (Gen. chap. xviii.) of the conduct of Job, (chap. xxxi. 17,) and especially, perhaps, of that frankness with which the apostles of Christ were to enter into a man's house after a salutation, and there to continue "eating and drinking such things as were set before them," Luke x. 7. Such behaviour would be considered as extremely intrusive, and indeed insupportable, among ourselves; but the maxims of the East would qualify that, as they do many other customs, by local proprieties, on which we are incompetent to determine.—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

Ver. 22. Then let mine arm fall from my shoulder-blade, and mine arm be broken from the bone.

It is said, "If I have done as you say, may these legs be broken." "Yes, let these eyes be blind, if I have seen the thing you mention." "May this body wither and faint, if I am guilty of that crime." "If I uttered that expression, then let the worms eat out this tongue."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 26. If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, 27. And my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand: 28. This also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge: for I should have denied the God that is above.

To kiss the hand and place it on the head, is a token of respect less revolting to our minds, than some of those which have been mentioned. An Oriental pays his respects to a person of superior station, by kissing his hand, and putting it to his forehead; but if the superior be of a condescending temper, he will snatch away his hand, as soon as the other has touched it; then the inferior puts his own fingers to his lips, and afterward to his forehead. It seems, according to Pits, to be a common practice among the Mohammedans, that when they cannot kiss the hand of a superior, they kiss their own, and put it to their forehead; thus also they venerate an unseen being, whom they cannot touch. But the custom existed long before the age of Mohammed; for in the same way the ancient idolaters worshipped their distant or unseen deities. "If," said Job, "I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, and my heart hath been secretly enticed, and my mouth hath kissed my hand, this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge; for I should have denied the God that is above." Had the afflicted man done this, in the case to which he refers, it would have been an idolatrous action, although it is exactly agreeable to the civil expressions of respect which obtained in his country, and over all the East.—PAXTON.

Ver. 32. The stranger did not lodge in the street; but I opened my doors to the traveller.

No people can be more kind and hospitable to travellers of their own caste, than those of the East; and even men of the lower grades have always places to go to. See the stranger enter the premises; he looks at the master and says, paratheise, i. e. a pilgrim, and he is allowed to take up his abode for the night. For his entertainment, he has to repeat the puthenam, news of his country and journey, or any legend of olden time.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 35. Oh that one would hear me! behold, my desire is that the Almighty would answer me, and that mine adversary had written a book: Surely I would take it upon my shoulder, and bind it as a crown to me.

This refers to accusations against the innocent Job. A man charged of a crime which he has not committed, says, "If I am guilty, I will carry it on my head." "I am sure you have done this deed."—"I?" "Yes."—"Then will I wear it on my head." "That fellow wears his crimes on his head," i. e. he is not ashamed of them. The head is reckoned superior to all other parts of the body.—ROBERTS.

The business of book-making, it is to be presumed, had made but little progress in the days of Job, and it is not easy to see how such a performance, on the part of Job's adversary, as the writing a book, could have afforded any peculiar gratification to the afflicted man's feelings. In modern times, when such an enterprise is of all others the most hazardous, it might perhaps be a very appropriate expression of ill-will, to wish that an adversary had engaged in a publishing speculation. But in the case of Job and his maligners, we must seek for a different explication; for even had the trade of authorship been as common and as perilous in those days as it now is, we cannot but consider Job too good a man to have given vent to so bad a wish. From the context, we learn that the pious sufferer was aggrieved by the vagueness of the charges preferred against him by his harsh-judging comforters. They dealt in loose generalities, affording him no opportunity to vindicate himself by answering to a specific accusation. In the words cited, he utters the earnest wish that a definite form were given to the injurious imputations of his false friends. He would fain be summoned to a formal trial; he would have the charges booked against him, that he might know what were the aspersions which were to be wiped from his character. Such an accusation, thus definitely written, he would bear about publicly and conspicuously, that he might publicly and conspicuously confute it; he would bear it as an ornament, convinced it would, in the end, by his triumphant disproval of it, redound to the still higher honour of his innocence. That the Heb. sepher, book, may without violence be thus interpreted, is clear from Deut. xxiv. 1: "Let him write a bill of divorcement, (sepher), and give it in her hand, and send her out of his house." In the present connexion it is tantamount to a bill of indictment.—BESU.

From the following extract it appears what is the customary kind of homage which, in the East, is paid not only to sovereignty, but to communications of the sovereign's will, whether by word or letter: "When the mogul, by letters, sends his commands to any of his governors, these papers are entertained with as much respect as if himself were present; for the governor, having intelligence that such letters are coming near him, himself, with other inferior officers, rides forth to meet the patamar, or messenger, that brings them, and as soon as he sees those letters, he alights from his horse, falls down on the earth, and takes them from the messenger, and lays them on his head, whereon he binds them fast: then retiring to his place of public meeting, he reads and answers them." (Sir Thomas Roe.)—BURDER.

When Soliman ascended the throne, "the letter which was to be presented to the new monarch was delivered to the general of the slaves, contained in a purse of cloth of gold, drawn together with strings of twisted gold and silk, with tassels of the same. The general threw himself at his majesty's feet, bowing to the very ground; then rising upon his knees, he drew out of the bosom of his garment the bag containing the letter which the assembly had sent to the new monarch. Presently he opened the bag, took out the letter, kissed it, laid it to his forehead, presented it to his majesty, and then rose up." To such a custom Job evidently refers in these words: "Oh that mine adversary had written a book: surely I would take it upon my shoulder, and bind it as a crown to me," or, on my head.—PAXTON.

Ver. 38. If my land cry against me, or that the furrows likewise thereof complain.

Does a man through idleness or meanness neglect to cultivate, or water, or manure his fields and gardens, those who pass that way say, "Ah! these fields have good reason to complain against the owner." "Sir, if you defraud these fields, will they not defraud you?" "The fellow who robs his own lands, will he not rob you?" "These fields are in great sorrow, through the neglect of their owner."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 39. If I have eaten the fruits thereof without money, or have caused the owners thereof to lose their life.

Was not Job the owner of the land? Does he not say in the preceding verse my land? How then could he have caused the owners to lose their life? Dr. Boothroyd has it, "or have grieved the soul of his managers." Coverdale has it, "grieved any of the ploughmen." The Tamul has the same idea: "If I have eaten the fruits thereof without paying for the labour, or have afflicted the soul of the cultivators." Great landowners in the East do not generally cultivate their own fields: they employ men, who find all the labour, and have a certain part of the produce for their remuneration. The cultivator, if defrauded, will say, "The furrows I have made bear witness against him; they complain." Job therefore means, if the fields could complain for want of proper culture, or if he had afflicted the tiller, or eaten the produce without rewarding him for his toils, then "let thistles grow instead of wheat and cockle instead of barley."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Ver. 5. When Elihu saw that there was no answer in the mouth of these three men, then his wrath was kindled.

When men are completely confounded, when they have not a word to say in reply, it is said, "in their vayila, i. e. mouth, there is no answer."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 21. Let me not, I pray you, accept any man's person; neither let me give flattering titles unto man.

The Hebrew word here used signifies to surname, or more properly to call a person by a name which does not strictly belong to him, and that generally in compliment or flattery. Mr. Scott on this passage informs us from Pococke, that "the Arabs make court to their superiors by carefully avoiding to address them by their proper names, instead of which, they salute them with some title or epithet expressive of respect."—BURDER.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Ver. 6. Behold, I am according to thy wish in God's stead; I also am formed out of the clay.

"The body and the herb, which come from the clay, will also return to it." "The body must return to the dust, why then trouble yourself? Will it exist for an immeasurable period?"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 16. Then he openeth the ears of men, and sealeth their instruction.

It is usual to say, "I will open that fellow's ears. I will take away the covering." "Ah! will you not open your ears?"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 24. Then he is gracious unto him, and saith, Deliver him from going down to the pit; I have found a ransom.

A species of capital punishment which serves to illustrate the sacred text, is the pit into which the condemned persons were precipitated. The Athenians, and particularly the tribe Hippothontis, frequently condemned offenders to the pit. It was a dark, noisome hole, and had sharp spikes at the top, that no criminal might escape; and others at the bottom, to pierce and torment those unhappy persons that were cast in. Similar to this place was the Lacedæmonian Katadas, into which Aristomenes, the Messenian, being cast, made his escape in a very surprising manner. This mode of punishment is of great antiquity; for the speakers in the book of Job make several allusions to it. Thus, in the speech of Elihu: "He keepeth back his soul from the pit, and his life from perishing by the sword."—"Then is he gracious unto him, and saith, Deliver him from going down to the pit; I have found a ransom."—"He will deliver his soul from going down into the pit, and his life shall see the light." The allusions in the book of Psalms are numerous and interesting; thus the Psalmist prays, "Be not silent to me; lest if thou be silent to me, I become like them that go down into the pit."—"Let them be cast into deep pits, that they rise not up again." The following allusion occurs in the prophecies of Isaiah: "The captive exile hasteneth, that he may be loosed, and that he should not die in the pit, nor that his bread should fail."—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Ver. 7. What man is like Job, who drinketh up scorning like water?

Of a man who does not care for contempt or hatred, it is said, "He drinks up their hatred like water." When a man is every way superior to his enemies, "Ah! he drinks them up like water." "He is a man of wonderful talents, for he drinks up science as water." Thus, Elihu wished to show that Job had hardened himself, and was insensible to scorn, for he had swallowed it as water.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Ver. 3. I will fetch my knowledge from afar, and will ascribe righteousness to my Maker.

There is something in our nature which places superior importance on any thing which comes from afar. When a man has to contend with a person who is very learned, should a friend express a doubt as to the result, or advise him to take great care, he will say, "Fear not, reggutoor-tita, from very far I will fetch my arguments." "The arguments which are afar off, shall now be brought near." "Well, sir, since you press me, I will fetch my knowledge from afar."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Ver. 6. For he saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth; likewise to the small rain, and to the great rain of his strength.

In the East Indies the commencement and the breaking of the monsoons are generally very severe; the rain descends in the most astonishing torrents. In a few hours the inhabitants find themselves in a liquid plain. The high and the low grounds are equally covered, and exhibit the appearance of an immense lake, and surrounded by thick darkness, which prevents them from distinguishing a single object, except such as the vivid glare of lightning displays in horrible forms. In the winter months the mountain floods swell the small rivers of India in a wonderful manner. Within a few hours they often rise twenty or thirty feet above their usual height, and run with astonishing rapidity; and the larger rivers, before gentle and pellucid, are then furious and destructive, sweeping away whole villages, with their inhabitants and cattle while tigers and other furious animals from the wilds join the general wreck, and unite their horrid voices with the cries of old men and helpless women, and the shrieks of their expiring children, in its passage to the ocean. It is in such a scene that the beauty of Elihu's speech to Job, in which he mentions "the great rain of his strength," are properly understood. Even in the milder climate of Judea, the rains pour down three or four days and nights together, as vehemently as if they would drown the country, sweeping away in their furious course the produce of the field, and the soil on which it grew, the flocks and herds, and human dwellings, with their hapless inmates, in one promiscuous ruin. Far different are the feelings awakened in the mind, by the sight of a majestic, pure, and quiet river, on whose verdant pastures the flocks repose, or drink, without alarm or danger, of its flowing waters. So full of majesty and gentleness, neither alarming the fears, endangering the safety, nor encouraging the carelessness of genuine Christians, are the consolations of true religion. So the Psalmist felt, when he selected the loveliest image in the natural world to convey an idea of the rich and ample provision which the divine bounty has made for man: "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters."—PAXTON.

Ver. 7. He sealeth up the hand of every man, that all men may know his work.

Has a man something in his hand which he does not wish to show to another, he says, "My hand is sealed." Of a gentleman who is very benevolent, it is said, "His hand is sealed for charity only." "Please, sir, give me this."—"What! is my hand sealed to give to all?"—"What secret was that which Tambo told you last evening?"—"I cannot answer; my mouth is sealed." "That man never forgets an injury."—"No, no, he seals it in his mind." A husband who has full confidence in his wife, says, "I have sealed her." Canticles iv. 12. To seal a person, therefore, is to secure him, and prevent others from injuring him.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Ver. 3. Gird up now thy loins like a man; for I will demand of thee, and answer thou me.

"Well, Tamby, you have a difficult task before you: gird up your loins." "Come, help me to gird this sati, i. e. mantle, or shawl, round my loins; I have a long way to run." "Poor fellow! he soon gave it up; his loins were not well girded."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 14. It is turned as clay to the seal; and they stand as a garment.

The birds pillage the granary of Joseph extremely, where the corn of Egypt is deposited that is paid as a tax to the grand seignior, for it is quite uncovered at the top, there being little or no rain in that country; its doors however are kept carefully sealed, but its inspectors do not make use of wax upon this occasion, but put their seal upon a handful of clay, with which they cover the lock of the door. This serves instead of wax; and it is visible, things of the greatest value might be safely sealed up in the same manner. Had Junius known this circumstance, or had he at least reflected on it, he would not perhaps have explained Job xxxviii. 14. It is turned as clay to the seal, of the potters adorning clay with various paintings, or various embossings; especially had he considered, that the productions of the wheel of the potter, in the age and the country of Job, were, in all probability, very clumsy, unadorned things, since even still in Egypt, the ancient source of arts, the ewer, which is made, according to Norden, very clumsy, is one of the best pieces of earthenware that they have there, all the art of the potter, in that country, consisting in an ability to make some vile pots or dishes, without varnish.—HARMER.

Ver. 16. Hast thou entered into the springs of the sea? or hast thou walked in the search of the depth?

To a vain boasting fellow it is said, "Yes, yes; the sea is only knee-deep to thee." "It is all true; thou hast measured the sea."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 34. Canst thou lift up thy voice to the clouds, that abundance of waters may cover thee?
35. Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go, and say unto thee, Here we are?

This probably refers to thunder, and its effects in producing rain. It is said, "Why, fellow, are you making such a noise? Are you going to shake the clouds? Is it rain you are going to produce?" "What is all this noise about? Is it rain you want?" "Cease, cease your roaring; the rain will not come." "Listen to that elephant, rain is coming."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 39. Wilt thou hunt the prey for the lions?
or fill the appetite of the young lions?

To a man who is boasting of the speed of his foot, or his prowess, it is said, "Yes, there is no doubt thou wilt hunt the prey for the tiger." When a person does a favour for a cruel man, it is asked, "What! give food to the tiger?" "O yes; give milk to the serpent." "Here comes the sportsman; he has been hunting prey for the tiger."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Ver. 1. Knowest thou the time when the wild goats of the rock bring forth? or canst thou mark when the hinds do calve?

It is well known that the hind goes with young eight months, and brings forth her fawn in the beginning of autumn. Why then does Jehovah address these interrogations to Job: "Knowest thou the time when the wild goats of the rock bring forth? Or canst thou mark when the hinds do calve? Canst thou number the months that they fulfil? Or knowest thou the time when they bring forth?" Could Job be ignorant of circumstances which were obvious to all the shepherds in the East, who had numerous opportunities of observing the habits and manners of these creatures? It is obvious that Jehovah could not refer to the mere speculative knowledge of these facts, but to that which is proper to himself, by which he not only knows, but also directs and governs all things. This is confirmed by the use of the verb (שמר) shamar, which signifies to observe, to keep, or to guard: "Knowest thou the time when the wild goats bring forth, the parturition of the hinds dost thou guard? Without the protecting care of God, who upholds all his works by the word of his power, the whole race of these timid creatures would soon be destroyed by the violence of wild beasts, or the arts of the hunter. It is with great propriety, says one of the ancients, that Jehovah demands, "The birth of the hinds dost thou guard?" for, since this animal is always in flight, and with fear and terror always leaping and skipping about, she could never bring her young to maturity without such a special protection. The providence of God, therefore, is equally conspicuous in the preservation of the mother and the fawn; both are the objects of his compassion and tender care; and consequently, that afflicted man had no reason to charge his Maker with unkindness, who condescends to watch over the goats and the hinds.—PAXTON.

Ver. 3. They bow themselves, they bring forth their young ones, they cast out their sorrows.

4. Their young ones are in good liking, they grow up with corn; they go forth, and return not unto them.

The hind has no sooner brought forth her fawn, than the pain she suffered is forgotten: "They bow themselves" to bring forth their young ones, "they cast out their sorrows." These words must forcibly remind the reader of the maternal pains and joys of a higher order of beings: "A woman, when she is in travail, hath sorrow, because her hour is come: but as soon as she is delivered of the child, she remembereth no more the anguish, for joy that a man is born into the world." It is added, "Their young ones are in good liking, they grow up with corn; they go forth, and return not unto them." Though they are brought forth in sorrow, and have no human owner to provide for their wants, and to guard them from danger, yet, after being suckled a while, they become vigorous and active, and shift for themselves in the open fields. They grow up with corn, says our translation; but the fawn is not commonly fed in the cornfield, because it lives in the deserts, and frequents these places which are far remote from the cultivated field. Besides, in Arabia, where Job flourished, the harvest is reaped in the months of March and April, long before the hinds bring forth their young. The fawn, therefore, does not thrive with corn, but with the few shrubs and hardy plants which grow in the wilderness or open country. But the inspired writer has committed no mistake; the original phrase is capable of another translation, which perfectly corresponds with the condition of that animal, in those parts of the world. In Chaldee, the word (בבר) babar, or (בבר) babara, is evidently the same as the Hebrew (בבר) bahouts. Thus in Laban's address to Jacob, when he arrived in Padanaram, "Why standest thou without," the Hebrew word is (בבר) bahouts; and in Jonathan and Onkelos it is (בבר) babara. The same remark applies to a text in the book of Exodus: "If he rise again and walk abroad upon his staff;" in Hebrew (בבר) bahouts; in Chaldee, (בבר) babara. Hence, the phrase may be translated, They grow up without, or in the open field. Many other instances might be specified, but these are sufficient to establish the justice of the remark. Even the Hebrew phrase itself is translated by Schultens, "in the open field," which is indisputably the sense of the passage under consideration. Thus, when the fawn is calved, it grows up in the desert, under the watchful providence of God; it soon forsakes the spot where it was brought forth, and suckled by the dam, and returns no more.—PAXTON.

Ver. 5. Who hath sent out the wild ass free? or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass?

6. Whose house I have made the wilderness, and the barren land his dwellings. 7. He scorneth the multitude of the city, neither regardeth he the crying of the driver. 8. The range of the mountains is his pasture, and he searcheth after every green thing.

This animal was called ovos asynios, among the Greeks, and onager by the Romans. Some natural historians consider it as a different species from the tame and domestic ass; but others, among whom is the celebrated Buffon, affirm, that it differs from its unhappy relation only in those particulars which are the proper effects of independence and liberty. Although more elegantly shaped, the general form of its body is the same; but in temper and manners it is extremely dissimilar. Intended to fill a higher place in the kingdom of nature, than its abject and enslaved brother, it exhibits endowments which, in all ages, have commanded the admiration of every observer. Animated by an unconquerable love of liberty, this high-spirited animal submits his neck with great reluctance to the yoke of man; extremely jealous of the least restraint, he shuns the inhabited country, and steadily rejects all the delicacies it has to offer. His chosen haunt is the solitary and inhospitable desert, where he roves at his ease, exulting in the possession of unrestrained freedom. These are not accidental nor acquired traits in his character; but instincts, implanted by the hand of his Maker, that are neither to be extinguished nor modified by length of time, nor change of circumstances. To this wild and unamenable temper, Jehovah himself condescends to direct the attention of Job, when he answered him out of the whirlwind, and said: "Who hath sent out the wild ass free? or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass? whose house I have made the wilderness, and the barren land his dwellings. He scorneth the multitude of the city, neither regardeth he the crying of the driver. The range of the mountains is his pasture, and he searcheth after every green thing."

The proper name of this animal in the Hebrew language, is (מר) para, a term which, according to some writers, is expressive of its extreme suspicion. It is employed by Moses to denote the wild and untractable disposition of Ishmael and his descendants; and by Zophar, to characterize a vain, self-righteous, and obstinate person. In accordance with this idea, the noun furnishes a verb in the Hiphil form, which signifies to act as wildly as the onager. Others derive the noun from a Chaldee verb, which signifies to run with great swiftness; and every writer, ancient and modern, who has treated of this animal, has attested the wonderful celerity with which it flies over the desert. According to Leo Africanus, the wild ass yields only to the horses of Barbary; and Xenophon avers, in his Anabasis, that it outruns the fleetest horses. It has feet like the whirlwind, says Oppian; Ælian asserts, that it seems as if it were carried forward by wings like a bird.

These testimonies are confirmed by Professor Gmelin, who saw numerous troops of them in the deserts of Great Tartary, and says, The onagers are animals adapted to running, and of such swiftness, that the best horses cannot equal them. Relying on its extraordinary powers, it frequently mocks the pursuit of the hunter; and in the striking description of its Creator, "Scorneth the multitude of the city," that invade its retreats, and seek its destruction. It laughs (as the original term properly signifies) at their numbers and their speed, and seems to take a malicious pleasure in disappointing their hopes. Xenophon states, that the onagers in Mesopotamia, when pursued on horseback, will stop suddenly in the midst of their career, till the hunters approach, and then dart away with surprising velocity; and again stop, as if inviting them to make another effort to overtake them, but immediately dart away again like an arrow shot from a bow: indeed, it would be impossible for men to take them, without the assistance of art. "We gave chase," says Mr. Morier, "to two wild asses, but which had so much the speed of our horses, that when they had got at some distance, they stood still and looked behind at us, snorting with their noses in the air, as if in contempt of our endeavours to catch them." The hunters, however, often lie in wait for them at the ponds of brackish water, to which they resort to drink; or take them alive by means of concealed pits, half filled with plants and branches of trees, to lessen the creature's fall. At other times the chase is continued by relays of fresh horses, which the hunters mount as the others are exhausted, till the strength of the animal is so completely worn out, that it can be easily overtaken.

The wild ass, unsocial in his temper, and impatient of restraint, frequents the solitary wilderness, and the vast inhospitable desert, the salt marsh, and the mountain range. This is the scene adapted to his nature and instincts, and his proper domain allotted to him by the author of his being. We are not left to infer this fact from the manners and habits of the animal; Jehovah himself has attested it in these terms: "Whose house I have made the wilderness, and the barren land his dwellings." He who made the wild ass free, and loosed his hands, provides a habitation for him in the desert, where the voice of man is not heard, nor a human dwelling meets his eye. But every desert is not equally to his liking; it is the barren or salt land in which he delights. So grateful is salt to his taste, that he uniformly prefers brackish water to fresh, and selects for his food those plants that are impregnated with saline particles, or that have bitter juices. He therefore retires from the cultivated or fertile regions, not merely to be free from the domination of man, but to enjoy the pasture which is agreeable to his instincts. "The multitude," or the abundance of the city," he despises for the salt or bitter leaf on the sandy waste."

Into such a state of desolation and sterility was the inheritance of God's ancient people reduced, by the arms of Nebuchadnezzar: "Upon the land of my people shall come up thorns and briers, yea, upon all the houses of joy in the joyous city: because the palaces shall be forsaken, the multitude of the city shall be left, the forts and towers shall be dens for ever, a joy of wild asses, a pasture of flocks." A more affecting picture can scarcely be conceived; the depopulated fields and ruined cities of a country once flowing with milk and honey, were to become the favourite haunts of those shy creatures "for ever," or during the long period of seventy years. "Until the spirit" should be poured upon them from on high, from the beginning to the end of the captivity, a tedious and irksome period to the unhappy captives, were the wild asses to stray through their barren fields, and repose in their deserted houses, undisturbed by the presence of man. But the pride and charity of their oppressor were soon visited with corresponding punishment. He was deprived of reason, which he had so greatly abused, and by the violence of his disorder, "driven from the sons of men, and his heart was made like the beasts; and his dwelling was with the wild asses," in the salt land and frightful desert. He seems to have been divested of every thing human but the form; irrational and sensual, he was guided solely by his animal propensities. Nor was he longer able to distinguish what was becoming or agreeable, even to the animal nature of man; every desire and appetite was become so brutish, that he felt no wish to associate with beings of his own kind, but lived with the beasts, and fed in their pasture.

Some respectable writers have considered the onager as a solitary creature, refusing to associate even with those of his own species, because he shuns the presence of man, and frequents the most frightful solitudes. But this hasty opinion is completely refuted by the testimony of modern travellers, the nomadic hordes of Tartary, and the trading companies of Bukharia. From their accounts we learn that the wild asses are still very numerous in the deserts of Great Tartary, and come annually in great herds, which spread themselves in the mountainous deserts to the north and east of Lake Aral. Here they pass the summer, and assemble in the autumn by hundreds, and even by thousands, in order to return in company to their former retreats in the mountains of Northern Asia. The gregarious character of the wild ass is not in reality contradicted by the prophet in these words: "For they are gone up to Assyria, a wild ass alone by himself: Ephraim hath hired lovers." In this passage he describes the perverse and untractable dispositions of Ephraim, and the certain destruction to which their obstinacy exposed them. A wild ass alone, they were by their foolish conduct ready to become a prey to the destroyer. But it is rather the king of Assyria, than the ten tribes, whom he compares to that animal. Instead of trusting in the Lord their God, they courted the favour, and solicited the protection of that ambitious and artful monarch, who, like "a wild ass alone," consulted only his own selfish inclinations, and aimed at his own aggrandizement. This ill-advised measure, from which they promised themselves so much advantage, he declares, would certainly hasten this catastrophe, which they sought to avoid. They should find, when too late, that they had been the dupes of his deceitful policy, and the victims of his unprincipled ambition. The wild ass, like almost every creature that inhabits the barren wilderness, is reduced to subsist on coarse and scanty fare. The sweets of unbounded liberty are counterbalanced by the unremitting labour which is necessary to procure him a precarious subsistence. In those salt and dreary wastes, which providence has allotted for his residence, very few plants are to be found, and those, from the heat of the climate and the nature of the soil, are stunted in their growth, and bitter to the taste: "They see not when good cometh;" for they grow in the parched places in the wilderness, "in a salt land, and not inhabited." In such inhospitable regions, the wild ass is compelled to traverse a great extent of country, to scour the plains, and range over the mountains, in order to find here and there a few blades of coarse, withered grass, and browse the tops of the few scented shrubs which languish in these sandy wilds. Such are the allusions involved in these words: "The range of the mountains is his pasture, and he searcheth after every green thing."

Every natural historian has recorded the extreme wildness of this animal. He is so jealous of his liberty, that on the slightest alarm, or the first appearance of danger, he flies with amazing swiftness into the desert. His senses are so acute, that it is impossible to approach him in the open country. But in spite of all his vigilance, the hunter often encloses him in his toils, and leads him away into captivity. Even in this unhappy state, he never submits his neck to the yoke of man without a determined resistance. "Sent out free" by Him that made him, he is tenacious of his independence, and opposes, to the extraordinary methods which his captors are forced to employ, the most savage obstinacy; and for the most part, he baffles all their endeavours to tame him; still he "scorneth the multitude of the city, neither regards he the crying of the driver." On the authority of this text, Chrysostom says, "this animal is strong and untameable; man can never subdue him, whatever efforts he may make for that purpose." But Varr affirms, on the contrary, that "the wild ass is fit for labour; that he is easily tamed; and that when he is once tamed, he never resumes his original wildness." The words of Jehovah certainly give no countenance to the opinion of the Greek father; they only intimate, that it is extremely difficult to subdue the high spirit and stubborn temper of this animal; for the apostle James declares, that "every kind of beast is tamed, and hath been tamed of mankind;" and great numbers of them are actually broken to the yoke in Persia, and some other countries. But it appears from the statement of Professor Gmelin, that the Persians tame the young onagers; and the reason probably is, that they seldom or never succeed in rendering a full grown onager serviceable to man.

Not more untameable and indocile is the wild ass, in the mind of Zophar, than the human kind, in their present degenerate state: "Vain man would be wise, though man be born like a wild ass's colt." Empty, self-conceited man, still aspires to equal God in wisdom and knowledge; still fondly supposes himself qualified to sit in judgment on the divine proceedings, and to take the exclusive management of his own affairs, although the wild ass's colt is not more rude, indocile, and untractable. Nor is this an acquired habit: he is born a wild ass's colt, and therefore, by nature equally impatient of salutary restraint, equally wilful in consulting his own inclinations. And this defect in his character, no created arm is able to subdue; it yields only to the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit, who makes him willing in the day of effectual calling, by a display of almighty power.—PAXTON.

Ver. 13. Garvest thou the goodly wings unto the peacocks? or wings and feathers unto the ostrich?

These birds are exceedingly numerous in the East; and it gives a kind of enchantment to a morning scene, to see flocks of them together, spreading their beautiful plumage in the rays of the sun. They proudly stalk along, and then run with great speed, particularly if they get sight of a serpent; and the reptile midst wind along in his best style, or he will soon become the prey of the lordly bird. A husband sometimes says to his wife, "Come hither, my beautiful peacock. Had they not their beauty from you?" This bird is sacred to Scandan.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 13. Garvest thou the goodly wings unto the peacocks? or wings and feathers unto the ostrich? 14. Which leaveth her eggs in the earth, and warmeth them in the dust, 15. And forgetteth that the foot may crush them, or that the wild beast may break them. 16. She is hardened against her young ones, as though they were not hers: her labour is in vain without fear; 17. Because God hath deprived her of wisdom, neither hath he imparted to her understanding. 18. What time she lifeth up herself on high, she scorneth the horse and his rider.

The ostrich is by far the largest among the winged tribes, and seems to be the connecting link between the quadruped and the fowl. She is not to be classed with the former, because she is furnished with a kind of wings, which, if they cannot raise her from the ground, greatly accelerate her flight; not with the latter, for "the feathers which grow out of her small wings, are all unwoven and decomposed, and their beards consist of long hairs detached from one another, and do not form a compact body to strike the air with advantage; which is the principal office for which the feathers of the wing are intended." Those of the tail have also the same structure, and, by consequence, cannot oppose to the air a suitable resistance. They can neither expand nor close, as circumstances require, nor take different inclinations; and what is not a little remarkable, all the feathers which cover the body exhibit the same conformation. The ostrich has not, like the greater part of other birds, feathers of various kinds, some soft and downy, which are next the skin; and others of a more firm and compact consistence, which cover the former; and others still longer and of greater strength, and on which the movements of the animal depend. All her feathers are of one kind, all of them bearded with detached hairs or filaments, without consistence and reciprocal adherence; in one word, they are of no utility in flying, or in directing the flight. Besides the peculiar structure of her wings, she is pressed down to the earth by her enormous size. Buffon calculates the weight of a living ostrich, in middling condition, at no less than sixty-five or eighty pounds; which would require an immense power in the wings and motive muscles of these members, to raise and support in the air so ponderous a mass. Thus by her excessive weight and the loose texture of her feathers, she is condemned, like a quadruped, laboriously to run upon the surface of the earth, without being ever able to mount up into the air. But although incapable of raising herself from the ground, she is admirably fitted for running. The greater part of her body is covered with hair, rather than feathers; her head and her sides have little or no hair; and her legs, which are very thick and muscular, and in which her principal force resides, are in like manner almost naked; her large sinewy and plump feet, which have only two toes, resemble considerably the feet of a camel; her wings, armed with two spikes, like those of a porcupine, are rather a kind of arms than wings, which are given her for defence.

These characteristic features throw great light on a part of the description which Jehovah himself has condescended to give of this animal in the book of Job. It begins with this interrogation: "Garvest thou wings and feathers unto the ostrich?" Dr. Shaw translates it: "The wing of the ostrich is expanded; the very feathers and plumage of the stork." According to Buffon, the ostrich is covered with feathers alternately white and black, and sometimes gray by the mixture of these two colours. They are shortest, says the author, on the lower part of the neck, the rest of which is entirely naked; they become longer on the back and the belly; and are longest at the extremity of the tail and the wings; but he denies that any of them have been found with red, green, blue, or yellow plumes. This assertion, however, is not quite correct; for if credit is due to Dr. Shaw, "when the ostrich is full grown, the neck, particularly of the male, which before was almost naked, is now very beautifully covered with red feathers. The plumage, likewise, upon the shoulders, the back, and some parts of the wings, from being hitherto of a dark grayish colour, becomes now as black as jet, while some of the feathers retain an exquisite whiteness. They are, as described in the thirteenth verse, the very feathers and plumage of the stork; that is, they consist of such black and white feathers as the stork, called from thence πελαγος, is known to have. But the thighs, the thighs, and the breast do not partake of this covering, being usually naked; and when touched are of the same warmth as the flesh of t quadrupeds.

The ostrich, though she inhabits the sandy deserts, where she is exposed to few interruptions, is extremely vigilant and shy. She betakes herself to flight on the first alarm, and traverses the waste with so great agility and swiftness, that the Arab is never able to overtake her, even when he is mounted upon his horse of Family. The fact is thus stated by Jehovah: "What time she lifeth up herself on high, she scorneth the horse and his rider." She affords him only an opportunity of admiring at a distance the extraordinary agility and staitness of her motions, the richness of her plumage, and the great propriety of ascribing to her "an expanded quivering wing." Nothing certainly can be more beautiful and entertaining than such a sight; the wings, by their continual though unwearied vibrations, serving her at once for sails and oars, while her feet, no less assisting in conveying her out of sight, are equally insensible of fatigue. Her surprising swiftness is confirmed by the writer of a voyage to Senegal, who says, "She sets off at a hard gallop; but after being excited a little, she expands her wings, as if to catch the wind, and abandons herself to a speed so great that she seems not to touch the ground." "I am persuaded," continues that writer, "she would leave far behind the swiftest English courser." Buffon also admits that the ostrich runs faster than the horse. These unexceptionable testimonies completely vindicate the assertion of the inspired writer. But as it is on horseback the Arab pursues and takes her, it is necessary to explain how he accomplishes his purpose, and show its consistency with the sacred writings. "When the Arab rouses an ostrich," says Buffon, "he follows her at a distance, without pressing her too hard, but sufficiently to prevent her from taking food, yet not to determine her to escape by a prompt flight." Here the celebrated naturalist fairly admits that she has it in her power to escape if she were sufficiently alarmed. "It is the more easy," continues our author, "to follow her in this manner, because she does not proceed in a straight line, and because she describes almost always in her course a circle more or less extended." The Arabs, then, have it in their power to direct their pursuit in a concentric interior circle, and by consequence straighter; and to follow her always at a just distance, by passing over much less ground than she. When they have thus fatigued and starved her for a day or two, they take their opportunity, rush in upon her at full speed, leading her always as much as possible against the wind, and kill her with their clubs, to prevent her blood from spoiling the beautiful whiteness of her feathers. In this account of Buffon, the highest modern authority in matters of this kind, nothing occurs to contradict the assertion of the inspired writer; while he distinctly admits that she runs faster than the fleetest horses, and could not be taken but by artful management.

She constructs her humble nest in the bare ground, excavating the sand with her feet. It is hollow in the middle, and fortified on all sides by a circular mound of some height, for the purpose of preventing the rain from flowing into the nest and wetting her young. From the most accurate accounts which Dr. Shaw could obtain from his conductors, as well as from Arabs of different places, it appears that the ostrich lays from thirty to fifty eggs. Ælian mentions more than eighty; but Shaw never heard of so great a number. The first egg is deposited in the centre; the rest are placed as conveniently as possible round about it. In this manner, she is said to lay, deposit, or trust "her eggs in the earth, and to warn them in the sand, and forgeth (as they are not placed like those of some other birds upon trees, or in the clefts of rocks, &c.) that the foot (of the traveller) may crush them, or that the wild beast may break them." She seems in a great measure insensible to the tender feelings which so powerfully operate in the greater part of other animals. This assertion, indeed, Buffon seems inclined to controvert: "As soon," says that writer, "as the young ostriches are hatched, they are in a condition to walk, and even to run and seek their food; so that in the torrid zone, where they find the degree of heat which they require, and the food which is proper to them, they are emancipated at their birth, and abandoned by their mother, of whose care they have no need. But in countries less warm, for example, at the Cape of Good Hope, the mother watches over her young as long as her assistance is necessary, and on all occasions her cares are proportioned to their wants."

This account Buffon takes from Leo Africanus and Kolhè, to whom he refers; in which it is admitted, that the mother abandons her offspring as soon as they are hatched, although it is alleged, not for want of affection, but because her cares are not necessary. But this is to suppose that they are not like other young creatures, all of which require more or less attention from their parents, for some time after their birth; an anomaly which cannot be admitted but on the most convincing evidence. Let us now hear the account of Dr. Shaw, who travelled in the native country of the ostrich, and borrowed his information from the Arabs, who were well acquainted with all her habits and dispositions: "Upon the least distant noise, or trivial occasion, she forsakes her eggs or her young ones, to which, perhaps, she never returns; or, if she does, it may be too late either to restore life to the one, or to preserve the lives of the other." Agreeably to this account, the Arabs meet sometimes with whole nests of these eggs undisturbed; some of which are sweet and good; others are addle and corrupted; others again have their young ones of different growths, according to the time, it may be presumed, they have been forsaken by the dam. They oftener meet a few of the little ones, no bigger than well-grown pullets, half starved, straggling and moaning about, like so many distressed orphans, for their mother. And in this manner, the ostrich may be said, as in verse sixteenth, "to be hardened against her young ones, as though they were not hers; her labour (in hatching and attending them so far) being in vain without fear," or the least concern of what becomes of them afterward. This want of affection is also recorded by Jeremiah, in his Lamentations: "The daughter of my people is cruel, like the ostriches in the wilderness."

In her private capacity the ostrich is not less inconsiderate and foolish, particularly in the choice of food, which is often highly detrimental and pernicious to her; for she swallows every thing greedily and indiscriminately, whether it be pieces of rags, leather, wood, stone, or iron. When Dr. Shaw was at Oran he saw one of these birds swallow, without any seeming uneasiness or inconvenience, several leaden bullets, as they were thrown upon the floor, scorching hot from the mould; the inward coats of the œsophagus and stomach being, in his opinion, probably better stocked with glands and juices, than in other animals with shorter necks. They are particularly fond of their own excrement, which they greedily eat up as soon as it is voided; no less fond are they of the dung of hens and other poultry. It seems as if their optic, as well as their olfactory nerves, were less adequate and conducive to their safety and preservation, than in other creatures. The divine Providence in this, no less than in other respects, "having deprived them of wisdom, neither hath it imparted to them understanding." This part of her character is fully admitted by Buffon, who describes it in nearly the same terms.

The ostrich was aptly called by the ancients a lover of the deserts. Shy and timorous in no common degree, she retires from the cultivated field, where she is disturbed by the Arabian shepherds and husbandmen, into the deepest recesses of the Sahara. In those dreary and arid wastes, which are scarcely ever refreshed with a shower, she is reduced to subsist on a few tufts of coarse grass, which here and there languish on their surface, or a few other solitary plants, equally destitute of nourishment, and, in the Psalmist's phrase, even "withered before they are grown up." To this dry and parched food, may perhaps be added, the great variety of land snails which occasionally cover the leaves and stalks of these herbs, and which may afford her some refreshment. Nor is it improbable that she sometimes regales herself on lizards and serpents, together with insects and reptiles of various kinds. Still, however, considering the voracity and size of this camel bird, it is wonderful how the little ones should be nourished and brought up; and especially, how those of fuller growth, and much better qualified to look out for themselves, are able to subsist.—PAXTON.

Ver. 16. She is hardened against her young ones, as though they were not hers: her labour is in vain without fear.

Mr. Vansittart, in his Observations on Select Places of the Old Testament, proposes the following translation of this verse: "She hath hardened her young ones for that which is not hers; her labour is for another without discrimination." To justify this version he adduces these extracts from modern travellers: "We pursued our journey next morning; in the course of the day I amused myself by firing my piece to start game. A female ostrich rose from her nest, which was the largest I had seen, containing thirty-two eggs: twelve more being distributed at some distance, in a little cavity by itself. I could not conceive that one female could cover so many; they were of an unequal size, and on examination I found that nine of them were much less than the rest. This peculiarity interested me, and I ordered the oxen to be unyoked at about a quarter of a league distance from the nest. I then concealed myself in a thicket, from whence I could overlook the place, and yet remain within gunshot. I had not watched long before the female returned and sat on the eggs. During the rest of the day which I passed in the thicket, three more came to the same nest, covering it alternately; each continued sitting for the space of a quarter of an hour, and then gave place to another, who, while waiting, sat close by the side of her it was to succeed, a circumstance that made me conjecture, that in cold or rainy nights they sit by pairs, or perhaps more. The sun was almost down; the male bird approached: these, equally with the female, assist in hatching the eggs. I instantly shot him: but the report of my gun scared the others, who in their flight broke several of them. I now drew nearer, and saw with regret that the young ostriches were just ready to quit the shells, being perfectly covered with down. This peculiarity of female ostriches assisting each other for the incubation of the same nest, is, I think, calculated to awaken the attention of the naturalists: and not being a general rule, proves that circumstances sometimes determine the actions of these creatures, regulate their customs, and strengthen their natural instinct, by giving them a knowledge not generally bestowed. For is it not probable that they may associate to be the more powerful, and better able to defend their young?

"An ostrich starting before me at the distance of twenty paces, I thought it might be sitting, and hastened to the spot from whence she rose, where I found eleven eggs, quite warm, and four others at a distance of two or three feet from the nest. I called to my companions, who broke one of the warm eggs, in which was a young ostrich, perfectly formed, about the size of a chicken just hatched. I thought these quite spoiled, but found my people entertained a very different opinion of the matter, every one being eager to come in for his share. Amiroo in the mean time caught up the four outward ones, assuring me that I should find them excellent. In the sequel, I learned from this African, that the rest of my Hottentots, and even naturalists themselves, were unacquainted with, since none that I recollect have ever mentioned it: the ostrich never places near her nest a certain number of eggs, proportioned to those she intends to sit on; these remaining separate and uncovered, continue good a long while, being designed by the providential mother for the first nourishment of her young. Experience has convinced me of the truth of this observation, for I never met with an ostrich's nest without finding eggs disposed in this manner, at a small distance from it." (Vaillant's Travels.)

"Among the very few polygamous birds that are found in a state of nature, the ostrich is one. The male, distinguished by its glossy black feathers from the dusky gray female, is generally seen with two or three, and frequently as many as five, of the latter. These females lay their eggs in one nest, to the number of ten or twelve each, which they hatch altogether, the male taking his turn of sitting on them among the rest. Between sixty and seventy eggs have been found in one nest: and if incubation has begun, a few are most commonly lying round the sides of the hole, having been thrown out by the birds on finding the nest to contain more than it could conveniently hold." (Barrow.) Ælian says, of the female ostrich, "She separates the unproductive eggs, and sits only on the good ones, from which the brood is produced; and the others she uses for food for her young." These accounts render obvious the propriety of the new-proposed translation. Because by the four mother birds having the same nest in common, and intermixing their eggs, they would likewise, when the eggs were hatched, have their young intermixed and in common; so that the parents not being able to discern their own particular young, would expend their affection equally on the whole brood, and consequently on the young of another bird equally as her own: thus she would be taking to herself the young of others instead of her own; so that in this respect she might be said to harden her own young, by taking the young of another, and dividing her affection upon them. In this sense she might be called cruel as to her own young, though she would at the same time be affectionate also.—BURDEA.

Ver. 26. Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom, and stretch her wings towards the south?

It is considered an exceedingly fortunate thing to see a hawk or a kite flying in circles from left to right, towards the south. When the south wind blows, these birds may be seen making their way in circles towards that quarter; but when they return they fly in a direct line.—ROBERTS.

The hawk is distinguished by the swiftness of her flight, and the rapid motion of her wings in flying. But as it is the first of these which naturally fixes the attention of an observer, the Hebrews, according to their invariable custom, selected it as the reason of the name by which she is known in their language; they call her (רַשָּׁף) ra'shaf, from the verb ra'saf, to fly. She was reckoned by many of the ancients the swiftest of the feathered race. In Homer, the descent of Apollo from heaven is compared to her flight: "From the mountains of Ida he descended like a swift hawk, the destroyer of pigeons, that is the swiftest of birds." In the thirteenth book, Ajax tells Hector the day should come when he would wish to have horses swifter than hawks, to carry him back to the city. Among the Egyptians the hawk was the symbol of the winds; a sure proof that they contemplated with great admiration the rapidity of her motions. For the same reason, according to some writers, she was consecrated to the sun, which she resembles in the surprising swiftness of her career, and the faculty with which she moves through the boundless regions of the sky. This custom of consecrating the hawk to Apollo, the Greeks borrowed from the Egyptians, among whom no animal was so sacred as the ibis and the hawk. So great was their veneration for these animals, that if any person killed one of them, with or without design, he was punished with death; while for the destruction of any other animal, he was only subjected to an arbitrary fine. This bird, so highly venerated among the heathen, was pronounced unclean by the Jewish lawgiver; it was to be an abomination to the people of Israel; its flesh was not to be eaten, nor its carcass touched with impunity. The reason of this law may probably be found in her dispositions and qualities; she is a bird of prey, and, by consequence, cruel in her temper, and gross in her manners. Her mode of living, too, may probably impart a disagreeable taste and flavour to the flesh, and render it, particularly in a warm climate, improper for the table. Nor do we know that it was ever relished by any people, although the pressure of necessitous circumstances may have occasionally reconciled individuals to use it for food. Her daring spirit, her thirst of blood, the surprising rapidity of her flight, and her perseverance in the chase, soon pointed her out to the hunter as a valuable assistant; but even he willingly resigns her carcass to be meat to the beasts of the field.

Of this bird Jehovah demands, "Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom, and stretch her wings towards the south?" Jerome, and several other interpreters, render the words, By thy prudence doth the hawk renew her plumage, having expanded her wings towards the south? because the verb (אָבַר) abar, in the future of the Hiphil, seems to be formed from the noun (אָבַר) abar, or (אָבַר) abrak, which signifies a feather. This law, by which the eagle, the hawk, and other birds, annually shed their feathers, was not contrived by the wisdom of man; although it appears he is able, by certain managements, to accelerate the moulting season, as well as the renovation of the plumage. But, as means and remedies derive all their efficacy from God, and depend for success only upon his co-operation, it may still be demanded, Doth the hawk renew her plumage by thy wisdom, expanding her wings towards the south? It is said, by an ancient writer on this passage, that humid and warm places are favourable to this change, and are therefore diligently sought for by hawkers, with the view of promoting the moulting of their falcons. When the south wind blows, the wild hawks, instructed by their instinctive sagacity, expand their wings till their limbs become heated; and by this means the old plumage is relaxed, and the moulting facilitated. But when the south wind refuses its aid, they expand their wings to the rays of the sun, and shaking them violently, produce a tepid gale for themselves; and thus their bodies being heated, and their pores opened, the old feathers more easily fall off, and new ones grow up in their place. But it is more probable that these words refer, not to the annual renovation of the plumage, but to the long and persevering flight of the hawk towards the south, on the approach of winter. Her migration is not conducted by the wisdom and prudence of man; but by the superintending and upholding providence of the only wise God. The words of Jehovah cannot be understood as referring to the falconer's art; for we have no evidence that the hawk was employed in hunting, till many ages after the times in which the patriarchs flourished. Besides, if the divine challenge referred to that amusement, the direction of her flight could not be confined to the south; for she pursues the game to every quarter of heaven. The renowned Chrysostom, on this passage, inquires, why Jehovah has made no mention of sheep and oxen, and other animals of the same kind, but only of useless creatures, which seem to have been formed for no beneficial or important purposes. But is it to be supposed that God, who is wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working, has made any part of his works in vain? We may not be able to discover, after the most careful investigation, the end which the Almighty had in view, when he created some of his works; but shall we presume on this account to pronounce them useless or insignificant? So far from being a useless bird, the hawk, in some cases, brings the most important and effectual assistance to the hunter. It has already been observed, that the antelope, which seems rather to fly than to run, leaves the swiftest dog far behind, and could never be overtaken without the help of the falcon. The hawk, then, is not the useless and insignificant creature which the Greek father represents her; on the contrary, she has conferred benefits on mankind of no inconsiderable value.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XL.

Ver. 15. Behold now behemoth, which I made with thee; he eateth grass as an ox.

Behemoth is an amphibious animal, whose real character is involved in much obscurity. The greater part of modern writers have thought that behemoth is the elephant, and leviathan the whale; this indisputably the largest of the aquatic, and that the largest of terrestrial animals. But their sentiments are liable to objections so numerous and weighty, that we are compelled, after the most careful investigation, to refer these names to very different animals. Bechart is of opinion, that the sacred writers refer, under these terms, to the crocodile and the hippopotamus; and he is probably correct. He follows Beza and Diodati in supposing the leviathan to be the crocodile of the Nile; and from this he infers, that the behemoth is the hippopotamus, an inhabitant of the same river. In the book of Job, the Almighty, after describing a number of terrestrial animals in a continued series, commences a new description in the fortieth chapter, in which we find leviathan, which is allowed by all to be an aquatic animal, joined with behemoth; therefore, to preserve the appointed order undisturbed, the latter must also be an aquatic animal. They are, besides, very similar in several respects: both are quadrupeds of enormous size—fierce in their dispositions—amphibious in their nature—both of them inhabitants of the Nile. Nor does the name, behemoth, ill agree with the hippopotamus; for the Hebrew term behema, may denote any beast, especially if it be of a superior size, as the hippopotamus is acknowledged to be. Aristotle gives him the size of an ass; Herodotus affirms that in stature he is equal to the largest ox; Diodorus makes his height not less than five cubits, or above seven feet and a half; Tattius calls him, on account of his prodigious strength, the Egyptian elephant. The Arabian authors quoted by Bechart, say that the behema, the same as the behemoth, is a four-footed animal, although he lives in the water. But were it admitted that behema by itself is always applied to land animals, yet behemoth may signify the hippopotamus with sufficient propriety, because that animal yields to very few in bulk and stature; it is amphibious, and resembles in many particulars terrestrial animals. No aquatic animal, indeed, so much resembles the beasts of the field; hence the hippopotamus alone, of all aquatic animals, is called, by way of excellence, behema, or, in the Egyptian dialect, behemoth; for behemoth is not a plural, but a singular noun, with an Egyptian termination, like Thoth, Paoth, Phamenoth, the names of Egyptian months, which are all in the singular number.

The description of behemoth is introduced with these words: "Behold now behemoth, which I made with thee; he eateth grass as an ox." The Almighty did not need to fetch the arguments of his mighty power from a distance; the Nile, which rolled its ample waters through regions bordering on Arabia, the native country of Job, contained the hippopotamus, one of the most surprising effects of creating power and goodness. Such seems to be the meaning of the command, "Behold now behemoth, which I have made with thee," or in thy neighbourhood. The particle im often signifies, near or hard by: thus, in the book of Joshua, the city of Ai is said to be im Bethaven, near Bethaven; and, in the book of Judges, the Danites were, im both Micah, near the house of Micah. But as the propriety of the translation cannot reasonably be disputed, it is needless to multiply examples. The Almighty proceeds: "he eateth grass like an ox." The ox and the elephant are equally beasts of burden; it is therefore by no means wonderful that they live on the same kind of food; but that the hippopotamus, an aquatic animal, which lives for the most part in the bottom of the Nile, should eat grass like an ox, is a singular phenomenon, well entitled to our consideration. Nor is it without design he is compared to the ox; for, he not only associates with him in the same pastures, but also bears a considerable resemblance to him in the size and stature of his body, and in the form of his head and feet.—PAXTON.

Ver. 16. Lo now, his strength is in his loins, and his force is in the navel of his belly.

The loins are the seat of strength in every animal; hence, in the language of scripture, to strengthen the loins denotes an augmentation of power. A very decisive instance occurs in the second chapter of Nahum: "Make thy loins strong;" fortify thy power mightily. The same idea is involved in the prayer of the Psalmist, that the power which the wicked had so greatly abused, might be diminished, till it became consistent with the peace and safety of others, or entirely taken away: "Make their loins continually to shake." The last clause, "His force is in the navel of his belly," cannot well be reconciled with the statements of ancient writers, that the belly of the elephant is the most tender and vulnerable part of his body. This is a fact so generally known, so fully authenticated, that in war the hostile spear is usually directed to the navel of that formidable animal, where the most deadly wound may be inflicted. We learn from Pliny, that when the rhinoceros attacks the elephant, he likewise aims his furious thrust at the same part of the body. The same powerful instinct which directs the horn of the rhinoceros, leads the goat, if the Talmudical writers may be credited, to the navel of the elephant, which it enters, and torments him with excruciating pains. But it is not to be supposed that the inspired writer would place the strength of that animal in the softest and most defenceless part of his frame, because it is not consistent with the truth of natural history. But the navel and belly of the hippopotamus are like the rest of his body, protected by an impenetrable skin, of so great solidity and thickness, that it is said to be formed into spears, and other missile weapons. Diodorus asserts that the hippopotamus has a skin nearly the strongest of all animals; and Ptolemy says hyperbolically, that the robbers in India have a skin like the hippopotamus, which no arrow can pierce. Zeringhi declares that a musket ball can make no impression on the dried skin of that animal, nor can any weapon pierce it, till it has been long steeped in water.—PAXTON.

Ver. 17. He moveth his tail like a cedar; the sinews of his thighs are wrapped together.

Many writers, among whom are Caryl and Schultens, in order to support their hypothesis, that behemoth is the elephant, venture to contradict the uniform sense of the term zanab, which, in our translation, is properly rendered the tail, and make it signify the proboscis or trunk of that animal. Zanab, in Parkhurst, signifies the extremity or hindermost part of a thing, as the tail of an animal, or the end of a firebrand almost extinguished; and hence, as a verb in a primitive sense, to cut off the extremity or hindermost part. Yet in opposition to the constant meaning of this word in scripture, these writers turn it into the snout or trunk of the elephant, to make it agree with their favourite hypothesis. But if zanab be suffered to retain its usual meaning, it furnishes a strong presumption, that the hippopotamus is intended in the text under consideration, and not the elephant, whose tail, like that of the hog, is small, weak, and inconsiderable. It is, according to Buffon, but two feet and a half or three feet long, and pretty slender; but the tail of the hippopotamus, he observes from Zeringhi, does not resemble that of a hog, but rather that of a tortoise, only that it is incomparably thicker. The tail of the hippopotamus, Scheuchzer observes, although short, is thick, and may be compared to the cedar for its tapering, conical shape, its smoothness, thickness, and strength. But although it is thick, short, and very firm, yet he moves and twists it at pleasure; which, in the sacred text, is considered as a proof of his prodigious strength.

"The sinews of his thighs," continues the sacred writer, "are wrapped together." Bechart renders the words, "The sinews of his thighs are interwoven or twisted together."

From this short, but emphatical clause, we may certainly infer, that behemoth is one of the most powerful animals on the face of our globe. Such undoubtedly is the hippopotamus, if we may believe the accounts of Dampier, who declares he has known him set one tooth in the gunnel of a boat, and another at the distance of more than four feet, and there bite a hole through the plank, and sink the boat; and when he had done, he went away shaking his ears. On another occasion he saw him in the wash of the shore, when the sea tossed in a boat, with fourteen hogheads of water in her, and left it dry upon his back; and another surge came and fetched the boat off, without the beast receiving any perceptible injury. Dampier and his crew made several shots at him, but to no purpose, for the bullets glanced from his sides as from a wall of adamant.—PAXTON.

Ver. 18. His bones are as strong pieces of brass; his bones are like bars of iron.

The idea of his prodigious strength is increased by the account given of his bones, which are compared to strong pieces of brass, and bars of iron. Such figures are commonly employed by the sacred writers, to express great hardness and strength, of which a striking example occurs in the prophecies of Micah: "Arise and thresh, O daughter of Zion; for I will make thy horn iron, and I will make thy hoofs brass; and thou shalt beat in pieces many people." So hard and strong are the bones of the hippopotamus. The cutting, and particularly the canine teeth of the lower jaw, says Buffon, are very long, and so hard and strong, that they strike fire with steel; a circumstance which probably gave rise to the fable of the ancients, that the hippopotamus vomited fire. The substance of the canine teeth is so white, so fine, and so hard, that it is preferable to ivory for making artificial teeth. "His bones are like bars of iron;" and such, in the description of Buffon, are the bones of this animal. The cutting teeth, says that celebrated naturalist, especially those of the under jaw, are very long, cylindrical, and chamfered. The canine teeth are also long, crooked, prismatic, and sharp like the tusks of the wild boar. The largest of the cutting and canine teeth are twelve, and sometimes sixteen inches long, and each of them weighs from twelve to thirteen pounds.—PAXTON.

Ver. 19. He is the chief of the ways of God: he that made him can make his sword to approach unto him.

It is added, "he is the chief of the ways of God: he that made him can make his sword to approach unto him." The phrase in the first clause, is evidently hyperbolic, and signifies merely, that he is one of the noblest animals which the almighty Creator produced. In size, the hippopotamus is inferior only to the elephant. The male, which Zeringhi brought from the Nile to Italy, was sixteen feet nine inches long, from the extremity of the muzzle to the origin of the tail; fifteen feet in circumference, and six feet and a half high; and the legs were about two feet ten inches long. The head was three feet and a half in length, and eight feet and a half in circumference. The opening of the mouth was two feet four inches, and the largest teeth were more than a foot long. Thus his prodigious strength; his impenetrable skin; the vast opening of his mouth, and his portentous voracity; the whiteness and hardness of his teeth; his manner of life, spent with equal ease in the sea, on the land, or at the bottom of the Nile,—equally claim our admiration, and entitle him to be considered as the chief of the ways of God. Nor is he less remarkable for his sagacity; of which two instances are recorded by Pliny. After he has gorged himself with corn, and begins to return with a distended belly to the deep, with averted steps he traces a great many paths, lest his pursuers, following the lines of one plain track, should overtake and destroy him while he is unable to resist. The second instance is not less remarkable: When he has become fat with too much indulgence, he reduces his obesity by copious bleedings. For this purpose, he searches for newly cut reeds, or sharp pointed rocks, and rubs himself against them, till he make a sufficient aperture for the blood to flow. To promote the discharge, it is said, he agitates his body; and when ho thinks he has lost a sufficient quantity, he closes the wound by rolling himself in the mud. Hence, Pliny calls him the discoverer of the art of blood-letting; and the master of the healing art: and Anniannus, the most sagacious of all animals destitute of reason.

"He that made him can make his sword approach unto him;" or, as the words may be rendered, He who made him, has applied to him his sharp, crooked sword; of which the meaning seems to be, He has furnished his mouth with long teeth, somewhat bent, sharp, and protruded, with which, as with a crooked sword or sickle, he reaps and masticates the grass and corn on which he feeds. But if behemoth be understood of the elephant, how can it be said with any correctness, that he is provided with a crooked sword for reaping his food. The shortness of his neck prevents him from reaching the ground with his mouth, and using his teeth for collecting herbage. This operation is performed by his trunk, which receives the food, and conveys it into his mouth. His teeth are perfectly inefficient, except for mastication; and as for his trunk, it has no resemblance to any sharp instrument; on this account the ancients never gave it the name of a sword or sickle, but called it a hand; a name which it may receive with great propriety. A very learned interpreter, perceiving the inconvenience of this exposition, if behemoth mean the elephant, prefers our translation: "He that made him can make his sword approach unto him;" that is, He alone that made him can take away his life. But whether we apply the words to the elephant, or the hippopotamus, the sense is equally inadmissible, for both these animals are frequently destroyed without the immediate interference of God. Besides, to apply the sword to any one, and to take away his life with it, are not exactly the same; nor does this view agree with the whole series of the context, while the interpretation given by Bochart perfectly accords with it, and connects the verse with the rest of the narrative: He who made him, has furnished him with a sickle, or crooked sword, to reap and collect his food.—PAXTON.

Ver. 20. Surely the mountains bring him forth food, where all the beasts of the field play.

This is considered as a very strong argument in favour of the elephant, an animal which, it is well known, browses upon the mountains; while, fully assured of his mild and forbearing temper, all the beasts of the field sport around him in peace and security. But the text applies with equal, and even with more propriety, to the hippopotamus; for it seems to indicate something remarkable in the circumstance, that such an animal should seek his food in peace, on the hills and mountains which skirt his habitation. But surely it is not strange, that the elephant, a creature which always lives on the land, and whose disposition leads him to eat grass like an ox, should be found on such a pasture. The hippopotamus, on the contrary, lives for the most part in the water, and walks on the bottom, as in the open air; yet he seeks his food more frequently on the land, where he devours sugarcanes, rushes, millet, rice, roots, and vegetables of every kind, in immense quantities, and ravages, far and wide, the cultivated fields. Not content with laying waste the plains, he proceeds in the night to the hills and mountains, and renews his depredations. Tattius asserts that he is the most voracious of all animals, so that he devours the standing corn of a whole field for nourishment. Natural historians give the same account of the morse, an animal which in many respects resembles the hippopotamus, and inhabits the large rivers of Russia, which roll their waters into the Frozen Ocean. He is about the size of an ox, with very short legs; his breast is higher and broader than the other parts of the body: he has two large and long tusks, resembling ivory in whiteness, and of equal value. When he is inclined to sleep, he forsakes the ocean, and, in companies, retires to the mountains. Around the hippopotamus, the beasts of the field may sport in safety; for although he feeds on fishes, crocodiles, and even cadaverous flesh, he is not known to prey on other animals. It is not even difficult to drive him away from the cultivated fields, for he is more timid on land than in the water. His only resource in danger, is to plunge into the deep, and travel under it a great way, before he ventures again to appear. The Indians, according to Dampier, are accustomed to throw him a part of their fish when he comes near their canoes, and then he passes on without doing them any harm. The same voyager relates an anecdote, which remarkably displays the mildness of his disposition; as their boat lay near the snore, he went under her, and with his back lifted her out of the water, and overset her, with six men on board, but did them no personal injury. These facts prove, at once, his incredible strength, and his habitual gentleness."—PAXTON.

Ver. 21. He lieth under the shady trees, in the covert of the reeds and fens. 22. The shady trees cover him with their shadow; the willows of the brook compass him about.

When satiated with food, he reposes "under the shady trees in the covert of the reed and fens." The elephant, it is admitted, delights in the shade, but very seldom lies down to sleep, as the sacred writer asserts of behemoth; nor is he known to frequent the reeds which cover the marsh, and skirt the border of the lake. But the reeds are the chosen haunt of the hippopotamus; they supply him with a grateful food, and screen him during his repose from the burning heat of the sun. In this part of his history, ancient and modern authors harmoniously accord. Marcellinus observes, that he reposes among the tall reeds, where they grow thickest in the mire. They are his covert, his food, and his medicine. Hence the prayer of David, Rebuke the company of the spearmen, or, as it may be translated, the wild beast of the reed, which has been supposed to refer to the hippopotamus, as the symbol of the Egyptian people and government; and this is the more probable, as he mentions the bulls and the calves, which that degenerate race honoured with idolatrous reverence. The circumstance of his making his bed among the thick reeds of the marsh, naturally suggests his relation to the Nile, whose banks are richly clothed with that plant; this is confirmed by many Egyptian representations, in which he is joined with the crocodile. Kimchi, and other writers, who contend that the elephant is meant in this description, unable to reconcile the clause under consideration to their theory, are compelled to throw it into the form of an interrogation: Does he lie under the holy trees in the covert of the reeds and fens? that is, he by no means lies in such places. But they did not perceive that this solution of the difficulty is destructive to their own theory; for the elephant does lie under the shady trees, or takes his repose standing under their covert. Besides, to throw the clause into the form of an interrogation, is to break the texture of the description, and to mar its beauty; and if such liberties with the sacred text were admitted, nothing is so plain or express in the word of God, which may not be eluded. The only other remark necessary to be made is, that the words of the sacred writer are confirmed by the testimony of Buffon, who says the hippopotamus, besides his usual cry, which has a great resemblance to that of the elephant, or to the s'ammering and indistinct sounds uttered by deaf persons when asleep, makes a kind of snorting noise, which betrays him at a distance. To prevent the danger arising from this circumstance, he generally lies among the reeds that grow upon marshy grounds, and which it is difficult to approach: there "the shady trees cover him with their shadow; the willows of the brook compass him about."—PAXTON.

Ver. 23. Behold, he drinketh up a river, and hasteth not: he trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth.

Behemoth, which before was feeding upon the mountains, or sleeping under the shade of the reeds and the willows, is in the next verse introduced quenching his thirst at the river: "Behold, he drinketh up a river, and hasteth not: he trusteth he can draw up Jordan into his mouth." Bochart gives a different translation: "Behold, let a river come upon him, he will not fear; he is safe though Jordan break forth upon his mouth." This version, it must be allowed, agrees perfectly with what natural historians say of the hippopotamus, that he walks deliberately into the deepest floods, and pursues his journey with the same fearless composure as in the open air, along the bottom of the torrent, or the channel of the sea. He remains a long time under water. Dampier has seen him descend to the bottom of three fathoms water, and remain there more than half an hour before he returned to the surface.—PAXTON.

Ver. 24. He taketh it with his eyes: his nose pierceth through snares.

The inspired writer thus concludes his description: "he taketh it with his eyes; his nose pierceth through snares." Bochart renders the words, Who shall take him in his sight, and perforate his nose with hooks? that is, Who shall come before him, and attack him with open violence? It is found extremely difficult to subdue him in fair combat; and therefore the Egyptians have recourse to stratagem. They watch near the banks of the Nile, till he leave the river to feed in the adjacent fields; they then make a large ditch in the way by which he passed, and cover it with thin planks, earth, and herbage. Passing without suspicion on his return to the food, over the deceitful covering, he falls into the ditch, and is immediately despatched by the hunters, who rush from their ambush, and pour their shot into his head. From this review, the fair and necessary conclusion seems to be, that behemoth is not the elephant, but the hippopotamus of the Nile.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XLI.

Ver. 1. Canst thou draw out leviathan with a hook? or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down?

From this passage Hasselquist observes, that the leviathan "means a crocodile, by that which happens daily, and without doubt happened in Job's time, in the river Nile; to wit, that this voracious animal, far from being drawn up by a hook, bites off and destroys all fishing-tackle of this kind, which is thrown out in the river. I found, in one that I opened, two hooks, which it had swallowed, one sticking in the stomach, and the other in a part of the thick membrane which covers the palate."—BUNDE.

The term leviathan is properly the same as tannin, which in our scripture is translated dragon. The royal Psalmist uses them as convertible terms, in the seventy-fourth Psalm, where he celebrates the mighty power of God in these lofty strains: "Thou brakest the heads of the dragons (tannin) in the waters; thou brakest the heads of leviathan in pieces, and gavest him to be meat to the people inhabiting the wilderness." He has been followed by the prophet in a passage where he foretells the deliverance of the church, from her cruel and implacable enemies: "In that day, the Lord, with his sore, and great, and strong sword, shall punish leviathan, the piercing serpent, even leviathan, that crooked serpent; and he shall slay the dragon that is in the sea." Kinchi distinguishes leviathan and tannin, by their magnitude alone. Leviathan, says he, is that enormous serpent or dragon. Hence, leviathan is a sinuous animal, which coils itself up like a dragon; and is described by the prophet as the oblique, tortuous, or crooked serpent. But as the word tannin is often used to denote the whale, and other marine animals; so, the term leviathan is, in scripture, sometimes employed to denote the same creatures. An example of this use of the term occurs in David's description of the sea: "There go the ships, there is that leviathan whom thou hast made to play therein." It is not however certain, that the term is ever used in this general sense; for it will be shown, that the creature to which it properly belongs, often infests the sea near the mouth of the great rivers of Africa and the East. Every part of the sublime description which Jehovah has given of leviathan in the book of Job, exactly corresponds with the natural history of the crocodile, which lives equally in the sea and in the river. That terrible animal bears a striking resemblance to the dragon or serpent. He has the shape of our asp; his legs are so short, that, like the serpent, he seems to go upon his belly. His feet are armed with claws, his back-bone is firmly jointed, and his tail a most formidable weapon; his whole formation is calculated for strength. Let us now hear Jehovah himself describe the leviathan, and we shall find that it exactly corresponds with the character and habits of the crocodile: "Canst thou draw out leviathan with a hook; or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down? He is of too great magnitude to be drawn out of the water like a fish. The second clause manifestly refers to the impossibility of drawing out his tongue, on account of its adhering throughout to his under jaw. It is besides short, thin, and broad, and by consequence, cannot be drawn out to his lips, like the tongue of any other animal.—PAXTON.

Ver. 2. Canst thou put a hook into his nose? or bore his jaw through with a thorn?

He is too powerful and fierce to be treated like a small fish: the elephant may submit to such indignities, but the crocodile scorns the dominion of man.—PAXTON.

The Hebrew word which is translated thorn, signifies rather an iron ring, fixed in the jaw. Bruce, speaking of the manner of fishing in the Nile, says, when a fisherman has caught a fish, he draws it on shore, and puts a strong iron ring into its jaw. "To this ring is fastened a rope, by which the fish is attached to the shore, which he then throws again into the water. Those who want fish go to the fisherman, as to a fish-market, and purchase them alive. We likewise bought a couple, and the fisherman showed us ten or twelve, fastened in a similar manner."—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 3. Will he make many supplications unto thee? will he speak soft words unto thee?

An elegant prosopoeia, which expresses, with great force and beauty, the difficulty with which he is overcome.—PAXTON.

Ver. 4. Will he make a covenant with thee? wilt thou take him for a servant for ever?

As the vanquished are wont to redeem their life with the loss of their liberty. This question seems to intimate, that attempts have been made to tame the crocodile, but they have uniformly proved abortive. If this allusion is involved in the words, it is a certain proof that the whale is not intended; for, while attempts have actually been made to tame the crocodile, none have ever been made to domesticate the whale.—PAXTON.

Ver. 5. Wilt thou play with him as with a bird? wilt thou bind him for thy maidens?

"Wilt thou play with him as with a bird? or wilt thou bind him for thy maidens?" It cannot be: he is a truculent animal, and particularly hostile to children of both sexes, that, by approaching the banks of the Nile without sufficient circumspection, fall a prey to this vigilant devourer. He will even rush upon a full grown person, and drag him in a moment to the bottom of the stream. Maximus Tyrius mentions an Egyptian woman, who brought up a young crocodile, of the same age with her son, and permitted them to live together in the most familiar manner. The crocodile was gentle and harmless during his early youth, but his natural disposition gradually unfolded as he advanced to maturity, till at last he seized upon his unsuspecting associate, and devoured him. Ancient authors record many instances of crocodiles entering the houses of the inhabitants near the Nile, and destroying their children. These are sufficient to justify the interrogation of the Almighty, and to show that the terrible animal in question never can be completely tamed, nor safely trusted.—PAXTON.

Ver. 6. Shall thy companions make a banquet of him? shall they part him among the merchants?

If Leviathan be the whale, both the one and the other are done every year; in some parts of the world, every day. The inhabitants of some regions feast on the blubber of the whale, and lay up the remainder for winter provisions. Cetaceous fishes are sought by "the merchants" at great expense, and constitute no inconsiderable portion of their wealth. But the fishermen neither rejoice when the crocodile is taken, except for the death of a devouring monster, nor feast upon his flesh; they do not cut up his carcass, nor expose him to sale, with the view of increasing their riches.—PAXTON.

Ver. 7. Canst thou fill his skin with barbed irons? or his head with fish-spears?

If Leviathan, in this sublime expostulation, signified the whale, the answer might be given in the affirmative; for that prodigious creature has been often compelled to yield to the harpoon; his skin has been filled with barbed irons, and his head with fish spears; nor is the capture of the whale attended with much difficulty. But the crocodile is said to defy the arm of the harpener, and the point of his spear; and in attacking him, the assailant has to encounter both great difficulty and imminent danger.—PAXTON.

Ver. 8. Lay thy hand upon him, remember the battle, do no more.

So great a horror shall seize thee, that thou shalt think rather of flight than combat, and the very touch of his skin shall convince thee, that it will not yield to thy stroke.—PAXTON.

Ver. 9. Behold, the hope of him is in vain: shall not one be cast down even at the sight of him?

If Leviathan cannot be taken by these means, the hope of subduing him is utterly vain; none may expect to prevail against him; his very presence fills the stoutest heart with terror. It cannot however be denied, that the crocodile is often taken and destroyed; but the remark equally applies to the whale; and consequently, if the words of Jehovah describe a creature which is too powerful and too fierce to be vanquished, neither the one nor the other can be understood. But it were absurd to suppose, that any creature on the earth, or in the sea, is either invulnerable or unconquerable. The sacred writer says expressly, that every creature may be tamed by the industry of man. The language of Jehovah, therefore, only means, that the man who attacks the Leviathan, must not hope for an easy conquest; and the experience of all ages attests the truth of the assertion. In size, he is very inferior to the whale; yet he sometimes extends to the length of thirty feet; and according to some ancient writers of great name, to forty or fifty. His strength is so great, that with one stroke of his tail he is said to cast the strongest animals to the ground; so that, to hunt the crocodile has always been reckoned one of the boldest and most perilous undertakings. In the time of Diodorus, the Nile and its adjacent lakes swarmed with crocodiles; yet very few were taken, and those not with hooks, but with iron nets. How difficult an undertaking this was, may be inferred from the coin which Augustus, the Roman emperor, caused to be struck, when he had completed the reduction of Egypt, on which was exhibited the figure of a crocodile, bound with a chain to a palm-tree, with this remarkable inscription, Nemo antea relevavit. These words certainly insinuate that in the experience of the ancients, to chain the crocodile was an achievement of the utmost difficulty. If the crocodiles which inhabit the Nile, are not, as modern travellers maintain, so fierce and dangerous as the ancients represent them, it must be owing to a number of adventitious circumstances; for in other parts of the world they are as ferocious as ever. It ought to be remembered, that Jehovah describes the general character of the species, which are admitted by writers of undoubted credit, to be the most fierce and savage of all animals. Pliney asserts in express terms, that no creature is so ferocious; and in another part of his works, that it is an animal extremely averse to society, and the most atrocious of all the monsters which the rivers, the lakes, or the seas, produce.—PAXTON.

Ver. 10. None is so fierce that dare stir him up; who then is able to stand before me?

When the crocodile is satiated with prey, he leaves the deeps to repose on the banks of the river, or on the shore of the sea. At such a time, none are so bold as to disturb his slumbers, or provoke his vengeance; or if any one, disregarding the dictates of prudence, or eager to display his intrepidity, ventures in such circumstances to attack him, it is at the imminent hazard of his life, and is for the most part attended with fatal consequences. Diodorus assigns this as the reason that he was worshipped by the Egyptians, that their enemies, for fear of him, durst not cross the river to attack them.—PAXTON.

Ver. 11. Who hath prevented me, that I should repay him? whatsoever is under the whole heaven is mine. 12. I will not conceal his parts, nor his power, nor his comely proportion.

13. Who can discover the face of his garment? or who can come to him with his double bridle?

These clauses, although teeming with important instruction, and, considering the authority with which they are clothed, entitled to deep attention, contribute nothing to the object of this review; we therefore proceed to the twelfth verse. "I will not conceal his parts, nor his power, nor his comely proportion." These are admirably displayed in the following particulars: "Who can discover the face of his garment, or come to him with a double bridle?" The crocodile never casts his skin, like the greater part of serpents, which he so nearly resembles, but retains it to the end of his life. The horse is a most powerful and spirited animal, yet he suffers a bit to be put into his mouth, and submits to the control of man; but the crocodile spurns his dominion, and parts with his freedom only with his life. Some interpreters propose a different version, which is equally characteristic of that animal: "Who shall venture within the reach of his jaws, which, when extended, have the appearance of a double bridle?"—PAXTON.

Ver. 14. Who can open the doors of his face? his teeth are terrible round about.

The doors of his face are his immense jaws, which he opens with a great and horrible hiatus. This feature of the crocodile has been mentioned by all naturalists. On the land his motions are slow, but in the river he springs eagerly on his prey, and either knocks it down with his tail, or opens a wide mouth for its destruction, armed with numerous sharp teeth of various lengths, with which, like the shark, he sometimes severs the human body at a single bite. Peter Martyr saw one, whose mouth was seven feet in width. Tattius affirms, that in seizing the prey, he becomes all mouth; and Albert, that the opening of his mouth extends as far back as his ears. Leo Africanus and Scaliger affirm, that he can receive within his mouth a young heifer. The vast capacity of his jaws is attested also by Martial, in the following lines:

"Cum comparata vilibus tuis ora Nileasus habes crocodilus angusta."

"His teeth are terrible round about;" or, in every respect, calculated to inspire the beholder with terror. They are sixty in number, and larger than the proportion of his body seems to require. Some of them project from his mouth like the tusks of a boar; others are serrated and connected like the teeth of a comb; hence, the bite is very retentive, and not less difficult to cure than the wound inflicted by the teeth of a mad dog. All the ancients agree, that his bite is most tenacious and horrible.—PAXTON.

Ver. 15. His scales are his pride, shut up together as with a close seal. 16. One is so near to another, that no air can come between them.

17. They are joined one to another, they stick together, that they cannot be sundered.

In these remarkable words is described the closeness of his scales, which, cohering to one another like the plates of a shield, cover his whole back. Those writers who make leviathan signify the whale, find themselves involved by this part of the description in an inextricable difficulty, for the whale has not a scale upon its body. This single circumstance, indeed, ought to determine the question; the whale it cannot be, for that immense animal has a smooth skin; and the history of nature furnishes no other to which the description of Jehovah will apply, but the crocodile, whose back is covered with impenetrable scales. One writer endeavours to get quit of the difficulty, by supposing that the text includes a comparison, and paraphrases it in this manner: leviathan is as safe from the assault of man, as if his body were defended with the strongest and broadest scales. But this mode of interpretation cannot be too severely reprobated; because it makes the sacred text say any thing which may suit the taste or the purpose of a writer. The words of Jehovah are express, the back of leviathan is covered with numerous, strong, and closely connected scales, under the protection of which, he fears no assailant, he shrinks from no danger. Nor is it consistent with truth, that a whale, which has no scales, is as strongly defended against the point of a spear, as if he were covered with this natural shield; for if his prodigious frame were defended by the broadest, the strongest, and the closest scales, the capture, if at all practicable, would be as arduous and difficult, as it is now easy. Abandoning this feeble and inadmissible argument, Caryl and others contend, that some cetaceous fishes are covered with scales, quoting in support of their assertion, a passage from Arrian, that he had heard Nearchus say, that the latter had heard certain mariners say, that they had seen cast upon the seashore, a monstrous fish, of fifty cubits long, which had scales all over, of a cubit thick. On this ridiculous story, it is needless to make any remark; to state it is to refute it; or, if refutation be deemed necessary, it is sufficient to say, that although hundreds of cetaceous fishes are caught every year, both in the North and in the South Sea, not so much as one has been found sheathed in scales, since the days of Nearchus.—PAXTON.

"The back of the crocodile," says Thevenot, "is covered with scales, resembling a door studded with large nails, and so hard that it cannot be pierced with a halberd." Bertram says, that the whole back of the crocodile is covered with horny flakes, or scales, which no musket-ball can pierce.—BURDELL.

Ver. 18. By his needings a light doth shine, and his eyes are like the eyelids of the morning.

It seems to be generally admitted, that the crocodile turns his face to the sun when he goes to sleep on the banks of the river; and in this position becomes so heated, that the breath, driven forcibly through his nostrils, issues with so much impetuosity, that it resembles a stream of light. A similar expression is used concerning the war-horse, in the thirty-ninth chapter, which may give us a clearer idea of the brightness which issues from the nostrils of this animal: "The glory of his nostrils is terrible." Provoked by the sound of the trumpet, and the sight of armed men, a white fume streams from his expanded nostrils; which the Spirit of inspiration calls his glory, and common authors compare to fire. Thus, Silius Italicus, Frenoque teneri impatientes crebras expirat naribus ignes; and Claudian, Incenscent pululo nares. In the same manner are we to understand the words of Jehovah concerning the crocodile. The heat of that scaly monster, basking in the scorching beams of a vertical sun, together with the force with which the breath is emitted from the nostrils, produces the same luminous appearance round his nose, as plays around that of the high-mettled charger on the day of battle. The next clause possesses very great poetical beauty: "His eyes are like the eyelids of the morning;" like the brightening dawn of day. The learned Bochart mentions a curious coincidence between this striking figure, and the sentiments of the Egyptians. Among that people, the eyes of the crocodile is the hieroglyphic for the dawn; because they first arrest the attention, as the terrible animal approaches the surface of the deep; or because they are dim, and command a very limited field of vision under the water, but recover their brilliancy and acuteness as soon as he returns to the open air. Such is the appearance of the solar orb at his rising; he seems to emerge from the waves of the sea with a dim and faded lustre, but which increases every moment as he advances towards the meridian. But how it can be asserted of the whale, that his eyes are like the eyelids of the morning, it is not easy to conjecture. His eyes, which are not much larger than those of an ox, are buried beneath a ponderous eyelid, and imbedded in fat. Hence, blind'er than a mole, he wanders almost at random in the mighty waters, equally unable to avoid being left by the retreating surge upon the strand, or dashed against the pointed rocks.—PAXTON.

Ver. 19. Out of his mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire leap out. 20. Out of his nostrils goeth smoke, as out of a seething-pot or caldron. 21. His breath kindleth coals, and a flame goeth out of his mouth.

Tatus gives a similar account of the hippopotamus: His nostrils are very broad, and emit an ignited smoke, as from a furnace of fire. "The very same remark is made by Eustathius: He has a broad nose, expiring an ignited smoke as out of a furnace. These two animals live in the same element, and have the same mode of respiration. The longer they continue under water without breathing, they respire the more quickly when they begin to emerge. As the torrent rushes along with greater impetuosity, when the obstacle which opposed its progress is removed; so their breath, long repressed, effervesces and breaks out with so much violence, that they seem to vomit flame from their mouth and nostrils. The whale, it must be admitted, being of much larger size than the crocodile, breathes with a proportionate vehemence; it does not, however, vomit fire, but spouts water to an immense height in the air. The language of the inspired writer is highly figurative and hyperbolical, painting, in the most vivid colours, the heat and force with which the breath of the crocodile rushes from his expanded nostrils.—PAXTON.

Ver. 22. In his neck remaineth strength, and sorrow is turned into joy before him.

The whale has no neck, and by consequence cannot be the leviathan: like other fishes, his head is joined to his shoulders; while the crocodile is formed like a serpent, with a neck and shoulders, which enable him to move, to raise, or turn back his head, when he seizes his prey. "Sorrow is turned into joy before him;" what afflictions, alarms, or depresses other animals, animates his courage and activity. Or the words may be rendered, Sorrow dances before him; which may denote, that he spreads terror and destruction wherever he comes; for he immediately rushes upon those that happen to meet his eye, and although they may be so fortunate as to escape, still they reckon it an ill omen to have fallen in the way of that fierce and savage destroyer. Thus terror marches before him, as a herald before his sovereign, to proclaim his approach, and prepare his way.—PAXTON.

Ver. 23. The flakes of his flesh are joined together: they are firm in themselves; they cannot be moved. 24. His heart is as firm as a stone; yea, as hard as a piece of the nether millstone.

As the scales of leviathan present a coat of mail nearly impenetrable to the attacks of his enemies; so his flesh, or, as it is rendered by some, the prominent parts of his body, are like molten brass, the particles of which adhere so closely, that they cannot be separated. The very reverse of what Job affirmed of himself, may be asserted of the crocodile; his strength is the strength of stones, and his flesh is formed of brass; the very refuse, the vilest parts of his flesh, (for so the word signifies,) are firm, and strong, and joined; or, as the Septuagint translates it, glued together, that they cannot be moved. But if the refuse of his flesh be so firm and hard, how great must be the strength which belongs to the nobler parts of his frame? This question is answered in the next verse: "His heart is as firm as a stone; yea, as hard as a piece of the nether millstone." In all creatures, the heart is extremely firm and compact; in the leviathan it is firm as a stone; and to give us the highest idea of its hardness, Jehovah compares it to the nether millstone, which, having the principal part of the work to perform, is required to be peculiarly hard and solid. Some writers imagine, that the Almighty refers, not so much to the natural hardness of the heart, as to the cruel temper of the animal, or to his fearless intrepidity; he feels no pity, he fears no danger, he is insensible to external impressions as the hardest stone.—PAXTON.

Ver. 25. When he raiseth up himself, the mighty are afraid: by reason of breakings they purify themselves.

They feel a secret horror shoot through the whole soul; they become as it were incapable of reflection, and know not whither to turn, when they see the monster emerging from the deep, thirsting for blood, and displaying the terrors of his opening jaws. The stoutest heart is humbled, and, like the mariners in the ship with Jonah, when they despair of life, they cry every one to his God, and promise to break off their sins by righteousness.—PAXTON.

Ver. 26. The sword of him that layeth at him cannot hold; the spear, the dart, nor the habergeon. 27. He esteemeth iron as a straw, and brass as rotten wood. 28. The arrow cannot make him flee: sling-stones are turned with him into stubble. 29. Darts are counted as stubble: he laugheth at the shaking of a spear.

In this glowing description, it is plainly the design of the Almighty to show, that the skin of the crocodile is impenetrable to these offensive weapons; or else, that regardless of danger, he scorns the wounds they inflict, and with fearless impetuosity seizes on his prey. This entirely accords with the accounts which natural historians give of that animal. Peter Martyr asserts that his skin is so hard it cannot be pierced with arrows; and according to other writers, he can be wounded only in the belly. But it is well known, that the whale is vulnerable in every part, and is commonly struck with the harpoon on the back, where the crocodile is defended by an impenetrable buckler of large, extremely hard, and closely compacted scales. On this armour of proof, the edge of the sword is blunted, and its point is broken; the spear falls harmless to the ground, and the dart rebounds from his impenetrable covering. But the habergeon, the coat of mail which the combatant puts on for his own defence, shall not save him from the devouring jaws of the monster; for he esteemeth iron as straw, and brass as rotten wood, which yield to the slightest touch, and crumble into dust before the smallest force. A shower of arrows makes no impression upon him; and the blow of a stone, slung by the most powerful hand, is no more to him than the stroke of a feather, or bit of stubble. Nor do the more dangerous weapons which the warrior hurls from his military engines, depress his courage, or interrupt his assault; for he laughs at the shaking of a spear, he regards it not, when, in token of defiance it is brandished before him.—PAXTON.

Ver. 30. Sharp stones are under him: he spreadeth sharp-pointed things upon the mire.

What is extremely incommodious, or even painful to other creatures, occasions no uneasiness to him. Criminals were punished among the ancients, by being compelled to lie on sharp stones; but so insensible is he to pain, that he can stretch his enormous bulk upon them without inconvenience: "Sharp stones are under him; he spreadeth sharp-pointed things upon the mire." Such a place of repose is his choice, not his punishment. Or the words may refer to the scales of leviathan, which are hard and sharp as a potsherd; and to his skin, which resembles a board set with sharp stones, or iron spikes. So rough is the skin of the crocodile, so hard are his scales, and so high and pointed the protuberances which rise on his back, that a more apt similitude could not be chosen than the tribula, or sharp thrashing instrument with iron teeth, to represent in the liveliest manner, the appearance of this terrible animal, as he lies reposing in the mud of the Nile.—PAXTON.

Ver. 31. He maketh the deep to boil like a pot; he maketh the sea like a pot of ointment.

Having described his general appearance, in which we have discovered almost every circumstance fitted to strike the mind with terror, and the impression which his emerging from the deep, and approaching the land, produce in the mind of a beholder, the inspired writer goes on to state the astonishing effects of his return to the water: "He makes the deep to boil like a pot; he makes the sea like a pot of ointment." The first clause exhibits the natural effect of a large body plunging suddenly into deep water; the second brings into view another circumstance, which beautifully expresses the violent agitation of the gulf into which the leviathan precipitates himself: "He maketh the sea to boil like a pot of ointment." The sudden and violent displacing of the waters, makes the sea resemble a large caldron furiously boiling over a strong fire; or the ascending water, being mixed with sand and mud from the bottom, excited by the violent agitation, resembles in colour, and in the smoothness of its swell, a pot of ointment; than which, more striking figures can scarcely be presented to the mind. It is the opinion of ancient writers, that the crocodile exhales from his body an odour like musk, with which he perfumes the pool where he gambols; and they assign this as the reason that the turbulence of the gulf which receives him, is compared to the boiling of a pot of ointment. But admitting what so many have asserted, that the crocodile diffuses a fragrant odour around him, it can hardly be supposed that the quantity exhaled can be so great as to warrant such a comparison. The inspired writer seems to allude, not to the ointment or its fragrance, but to the boiling of the pot in which spices are decocting, an operation which probably requires a very brisk ebullition.

Those who maintain that leviathan is the whale, demand how the crocodile, which inhabits the river, can make the sea boil? But the difficulty admits of an easy solution; the word sea, both in Hebrew and English, is often used in a restricted sense for any large expanse of water. The Jewish and Arabian writers, agreeably to this sense, frequently speak of the Nile, and its adjacent lakes, as a sea, and with great propriety, for the river itself is broad and deep, and at a certain season of the year, it overflows its banks, and covers the whole surface of Lower Egypt. The lakes which have been formed by the inundations, are of considerable depth and extent, and swarm with crocodiles; these may be called seas, with as much propriety as the sacred writers of the New Testament call the lake of Sodom the Salt Sea, and the lake of Tiberias the Sea of Galilee. The royal Psalmist, it must be admitted, mentions the sea in the proper sense of the term, as the haunt of leviathan: "So is this great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable; both small and great beasts. There go the ships: there is that leviathan whom thou hast made to play therein." But as the sea is, in that passage, opposed to the earth, it may comprehend the whole body of waters which surround and intersect the dry land, and by consequence, the proper habitation of the crocodile. This solution, however, is by no means necessary to establish the claims of this animal to the scripture title of leviathan, for it has been fully ascertained, by modern travellers, that he actually frequents the sea, although he generally prefers those rivers which are subject to annual inundations. Crocodiles, or alligators, are very common on the coast and in the deep rivers of Jamaica, though they prefer the banks of such rivers as, in consequence of frequent or periodical overflowing, are covered with mud, in which they find abundance of testaceous fish, worms, and frogs, for food. In South America, they chiefly frequent marshy lakes, and drowned savannas; but in North America, they infest both the salt parts of the rivers near the sea, the fresh currents above the reach of the tide, and the lakes both of salt and fresh water. The slimy banks of these rivers within the range of the tide, are covered by thick forests of mangrove-trees, in the entangled thickets of which the crocodiles conceal themselves, and lie in wait for their prey. According to Pinto, they abound on the coast of New Guinea; and Dampier found several on the shores of Timor, an island in the South Sea. The hippopotamus is a powerful adversary to the crocodile, and so much the more dangerous, that it is able to pursue him to the very bottom of the gulf. They are so numerous in the bay of Vincent Pinçon, and the lakes which communicate with it, as to obstruct, by their numbers, the piraguas and canoes which navigate those waters. When De la Borde was sailing along the eastern shore of South America in a canoe, and wishing to enter a small river, he found its mouth occupied by about a dozen large crocodiles. These testimonies prove, beyond a doubt, that the crocodile frequents the mouths of rivers and the bays of the sea, as well as the fresh-water stream and lake; and by consequence, the Psalmist might, in perfect agreement with the habits of that animal, represent him as playing in the great and wide sea, while the ships pursue their way to the desired haven.—PAXTON.

Ver. 32. He maketh a path to shine after him; one would think the deep to be hoary.

He swims with so much force and violence near the surface of the water, that his path may be easily traced by the deep furrow which he leaves behind him, and the whitening foam he excites. The same appearance attends the motion of the dolphin: but the long whistling furrow, and the hoary foam, are not confined to the sea; they are likewise to be seen in the river and in the lake; and by consequence, may characterize, with sufficient propriety, the motion of the crocodile in the Nile and its adjacent lakes.—PAXTON.

Ver. 33. Upon earth there is not his like, who is made without fear.

This clause Bochart renders, There is not his like upon the dust, (which is certainly the true meaning of the phrase, al apha;) because, the crocodile is rather to be classed among reptiles than quadrupeds. His feet are so short, that he rather seems to creep than walk, so that he may, with great propriety, be reckoned among "the creeping things of the earth." But he differs from reptiles in this, that while they are in danger of being trampled upon, and bruised by the foot of the passenger, he is liable to no such accident. It cannot be said, in strictness of speech, that he is made without fear, for he is known to fly from the bold and resolute attack of an enemy; but the expression may be understood hyperbolically, as denoting a very high degree of intrepidity. The words of the inspired writer, however, are capable of another version, which at once removes the difficulty, and corresponds with the real character of the animal: He is so made, that he cannot be bruised; he cannot be crushed like a serpent, or trampled under the feet of his pursuer.—PAXTON.

Ver. 34. He beholdeth all high things: he is a king over all the children of pride.

"He beholdeth all high things;" or, as it may be translated, he despiseth all that is high; "he is a king over all the children of pride." No creature is so large, so strong, so courageous, if we can believe the oriental writers, but he regards it with indifference or contempt. Men, women, and particularly children, who incautiously approach his haunts, become a prey to his devouring maw. The camel, the horse, the ox, and other portly quadrupeds, which fall in his way, he fiercely attacks, and forthwith devours. He will even venture to encounter, and not always without success, the elephant and the tiger, when they come to drink in the stream. His first attempt is to strike them down to the ground, or break their legs with his tail, in which he generally succeeds: he then drags them to the bottom of the river; or if they are animals of a moderate size, he swallows them up entire, without taking the trouble of putting them to death. The alligator, says Forbes, sometimes basks in the sunbeams on the banks of the river, but oftener floats on its surface: there concealing his head and feet, he appears like the rough trunk of a tree both in shape and colour: by this deception, dogs and other animals fearlessly approach, and are suddenly plunged to the bottom by their insidious foe. Even the royal tiger, when he quits his covert and comes to drink at the stream, becomes his prey. From this description, it appears that no animal is more terrible than the crocodile; no creature in form, in temper, in strength, and in habits, so nearly resembles leviathan, as described by Jehovah himself, in the book of Job, and consequently none has equally powerful claims to the name. This conclusion is greatly strengthened by several allusions to the leviathan in other parts of scripture. In the prophecies of Isaiah, he is called "the piercing serpent," or dragon: and that the prophet under that symbol refers to the king of Egypt, appears from these words: "And it shall come to pass on that day, that the Lord shall beat off from the channel of the river unto the stream of Egypt, and ye shall be gathered one by one." The prophet Ezekiel gives to Pharaoh the name of the great dragon, or leviathan: "Speak and say, thus sayeth the Lord God: Behold, I am against thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers: which has said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself." But it would certainly be very preposterous to give the name of the elephant to the king of Egypt, which is neither a native of that country, nor ever known to visit the banks of the Nile. In allusion to the destruction of Pharaoh and his army in the Red Sea, the Psalmist sings: "Thou didst divide the sea by thy strength; thou brakest the heads of the dragons in the water; thou brakest the heads of leviathan in pieces, and gavest him to be meat to the people inhabiting the wilderness." But why should Pharaoh and his people be compared so frequently, and with so much emphasis, to the great dragon or leviathan, but because some remarkable, some terrible creature, infests their valley, to which that name properly applies? But no formidable beast of prey, except the crocodile, distinguishes Egypt from the surrounding regions; and since this creature is universally allowed to be extremely strong, cruel, and destructive, we must conclude it is no other than the leviathan of the inspired writers. The inhabitants of Egypt regarded the crocodile as the most powerful defender of their country, and the Nile as the source of all their pleasures and sociable enjoyments, and elevated both to the rank of deities. This accounts for the singular language of the prophet Ezekiel, and the boast which he puts into the mouth of Pharaoh: "My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself."—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XLII.

Ver. 10. And the LORD turned the captivity of Job, when he prayed for his friends; also the LORD gave Job twice as much as he had before.

Our idea of captivity seems to be principally confined to prisoners of war; but in the East, adversity, great adversity, and many other troubles, are spoken of in the same way. Thus, a man formerly in great prosperity, speaks of his present state as if he were in prison. "I am now a captive." "Yes, I am a slave." If again elevated, "his captivity is changed."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 11. Then came there unto him all his brethren, and all his sisters, and all they that had been of his acquaintance before, and did eat bread with him in his house; and they bemoaned him, and comforted him over all the evil that the LORD had brought upon him: every man also gave him a piece of money, and every one an ear-ring of gold.

The custom alluded to of relations and friends giving relief to a person in distress, is practised in the East at this day. When a man has suffered a great loss by an accident, by want of skill, or by the roguery of another, he goes to his brothers and sisters, and all his acquaintances, and describes his misfortunes. He then mentions a day when he will give a feast, and invites them all to partake of it. At the time appointed they come, arrayed in their best robes, each having money, ear-rings, finger-rings, or other gifts suited to the condition of the person in distress. The individual himself meets them at the gate, gives them a hearty welcome, the music strikes up, and the guests are ushered into the apartments prepared for the feast. When they have finished their repast, and are about to retire, they each approach the object of their commiseration, and present their donations, and best wishes for future prosperity. A rich merchant in North Ceylon, named Siva Sangu Chetty, was suddenly reduced to poverty; but by this plan he was restored to his former prosperity. Two money brokers, also, who were sent to these parts by their employer, (who lived on the opposite continent), lost one thousand six-dollars, belonging to their master; they therefore called those of their caste, profession, and country, to partake of a feast, at which time the whole of their loss was made up. When a young man puts on the ear-rings or turban for the first time, a feast of the same description, and for the same purpose, is given, to enable him to meet the expense of the rings, and to assist him in future pursuits of life. When a young woman also becomes marriageable, the female relations and acquaintances are called to perform the same service, in order to enable her to purchase jewels, or to furnish a marriage portion. In having recourse to this custom, there is nothing that is considered mean; for parents who are respectable and wealthy often do the same thing. Here, then, we have another simple and interesting illustration of a most praiseworthy usage of the days of ancient Job.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 14. And he called the name of the first Jemima; and the name of the second, Kezia; and the name of the third, Kerenhappuch.

To vary names by substituting a word similar in sound, is very prevalent in the East. The following extract from Sir Thomas Roe, is a striking example of this circumstance. "They speak very much in honour of Moses, whom they call Moosa carim Alla, Moses the publisher of the mind of God: so of Abraham, whom they call Ibrahim carim Alla, Abraham the honoured, or the friend, of God: so of Ishmael, whom they call Ismal, the sacrifice of God: so of Jacob, whom they call Acob, the blessing of God: so of Joseph, whom they call Esoff, the betrayed for God: so of David, whom they call Dahood, the lover and praiser of God: so of Solomon, whom they call Selymon, the wisdom of God: all expressed in short Arabian words, which they sing in ditties, unto their particular remembrance. Many men are called by these names: others are called Mahmud, or Chaan, which signifies the moon; or Frista, which signifies a star. And they call their women by the names of spices or odours; or of pearls or precious stones; or else by other names of pretty or pleasing signification. So Job called his daughters."—BURDEA.

Ver. 15. And in all the land were no women found so fair as the daughters of Job: and their father gave them inheritance among their brethren.

In the scriptures the word fair may sometimes refer to the form of the features, as well as the colour of the skin: but great value is attached to a woman of a light complexion. Hence our English females are greatly admired in the East, and instances have occurred where great exertions have been made to gain the hand of a fair daughter of Britain. The acme of perfection in a Hindoo lady is to be of the colour of gold!—ROBERTS.

THE BOOK OF PSALMS.

PSALM I.

Ver. 3. And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season: his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.

Dr. Boothroyd has it, "Like a tree planted by water streams;" and Dr. A. Clarke says, "The streams or divisions of waters." This probably alludes to the artificial streams which run from the lakes or wells: by the side of these may be seen trees, at all seasons covered with luxuriant verdure, blossoms, or fruit, because the root is deriving continual nourishment from the stream; while at a distance, where no water is, may be seen dwarfish and unhealthy trees, with scarcely a leaf to shake in the winds of heaven.—ROBERTS.

We see no reason to suppose, with many commentators, that allusion is had to any particular species of tree, as, for example, the palm, the olive, or the pomegranate, each of which has been conceived to be intended, from its peculiar adaptedness to represent the permanent and prolific nature of the good man's happiness. It is indeed said of the righteous, Ps. xcii. 13, that "he shall flourish like the palm-tree; he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon;" but it will answer all the demands of the passage to understand it of any tree advantageously situated, and evincing a vigorous and thrifty growth. In the arid climes of the East, the trees, unless sustained by artificial irrigation, are apt to lose their verdure during the sultriness of the summer months—a fact which affords an interesting clew to the imagery here employed. Although the word "rivers" is adopted in our authorized translation, yet it is by no means an adequate representative of the original. נָחַל the term thus rendered, from נָחַל to divide, to sunder, to split, properly signifies divisions, partitions, sections; i. e. branching cuts, trenches, or water-courses, issuing either from a large body of water, as a lake, a pond, a river, Ps. xli. 4; or from a well or fountain-head, Prov. v. 16. Job xxvi. 6; and alludes to the methods still practised among the oriental nations, of conveying water to gardens and orchards. This was by means of canals or rivulets flowing in artificial channels, called נָחַל divisions; i. e. cuts or trenches, which distributed the water in all directions. The whole land of Egypt was anciently sluiced in this manner, by innumerable canals and water-courses, designed to convey the fertilizing waters of the Nile over every part of the valley through which it ran. Maundrell (Trav. p. 122) speaks of a similar mode of irrigation in the neighbourhood of Damascus: "The gardens are thick set with fruit trees of all kinds, kept fresh and verdant by the waters of the Barady. This river, as soon as it issues out of the cleft of the mountain before mentioned, into the plain, is immediately divided into three streams, of which the middlemost and largest runs directly to Damascus, through a large open field called the Ager Damascusus, and is distributed to all the cisterns and fountains in the city. The other two, which I take to be the work of art, are drawn round, the one to the right, the other to the left, on the borders of the gardens, into which they are let out, as they pass, by little rivulets, and so disposed all over the vast wood; inasmuch that there is not a garden, but has a fine, quick stream running through it." The same traveller describing, p. 89, the orange garden of the emir of Beyroot, observes, that "it contains a large quadrangular plot of ground divided into sixteen lesser squares, four in a row, with walks between them. The walks are shaded with orange-trees of a large spreading size. Every one of these sixteen lesser squares in the garden was bordered with stone; and in the stone-work were troughs, very artificially contrived, for conveying the water all over the garden; there being little outlets cut at every tree for the stream, as it passed by, to flow out and water it." A striking allusion to trees cultivated in this manner occurs Ezek. xxxi. 3, 4: "Behold, the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon, with fair branches and with a shadowing shroud, and of a high stature, and his top was among the thick boughs. The waters made him great, the deep set him up on high, with her rivers running round about his plants, and sent out her little rivers unto all the trees of the field." So Eccl. ii. 6, "I made me pools of water to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees." To the same purpose, Prov. xxi. 1, "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of waters, (עַל-מַיִם) divisions of waters; he turneth it whithersoever he will," i. e. as these fertilizing rivulets, the work of art, are conducted forward and backward, to the right hand or the left, diverted or stopped at the will of him who manages them, so is the heart of kings, and, by parity of reasoning, of the rich and mighty of the earth, swayed at the sovereign disposal of the Lord of all creatures. He, by the course of his providence, and by the inward promptings of his Spirit, can turn the enriching tide of their bounty in any direction he sees fit, whether to bless the poor with bread, or to supply the means of salvation to the destitute.—BENSA.

Ver. 4. The ungodly are not so: but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away.

We must recollect here, that in the East the thrashing-floors are places in the open air, (Gen. l. 10), on which the corn is not thrashed, as with us, but beaten out by means of a sledge, in such a manner that the straw is at the same time cut very small. "When the straw is cut small enough, they put fresh corn in the place, and afterward separate the corn from the cut-straw, by throwing it in the air with a wooden shovel, for the wind drives the straw a little farther, so that only the pure corn falls to the ground." (Thevenot).—ROSENMULLER.

PSALM II.

Ver. 1. Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing?

The Hebrew word which Luther has translated heathen, (gajim), signifies, in fact, people in general; but it is used in the Old Testament, for the most part, and by the later (and even modern) Jews, exclusively of other nations who are not Jews, and that with a contemptuous and odious secondary meaning. Other nations, also, have similar names for foreigners, and for such as are not of their religious faith. Thus the Greeks and Romans called them Barbarians, that is, properly, inhabitants of the desert. The Arabs called them Adchem, by which they mean, first, their neighbours the Persians, and then all foreigners in general. The Mohammedans call all the people of the earth, who do not believe the pretended divine mission of Mohammed, Kuffar in the plural, Kafar in the singular, and by a corrupted pronunciation, Gaur, (Giavur), which signifies unbelievers and infidels. Hence the name Kafers, which the inhabitants of the southeastern coast of Africa received from the Mohammedan Arabs.—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 9. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel.

"Begone! wretch," says the infuriated man, "or I will dash thee to pieces as a kuddam," i. e. an earthen vessel.—ROBERTS.

The rod, in remote antiquity, was a wooden staff, not much shorter than the height of a man, with golden studs or nails, or sometimes ornamented at the top with a round knob, such as are seen in the hands of the Persian kings, on the monuments of Persepolis. Justin says, "that at the time of the rape of the Sabine virgins, the kings, as insignia of their dignity, bore, instead of the diadem, long staves, which the Greeks called sceptres." Hence it may be conceived how, in Homer, kings made use of the sceptre to strike with. The sceptre, as well as throne, is often used as a symbol of government. Hence in Ps. xlv. 6, a right sceptre is the emblem of a just government. And in the above passage it is said of the king celebrated in this Psalm, that he would break his enemies with a rod of iron, by which his dominion is represented as terrible and destructive over those who oppose him. The sense is, that he will conquer them with irresistible power. A similar picture is given of the Messiah in Num. xxiv. 17. "There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners (according to Luther, the 'princes') of Moab."—ROSENMULLER.

PSALM V.

Ver. 7. But as for me, I will come into thy house in the multitude of thy mercy; and in thy fear will I worship towards thy holy temple.

It is very natural that people, when praying, should turn the face towards the quarter where the place dedicated to the Divinity is situated, and which is considered as his abode. Hence the Jews prayed with their faces turned towards the temple, (1 Kings viii. 38, 44, 48;) and those residing out of Jerusalem, turned it towards that point of the heavens in which Jerusalem lay. Dan. vi. 10. Thus the Mohammedans, when praying, always turn their faces towards Mecca. "Kebla," says Bjornstahl, "signifies, in Arabic, the point towards which all true Mussulmen turn their faces when praying; whether in the open air or in their temples, where it is always marked by a niche, in which not only the iman stands, but also some finely written copies of the Koran are lying. This point is always towards Mecca; for there stands the Caaba, or quadrangular house, said to have been first built by Abraham and Ishmael, and which is the great sanctuary of the Mohammedans, for the sake of which such great pilgrimages are annually undertaken to Mecca, and thence to Medina, where Mohammed is buried."—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 12. For thou, LORD, wilt bless the righteous; with favour wilt thou compass him as with a shield.

A shield is a defensive piece of armour, and is used to ward off the blows that are aimed at the person who wears it. In this passage of the Psalmist it is spoken of in a different sense. It is to be used by a divine power for the preservation of the people of God: and, connected with their safety, they are to be honoured and exalted: and both their preservation and exaltation are to be so complete, that they are said to be compassed about with the favour of God as with a shield, in the same manner as a person completely covered with, or elevated upon, a large broad shield. This interpretation of the words is paralleled by a practice which, subsequent to the age of the Psalmist, obtained among the Romans, of which the following instances may be selected: "Brinnus was placed on a shield, according to the custom of the nation, and being carried in triumph on the shoulders of the men, was declared commander-in-chief." The shields of the ancients, as a scholiast observes upon the Iliad, ii. 380, were so large as almost to cover a whole man, and hollowed, so that they in a manner enclosed the body in front. Hence Homer speaks of the surrounding shield. Tyrtæus, in the second of his hymns, still extant, says, "The warrior stands in the contest firm upon both feet; the hollow of the spacious shield covering below his sides and thighs, and his breast and shoulders above."—BURDER.

PSALM VI.

Title—To the chief Musician on Neginoth upon Shemith. A Psalm of David.

This superscription is in Luther, "upon eight strings." I can hardly think that a musical instrument of eight strings is meant here, as the Hebrew word (scheminith) does not appear among the musical instruments mentioned in the Old Testament. The meaning of the Hebrew word is, octave; and in 1 Chron. xv. 21, where the singers of the temple are enumerated, it stands after a word which properly signifies virgins, (alamoth) and may therefore signify a treble part, which was sung by women. "Might not this," says Forkal, "have signified among the Hebrews nearly the same that 'virgin air' signified among the German poets, called master-singers in the middle ages?"—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 2. Have mercy upon me, O LORD; for I am weak: O LORD, heal me; for my bones are vexed.

Dr. Boothroyd translates, "For my bones are troubled." The object of the expression appears to be, to show that the trouble has taken fast hold, it is deeply seated, my bones are its resting-place. The Hindoos, in extreme grief or joy, say, "our bones are melted;" i. e. like boiling lead, they are completely dissolved.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 8. Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity: for the LORD hath heard the voice of my weeping.

Silent grief is not much known in the East: hence, when the people speak of sorrow, they say its voice. "Have I not heard the voice of his lamentation?"—ROBERTS.

PSALM VII.

Ver. 12. If he turn not, he will whet his sword; he hath bent his bow, and made it ready.

The Hebrew word signifies literally, "that he hath trident on his bow," that is, to bend it. Arrian, in his Account of India, says, "Such of their warriors as combat on foot, carry a bow which is as long as a man. When they want to bend it, they set it upon the ground, and tread on it with the left foot, while they draw on the string."—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 13. He hath also prepared for him the instruments of death; he ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors.

This sentence may be rendered more accurately, "he makes his arrows burning." The image is deduced from such fiery arrows as are described by Ammianus Marcellinus. They consisted of a hollowed reed, to the lower part of which, under the point or barb, was fastened a round receptacle, made of iron, for combustible materials, so that such an arrow had the form of a distaff. The reed, as the above author says, was filled with burning napha; and when the arrow was shot from a slack bow, (for if discharged from a tight bow the fire went out,) it struck the enemies' ranks and remained infixd, the flame consuming whatever it met with; water poured on it increased its violence; there was no other means to extinguish it but by throwing earth upon it. Similar darts or arrows, which were twined round with tar and pitch, and set fire to, are described by Livy, as having been made use of by the inhabitants of the city of Saguntum, when besieged by the Romans. An allusion to such arrows is also made in Ephesians vi. 16.—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 14. Behold, he travaileth with iniquity, and hath conceived mischief, and brought forth falsehood.

Dr. Boothroyd translates this, "Lo, the wicked hath conceived iniquity, and is big with mischief; but an abortion shall he bring forth," which certainly corresponds better with the order of the figure of the text. "What induces that man to come so much to this place? depend upon it, he is preparing some plans."—"Yes, I am of opinion his womb has conceived something." Does the person begin to disclose his purposes, it is said, "Ah! it is this you have been conceiving the last few days." But when he puts his plans into practice, "Yes, he is now in parturition."

"Well! how has the matter ended?"—"Ended! he has brought forth poynkul," i. e. lies.—ROBERTS.

PSALM VIII.

Ver. 6. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands: thou hast put all things under his feet.

This is a common figure of speech to denote the superiority of one man over another; hence the worshippers of the gods often say in their devotions, "We put your feet upon our heads." "Truly, the feet of Siva are upon my head." "My Gooroo, my Gooroo, have I not put your feet upon my head?" "My lord, believe not that man; your feet have always been upon my head." "Ah! a mighty king was he; all things were under his feet."—ROBERTS.

PSALM IX.

Ver. 14. That I may show forth all thy praise in the gates of the daughter of Zion: I will rejoice in thy salvation.

That is, in Jerusalem, meaning in the temple itself. The "gates of the daughter of Zion" are opposed to the "gates of death," mentioned in the preceding verse. Zion is the general name of the mountain, on whose irregular eminences the city of Jerusalem was built. But in a more limited sense, the name of Zion was given to the highest of those eminences, on which, besides a part of the city, the palace of David, and several public buildings, were built. This Mount Zion was joined on the south side by means of a bridge, with the mountain or hill of Moriah, which was entirely occupied by the extensive buildings of the temple. In the Old Testament, we are often to understand by Zion and Jerusalem, the national sanctuary, the temple particularly, where, as in the above passage, the adoration of God, and the thanksgivings to be publicly offered him, are spoken of. Zion or Jerusalem is called daughter, because the Hebrews used to figure cities, communities, and states, under the images of women, and the inhabitants as children. Thus, the daughter of Tyre, the daughter of Babylon, for the city of Tyre and the city of Babylon. Even now, the head of the government of Tunis, in Barbary, is called Dey, or Day, that is, as D'Arvioux observes, mother's brother; because the republic is considered as the mother, the citizens as her children, and the Turkish sultan as the consort of the republic.—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 15. The heathen are sunk down in the pit that they made: in the net which they hid is their own foot taken.

This image is taken from the catching of wild beasts, by means of strong ropes or nets. Lichtenstein, in speaking of the hunting of the Koofsa, (Kaffers), says, "They catch much game by means of nets; in the woody districts, they often make low hedges, miles in length, between which they leave openings; in these openings, through which the game tries to escape, they conceal snares, which are placed so ingeniously that the animals are caught in them by the leg, and cannot extricate themselves." Also lions and elephants are caught in this manner; the latter, when they have been brought by means of fire, or by tame elephants, to a narrow place, where they cannot turn back, are caught by throwing ropes round their legs.

Ropes and nooses are meant by the figurative expression, snares of death, 2 Sam. xxii. 6, which the people of the ancient world used, both in the chase and in war. The word is sometimes rendered net, as in this passage. Arriz, in his Treatise on Hunting, relates, that Cyrus met with wild asses in the plains of Arabia, which were so swift, that none of his horsemen were able to catch them. Yet the young Lybians, even boys of eight years of age, or not much older, had pursued them, mounted on their horses, without saddle or bridle, till they threw a noose over them, and thus took them. He gives instructions to pursue stags with "rained horses and dogs, till they can be either shot with arrows, or taken alive by throwing a noose over them. These are the strong snares which Pollux means, when he speaks of the wild asses, and they are also the same as those in which Habis, the natural son of an ancient Spanish king, was taken. He was exposed when a child, and suckled by a hind: having grown up among the stags, he had attained their swiftness, so that he fled with them over the mountains, and traversed forests, till he was at length caught in a noose. In the same manner Ulloa saw the Guasos (one of the aboriginal Peruvian nations) catch with their nooses (the Spanish lazo) the most active and cautious man as easily as the wild bull. Some English pirates once approaching their shore, and thinking to drive off the Guasos with their firearms, the latter threw their nooses towards the vessels, and so pulled on shore those who had not fallen down at first sight; one who was caught escaped with his life, notwithstanding he had been thus violently drawn from the boat to the shore, the noose having caught him over the shoulder on the one side, and the arm on the other; but it was some time before he was able to recover his strength. In the same manner the Sagartian horsemen in the Persian army used their nooses in war.—(Herodotus.) These people, who, according to Stephanus, lived on the Caspian Sea, had no other arms than a noose and a dagger, to kill with the one the enemy whom they had caught with the other. The same is related by Pausanias, of the Sauromatæ.—ROSENMULLER.

PSALM X.

Ver. 5. His ways are always grievous: thy judgments are far above out of his sight: as for all his enemies, he puffeth at them.

Of a proud and powerful man, it is said, "He puffs away his foes;" i. e. they are so contemptible, so light, that like a flake of cotton, he puffs them from his presence. Great is the contempt which is shown by puffing through the mouth and blowing through the nostrils.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 15. Break thou the arm of the wicked and the evil man: seek out his wickedness till thou find none.

This member is often selected as an object for imprecations. "Ah! the kellan, the thief, his hand shall be torn off for that." "Evil one, thou wilt lose thy hand for this violence." But the hand or arm is also selected as an object for blessings. "My son, (says the father), may the gods keep thy hands and thy feet."—ROBERTS.

PSALM XI.

Ver. 6. Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire, and brimstone, and a horrible tempest: this shall be the portion of their cup.

The gods are described as doing this upon their enemies; and magicians, in cursing each other, or those who are the objects of their ire, say, the fiery rain shall descend upon them.—ROBERTS.

PSALM XIV.

Ver. 4. Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who eat up my people as they eat bread, and call not upon the Lord.

"Wicked one, the fiends shall eat thee." "That vile king eats the people as he does his rice." "Go not near that fellow, he will eat thee." But, strange as it may appear, relations say of those of their friends who are dead, they have EATEN them. Thus, a son, in speaking of his deceased parent, says, "Alas! alas! I have eaten my father." "My child, my child!" says the bereaved mother, "have I eaten you?" The figure conveys extreme grief, and an intimation that the melancholy event has been occasioned by the sins or faults of the survivors. In cursing a married man, it is common to say, "Yes, thou wilt soon have to eat thy good wife." And to a poor widow, "Wretch! hast thou not eaten thy husband?"—ROBERTS.

PSALM XVI.

Ver. 4. Their sorrows shall be multiplied that hasten after another god: their drink-offerings of blood will I not offer, nor take up their names into my lips.

This refers to the custom of many heathen people, to drink the wine of the sacrifice mixed with blood, particularly when they bound themselves by dreadful oaths, and to the performance of fearful deeds. This drink was called by the Romans vinum assiratum, because assir, according to Festus, signifies blood in the ancient Latin language. In this manner, as Sallust relates, Catiline took the oaths with his accomplices. "It was said at the time that Catiline, after making a speech, calling on the accomplices of his crime to take an oath, presented them with human blood mixed with wine, in cups; and when every one had drunk of it, after pronouncing an imprecation, as is customary in solemn sacrifices, explained his plan." In a similar manner, Silius Italicus makes the Carthaginian Hannibal swear, an instance which is particularly suitable to illustrate the above passage, because the Carthaginians were of Phœnician or Canaanite origin. When the prophet Zechariah describes the conversion of the Philistines, he makes Jehovah say, (x. 7.) "And I will take away his blood out of his mouth, and his abominations from between his teeth; but he that remaineth, even he, shall be for our God." The drinking of blood at sacrifices was prohibited to the Israelites upon pain of death.—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 7. I will bless the LORD, who hath given me counsel; my reins also instruct me in the night-seasons.

Night is the time for the chief joys and sorrows of the Hindus, and it is then they are principally engaged in the worship of their gods; because they believe praise is more acceptable to them then, than at any other period. It is believed, also, that the senses have more power in the night; that then is the time for thought and instruction; hence they profess to derive much of their wisdom at that season. The Psalmist says, "Thou hast visited me in the night;" and the heathen priests always pretend to have their communications with the gods "when deep sleep falleth on man." See them at their bloody sacrifices, they are nearly always held at the same time, and what with the sickly glare of lamps, the din of drums, the shrill sound of trumpets, the anxious features of the votaries, the ferocious scowl of the sacrificer, the bloody knife, and the bleeding victim, all wind up the mind to a high pitch of horror, and excite our contempt for the deities and demons to whom night is the time of offering and praise.—ROBERTS.

PSALM XVII.

Ver. 2. Let my sentence come forth from thy presence; let thine eyes behold the things that are equal.

David, in his integrity, thus cried to the Almighty, and so people in the East, who are innocent, when pleading in court, say, "Let us have yore sentence;" i. e. in contradiction of that of their enemies. "See, my lord, the things that are right." "Justice! justice!"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 10. They are enclosed in their own fat: with their mouth they speak proudly.

To say a man is fat, often means he is very proud. Of one who speaks pompously, it is said, "What can we do? tassi-kul-lap-inai," i. e. from the fat of his flesh he declares himself. "Oh! the fat of his mouth; how largely he talks!" "Take care, fellow, or I will restrain the fat of thy mouth." "From the intoxication of his blood he thus talks to you."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 11. They have now compassed us in our steps; they have set their eyes bowing down to the earth.

A man who has people watching him to find out a cause for accusation to the king, or great men, says, "Yes, they are around my legs and my feet; their eyes are always open; they are ever watching my suradu," i. e. steps; i. e. they are looking for the impress, or footsteps, in the earth. For this purpose, the eyes of the enemies of David were "bowing down to the earth."—ROBERTS.

PSALM XVIII.

Ver. 2. The LORD is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer; my God, my strength, in whom I will trust; my buckler, and the horn of my salvation, and my high tower.

See on Eph. 6. 16.

That is, my strong, mighty deliverer. The image is taken from the bull, whose strength and defensive weapon lie in his horns. Hence a horn is the symbol of strength. Jer. xlviii. 25, says, "The horn of Moab is cut off;" that is, his power is weakened. Micah i. 13, says, "Arise and thrash, O daughter of Zion; for I will make thy horn iron, and I will make thy foot brass; and thou shalt beat in pieces many people." Ps. cxxii. 17, "There will I make the horn of David to bud: I have adorned a lamp for mine anointed;" translated by Luther, "will make him strong and mighty." The Greeks and Romans made use of the same image. The former said of a bold and valiant man, "He has horns." Horace says of wine, that it revived the hope of the afflicted, and gave the poor "horns," that is, courage and strength.—ROSENMULLER.

The most extraordinary oriental costume which I have yet seen, is the head-dress worn by many females at Deir el Kamr, and in all the adjacent region of Mount Lebanon. In the cities on the seacoast it is not so frequently seen. It is called Tautoor, and is set on the forehead, projecting like a straight horn. It is from fifteen to twenty inches long; in its thickness gradually diminishing; having its diameter at one extremity about four inches, at the other about two. It is hollow, otherwise the weight would be insupportable to the stiffest neck; and it is tinselled over, so as to give it a silvery appearance. The end with the larger diameter rests on the forehead, where it is strapped to, by one strap passing behind the head, and another passing under the chin: the horn itself protrudes straight forward, inclining upward, at an angle of about twenty or thirty degrees. Over the further extremity they throw the veil, which thus serves the double purpose of modesty and shade.

I could hear no account of the origin of this uncouth costume. In its style it differs materially from the horns described by Bruce in Abyssinia, and by other travellers, which have been considered as illustrating those passages in scripture, "Lift not up your horn on high.—Thy horn hast thou exalted," &c. For here it is the females that wear it; and not the men, as in Abyssinia; it has no appearance of strength, nor indeed, to me, of beauty; although, doubtless, among the females of Mount Lebanon, there may be as much vanity in their mode of adjusting and bearing this article of dress, as is to be found at any European toilet. Some, indeed, though very few, wear this monstrous ornament protruding from one side of the face, instead of the front: but I could obtain no satisfactory account of this heretical fashion, any more than of the orthodox position of the Tautoor. It is not worn by the Druse women only. The servant of the house where I lived at Deir el Kamr wore one: so also did a young woman, whose marriage I there witnessed: several, likewise, of the virgins, that with her fellows, and bore her company, wore this head-dress, all these were Christians. Hanna Dooman told me that it is used chiefly by the lower orders: at least that those who have been brought up at Damascus, or at the principal cities, would not think of wearing it. In other words, probably, it is the true ancient female mountaineer's costume; but what is its degree of antiquity, it may be difficult to discover.—JOWETT.

Ver. 5. The sorrows of hell compassed me about; the snares of death prevented me.

The margin has, for sorrows, "cords." (2 Sam. xxii. 6. Prov. xiii. 14, and xiv. 27.) Dr. Boothroyd translates, "The cords of hades enclosed me; the snares o. death were laid for me." The Psalmist says in another place, He "shall rain snares" upon the wicked. From the parallel texts in Samuel and Proverbs, it is evident that DEATH, by the ancients, in figure at least, was PERSONIFIED and described as having SNARES, with which to catch the bodies of men. The Hindoo Yama, "the catcher of the souls of men," bears some resemblance to the Charon and Minos of the Egyptians and Grecians. Yama rides on a buffalo, has a large snare in his hand, and in every way a most hideous-looking monster. In his anxiety to fill his caves with mortals, he was often involved in great disputes with the gods and others; as in the case of Marcander, who was a favourite of the supreme Siva. He had already cast his snare upon him, and was about to drag him to the lower regions, when the deity appeared, and compelled him to relinquish his prey. When people are in the article of death, they are said to be caught in the snare of Yama. (See Mat. xxiii. 33.)—ROBERTS.

Ver. 33. He maketh my feet like hinds' feet, and setteth me upon my high places.

The allusions to this animal in the sacred volume, though not numerous, are of considerable importance. Its name in Hebrew, (שׁוֹר) ail, is considered by Dr. Shaw as a generic word, including all the species of the deer kind; whether they are distinguished by round horns, as the stag; or by flat ones, as the fallow-deer; or by the smallness of the branches, as the roe. The term originally signified aid or assistance; and, in the progress of language, by a natural and easy transition, came to denote an animal furnished with the means of defence, but limited to horned animals, particularly the stag and the hind. This creature seems to resemble the goat, in being remarkably sure-footed, and delighting in elevated situations.

The royal Psalmist alludes to both circumstances in one of his triumphant odes: "He maketh my feet like hinds' feet, and setteth me upon my high places." He might also refer, in the first clause, to the uncommon solidity and hardness of its hoof, which Virgil compares to brass, which enables it to tread, with ease, the pointed rocks. It may seem, from the words of David, that the female possesses a surer foot and a harder hoof than the male, for he ascribes to himself the feet of the hind; but since natural historians have not remarked any difference between them, it is probable he was led to the choice from some other cause, which it may not be easy to discover. The prophet Habakkuk, in the close of his prayer, has the same allusion, and nearly in the same words: "He will make my feet like hinds' feet, and he will make me to walk upon my high places." While the Psalmist contents himself with referring merely to the firmness and security of his position, "he setteth me upon my high places," the prophet encourages himself with the persuasion, that his God would conduct him through every danger, with the same ease and safety as the hind walks among the cliffs of the rock.—PAXTON.

PSALM XIX.

Ver. 4. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world.
In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun;
5. Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race.

The espousals by money, or a written instrument, were performed by the man and woman under a tent or canopy erected for that purpose. Into this chamber the bridegroom was accustomed to go with his bride, that he might talk with her more familiarly; which was considered as a ceremony of confirmation to the wedlock. While he was there, no person was allowed to enter; his friends and attendants waited for him at the door, with torches and lamps in their hands; and when he came out, he was received by all that were present with great joy and acclamation. To this ancient custom, the Psalmist alludes in his magnificent description of the heavens: "In them he set a tabernacle for the sun; which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoices as a strong man to run a race."—PAXTON.

Ver. 10. More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold; sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb.

There is no difference made among us, between the efficacy of honey in the comb, and after its separation from it. We may therefore be at a loss to enter into the energy of that expression, "Sweeter than honey, and the honeycomb," Ps. xix. 10; or, to express it with the same emphasis as our translation does the preceding clause, "Sweeter than honey, yea, than the honeycomb," which last, it should seem, from the turn of thought of the Psalmist, is as much to be preferred to honey, as the finest gold is to that of a more impure nature.

But this will appear in a more easy light, if the diet and the relish of the present Moors of West Barbary be thought to resemble those of the times of the Psalmist: for a paper published first in the Philosophical Transactions, and after that by Dr. Halley, in the Miscellanea Curiosa, informs us, that they esteem honey a wholesome breakfast, "and the most delicious that which is in the comb, with the young bees in it, before they come out of their cases, while they still look milkwhite, and resemble, being taking out, gentles, such as fishers use; these I have often ate of, but they seemed insipid to my palate, and sometimes I found they gave me the heartburn."—FLARMER.

PSALM XX.

Ver. 5. We will rejoice in thy salvation, and in the name of our God we will set up our banners: the LORD fulfil all thy petitions.

In all religious as well as warlike processions, the people carry banners. Hence on the pinnacles of their sacred cars, on the domes or gateways of their temples, and on the roof of a new house, may be seen the banner of the caste or sect floating in the air. Siva, the supreme, also is described as having a banner in the celestial world.

When a person makes a solemn vow to go on a pilgrimage, to perform a penance, or to bathe in holy water; or when a man has a dispute in a court of law, or in any other way; or when a disobedient son has resolved to act as he pleases; it is said, "Why try to move him from his purpose? lussil-katti, he has tied up, and stands by his banner;" which implies, he must and will abide by his purpose.—ROBERTS.

The banners formerly so much used were a part of military equipage, borne in times of war to assemble, direct, distinguish, and encourage the troops. They might possibly be used for other purposes also. Occasions of joy, splendid processions, and especially a royal habitation, might severally be distinguished in this way. The words of the Psalmist may perhaps be wholly figurative: but if they should be literally understood, the allusion of erecting a banner in the name of the Lord, acknowledging his glory, and imploring his favour, might be justified from an existing practice. Certain it is, that we find this custom prevalent on this very principle, in other places, into which it might originally have been introduced from Judea. Thus Mr. Turner says, "I was told that it was a custom with the soobah to ascend the hill every month, when he sets up a white flag, and performs some religious ceremonies, to conciliate the favour of a dewta, or invisible being, the genius of the place, who is said to hover about the summit, dispensing at his will good and evil to every thing around him." (Turner's Travels.)—BURNER.

PSALM XXII.

Title—To the chief Musician upon Ajeleth Shahr, (Hind of the Morning.) A Psalm of David.

Many curious observations have been made on the titles of the Psalms, but attended with the greatest uncertainty. Later eastern customs, respecting the titles of books and poems, may perhaps give a little more certainty to these matters; but great precision must not be expected. D'Herbelot tells us, that a Persian metaphysical and mystic poem was called a Rose Bush. A collection of moral essays, the Garden of Anemonies. Another eastern book, the Lion of the Forest. That Scherfeddin al Bausseri called a poem of his, written in praise of his Arabian prophet, who, he affirmed, had cured him of a paralytic disorder in his sleep, the Habit of a Dervesh; and because he is celebrated there for having given sight to a blind person, this poem is also entitled by its author, the Bright Star.

The ancient Jewish taste may reasonably be supposed to have been of the same kind. Agreeable to which is the explanation some learned men have given, of David's commanding the bow to be taught the children of Israel, 2 Sam. i. 18, which they apprehended did not relate to the use of that weapon in war, but to the hymn which he composed on occasion of the death of Saul and Jonathan, and from which he entitled this elegy, as they think, the Bow. The twenty-second Psalm might, in like manner, be called the Hind of the Morning; the fifty-sixth, the Dove dumb in distant places; the sixtieth, the Lily of the Testimony; the eightieth, the Lilies of the Testimony, in the plural; and the forty-fifth, simply the Lilies.

It is sufficiently evident, I should think, that these terms do not denote certain musical instruments. For if they did, why do the more common names of the timbre; the harp, the psalter, and the trumpet, with which psalms were sung, Ps. lxxxi. 2, 3, never appear in those titles?

Do they signify certain tunes? It ought not however to be imagined that these tunes are so called from their bearing some resemblance to the noises made by the things mentioned in the titles, for lilies are silent, if this supposition should otherwise have been allowed with respect to the Hind of the Morning. Nor does the fifty-sixth Psalm speak of the mourning of the dove, but of its dumbness. If they signify tunes at all, they must signify the tunes to which such songs or hymns were sung, as were distinguished by these names: and so the inquiry will terminate in this point, whether the Psalms to which these titles are affixed were called by these names; or whether they were some other psalms, or songs, to the tune of which these were to be sung. And as we do not find the bow referred to, nor the same name twice made use of, so far as our lights reach, it seems most probable that these are the names of those very Psalms to which they are prefixed.

The forty-second Psalm, it may be thought, might very well have been entitled the Hind of the Morning, because, as that panted after the water brooks, so panted the soul of the Psalmist after God; but the twenty-second Psalm, it is certain, might equally well be distinguished by this title, Dogs have compassed me, the assembly of the wicked have enclosed me: and as the Psalmist, in the forty-second Psalm, rather chose to compare himself to a hart, than a hind, the twenty-second Psalm much better answers this title, in which he speaks of his hunted soul in the feminine gender: Deliver my soul from the sword, my darling (which in the original is feminine) from the power of the dog. Every one that reflects on the circumstances of David, at the time to which the fifty-sixth Psalm refers, and considers the oriental taste, will not wonder to see that Psalm entitled the Dove dumb in distant places; nor are lilies more improper to be made the title of other Psalms, with proper distinctions, than a Garden of Anemones to be the name of a collection of moral discourses.—HARMER.

Ver. 6. But I am a worm, and no man; a reproach of men, and despised of the people.

When a man complains and abhors himself, he asks, "What am I? a worm! a worm!" "Ah! the proud man; he regarded me as a worm: well should I like to say to him, we are ALL worms." "Worm, crawl out of my presence."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 7. All they that see me laugh me to scorn; they shoot out the lip, they shake the head.

Ainsworth has this—"All they that see me, doe skoff at mee: they make-a-mow with the lip, they wag the head." It is exceedingly contemptuous to protrude the lower lip; and, generally speaking, it is only done to those of a mean condition. Those who cannot grant a favour, or who have not the power to perform something they have been requested to do, "shoot out the lip." To shake the head is a favourite way of giving the negative, and is also a mark of disdain.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 10. I was cast upon thee from the womb.

"What!" asks the old slave, "will you dismiss me now? Have I not been cast upon you from the kelpum?" womb.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 12. Many bulls have compassed me: strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round, Bishop Horne says, the latter verse, if literally translated, runs thus: "Rebuke the wild beast of the reeds, the congregation of the mighty among the calves of the nations, skipping or exulting with pieces of silver." Wicked men, or those who have much bodily strength, who insult and domineer over the weak, and all "lewd fellows of the baser sort," are called madukul, i. e. bulls. "Of what country are you the bull?" People of docile dispositions—those who live at peace with their neighbours—are called cows or calves: hence when violent men injure them, it is said, "See those bulls how they are oppressing the calves; look at them, they are always butting the cows." "Why has this mad bull of Point Pedro come hither? Go, bull, go, graze in thy own pastures." David, therefore, prayed that the Lord would rebuke the bulls who thus troubled his people.—ROBERTS.

The strength of the bull is too remarkable to require description; and his courage and fierceness are so great, that he ventures at times to combat the lion himself. Nor is he more celebrated for these qualities, than for his disposition to unite with those of his own kind, against their common enemy. For these reasons he has been chosen by the Spirit of inspiration, to symbolize the powerful, fierce, and implacable enemies of our blessed Redeemer; who, forgetting their personal animosities, combined against his precious life, and succeeded in procuring his crucifixion: "Many bulls have compassed me: strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round." Nor can we conceive a more striking and appropriate symbol of a fierce and ruthless warrior; an instance of which occurs in that supplication of David: "Rebuke the company of the spearmen, the multitude of the bulls, with the calves of the people, till every one submit himself with pieces of silver." In the sublime description of Isaiah, which seems to refer to some great revolutions, which are to be effected in times long posterior to the age in which he flourished; probably in these last days, antecedent to the millennial state of the church; the complete destruction of her strong and cruel enemies is thus foretold: "And the unicorns shall come down with them, and the bullocks with the bulls, and their land shall be soaked with blood, and their dust made fat with fatness."—PAXTON.

Ver. 16. For dogs have compassed me; the assembly of the wicked have enclosed me: they pierced my hands and my feet.

"The dog," says Poirer, "loses in Barbary, as in the East in general, a part of those social qualities which make him the friend of man. He is no longer that domestic, mild, insinuating animal, faithfully attached to his master, and ever ready to defend him, even at the expense of his life. Among the Arabs he is cruel, blood-thirsty, always hungry, and never satisfied. His look is savage, his physiognomy ignoble, and his appearance disagreeable. The Moors grant him, indeed, a corner of their tent; but this is all. They never caress him, never throw him any thing to eat. To this treatment, in my opinion, must the indifference of the dogs towards their master be ascribed. Very often they have not even any master. They choose a tent as a place of refuge; they are suffered to remain there, and no further notice is taken of them. Refuse, carrion, filth, every thing is good enough for them, if they can but appease their hunger. They are lean, emaciated, and have scarcely any belly. Among themselves they seldom bite each other; but they unite against the stranger who approaches the Arab tents, furiously attack him, and would tear him to pieces if he did not seek safety in flight from this starved troop. If any person were unable to defend himself, or had the misfortune to fall, he would be in danger of being devoured, for these dogs are very greedy after human flesh." D'Arviere also observes, that the Bedouin Arabs keep a great number of dogs, which run about in and out of the camp, begin to bark at the least noise they hear, and answer each other. "These dogs," says he, "are not accustomed to see people walking about late at night, and I believe that they would tear any one in pieces who should venture to approach the camp." "In Morocco," says Host, "there are dogs in abundance, and as the greater part of the Moors have scarcely enough to live on for themselves, much less to feed dogs, they suffer them to lie about the streets so starved that they can hardly hang together, and almost devoured by fleas and vermin. But these dogs, which do not move during the daytime, though they are frequently trodden on, are so insupportable in the night, not only on account of their barking, bellowing, and cries, but also because they are so savage and sleep so little, that nobody is able to go through the streets without a watchman."

"During all the long tour through this dreary and melancholy city, (Alexandria, in Egypt,) Europe and its liveliness was pictured to me only by the bustle and by the activity of the sparrows. I here no longer recognised the dog, that friend of man, the attached and faithful companion, the lively and honest courtier; he is here a gloomy egotist, unknown to the host under whose roof he dwells, cut off from human intercourse, without being less of a slave; he does not know him whose house he protects, and devours his corpse without repugnance. The following circumstance will fully paint his character. In the evening of the day on which I arrived at Alexandria, I went to our ship to supply myself with clean linen. It was eleven o'clock at night when I came again on shore, and I was half a league from my quarters. I was obliged to go through a city taken only that morning by storm, and in which I did not know a street. No reward could induce my man to quit his boat and accompany me. I undertook the journey alone, and went over the burying-ground, in spite of the manes, as I was best acquainted with this road. At the first habitations of the living, I was attacked by whole troops of furious dogs, who made their attacks from the doors, from the streets, and the roofs; and the barking resounded from house to house, from one family to another. I soon, however, observed that the war declared against me was not grounded on any coalition; for as soon as I had quitted the territory of the attackers, they were driven away by the others, who received me on their frontiers. The darkness was only lightened by the stars, and by the constant glimmer of the nights in this climate. Not to lose this advantage, to avoid the barking of the dogs, and to take a road which I knew could not lead me astray, I left the streets, and resolved to go along the beach; but walls and timber-yards, which extended to the sea, blocked up the way. After having waded through the water to escape from the dogs, and climbed over walls where the sea was too deep, exhausted by anxiety and fatigue, and quite wet, I reached one of our sentinels about midnight, in the conviction that the dog is the most dreadful among the Egyptian plagues." (Denon).—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 21. Save me from the lion's mouth: for thou hast heard me from the horns of the unicorns.

Those who are in great trouble from the power or cruelty of others, often cry out to their gods—"Ah! save me from the tusks of the elephant! From the mouth of the tiger, and the tusks of the boar, deliver me—deliver me!" "Who will save me from the horn of the kandam?" This animal is now extinct in these regions, and it is not easy to determine what it was; the word in the Sathur-Azarthe is rendered jungle-cow, but it was probably the rhinoceros; and Dr. Boothroyd translates, "from the horns of the rhinoceros, defend me."—ROBERTS.

PSALM XXIII.

Ver. 1. The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. 2. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters.

In this figure the Psalmist had in his view a shepherd leading his flock into luxuriant fields, and causing them to quench their thirst and repose by gentle streams. In a tropical climate, a tranquil stream and a green pasture are peculiarly pleasing to the eye. Hence many eastern allegories are taken from such scenes. "Never, never will I forget my God: he has brought me into a plentiful pasturage, and folded me near an abundance of water." "Why does he like this country?"—"Because he has good grazing." "Tamban has left his master, because there was not much grass." "Much grass! why the bull was never satisfied." "Well, friend, whither are you going?" "In search of grass and water?"—"Yes; the fat one has become lean, because his grass has withered and his water failed."—ROBERTS.

The patriarchs wandered with their cattle among the towns and villages of Canaan, and fed them even in the most populous districts without molestation. And it is a remarkable fact, that the Kenites and Rechabites lived in Palestine under tents, and fed their cattle wherever they could find pasture, when the country was crowded with inhabitants, long after it had been divided by lot among the tribes. The Bedonin Arabs claim the same privilege in those countries to this day, which, depopulated as they are, probably contain as many inhabitants in their towns and villages, as in the days of Abraham. Nor is this custom peculiar to Palestine; in Barbary and other places, they live in the same manner. Great numbers of Arabian shepherds come into Egypt itself, in the months of November, December, and January, from three or four hundred leagues distance, to feed their camels and their horses. After having spent some time in the neighbourhood of the Nile, they retire into the deserts, from whence, by routes with which they are acquainted, they pass into other regions to dwell there, in like manner, some months of the year, till the return of the usual season recalls them to the vale of Egypt. To this custom of leading the flocks from one country and region to another, the royal Psalmist alludes in that beautiful pastoral: "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul; he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness, for his name's sake." We are taught by the prophet to look for the same blessings from the vigilant care and tenderness of Messiah: "They shall feed in the ways, and their pastures shall be in all high places. They shall not hunger nor thirst; neither shall the heat nor sun smite them; for he that hath mercy on them, shall lead them; even by the springs of water shall he guide them, and I will make all my mountains a way, and my highways shall be exalted." The conduct of the eastern shepherd in leading his flock to the green pastures, and the still waters, is clearly alluded to by John, in the book of Revelation: "For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne, shall feed them, and lead them unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."—PAXTON.

Ver. 4. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.

"He was indeed a good king; by his sceptre and umbrella he comforted his subjects." By the staff or sceptre he gently governed and protected his people; and by his umbrella he defended them from the fierce rays of the sun. "Yes; by these are we instructed, guided, supported, and defended; what have we to fear? great is our safety and confidence." "You are now becoming an old man, and your children are young, what will become of them after your death?"—"Ah! friend, is there not a staff in the hand of God?" "Truly, my wife and children have gone; they have reclined in the place of burning, but my staff is still with me." "See the wicked one, he has not a staff left."—ROBERTS.

In the bag or scrip, which is mentioned by Samuel as a part of the shepherd's furniture, his provisions, and other necessities, are carried. He bears in his hand a staff of considerable length, with which he keeps his cattle in order, and numbers them when they return from the field. To this instrument the Psalmist refers in that beautiful and affecting passage, where he addresses Jehovah as the shepherd of his soul: "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."—PAXTON.

Ver. 5. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over.

In Hindostan, when a person of rank and opulence receives a guest, whom he wishes to distinguish by peculiar marks of regard, he pours upon his hands and arms, in the presence of the whole company, a delightful odoriferous perfume, puts a golden cup into his hand, and pours wine into it till it run over; assuring him at the same time, that it is to him a great pleasure to receive him into his house, and that he shall find under his roof every comfort which he could bestow. The reference to this custom, which at one time was probably general throughout the East, in the twenty-third Psalm, is at once beautiful and striking: "Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies; thou anointest my head with oil, my cup runneth over." The Lord had early received the Psalmist into favour; raised him to the highest honours, from a very humble condition; and, what was infinitely better, he set before him the inestimable blessings of redeeming love, prepared him by a copious unction of the holy Spirit to enjoy them, and welcomed him in the most honourable manner, by putting the cup of salvation into his hand, in the presence of all his people, and pouring into it with unsparing liberality, the wine of heavenly consolation.—PAXTON.

On all joyful occasions the people of the East anoint the head with oil. Hence, at their marriages, and other festive times, the young and old may be seen with their long black tresses neatly tied on the crown of the head, shining and smooth, like polished ebony. The Psalmist, therefore, rejoicing in God as his protector, says, "Thou anointest my head with oil." It is an act of great respect to pour perfumed oil on the head of a distinguished guest; hence the woman in the gospel manifested her respect for the Saviour by pouring "precious ointment" on his head.—ROBERTS.

In the East, the people frequently anoint their visitors with some very fragrant perfume; and give them a cup or a glass of some choice wine, which they are careful to fill till it runs over. The first was designed to show their love and respect; the latter to imply that while they remained there, they should have an abundance of every thing. To something of this kind the Psalmist probably alludes in this passage.—BURDEA.

PSALM XXIV.

Ver. 7. Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in.

See on Prov. 17. 19.

PSALM XXV.

Ver. 15. Mine eyes are ever towards the LORD; for he shall pluck my feet out of the net.

"Those who delight in fowling, do not spring the game with dogs, as we do; but, shading themselves with an oblong piece of canvass, stretched over a couple of reeds or sticks, like a door, they walk with it through the several brakes and avenues, where they expect to find game. The canvass is usually spotted, or painted with the figure of a leopard, and perforated near the top in a few places, for the fowler to look through, and observe what passes before him. The partridge, and other gregarious birds, when the canvass approaches, will covey together, although they were feeding before at some distance from one another. The woodcock, quail, and other birds, which do not commonly feed in flocks, will, at sight of the extended canvass, stand still and look with astonishment, which gives the sportsman an opportunity of coming very near them; and then resting the canvass upon the ground, and directing the muzzle of his piece through one of the holes, he will sometimes shoot a whole covey at a time. The Arabs have another, but a more laborious method of catching these birds; for observing that they became languid and fatigued, after they have been hastily put up two or three times, they immediately run in upon them, and knock them down with their bludgeons. They are likewise well acquainted with that method of catching partridges called tunnelling; and to make the capture the greater, they will sometimes place behind the net a cage with some tame ones within, which, by their perpetual chirping and calling, quickly bring down the coveys which are within hearing, and by that means destroy great numbers of them. To hunt the jackal, which greatly abounds in that country, they sometimes use a leopard which has been trained to hunting from his youth. The hunter keeps the animal before him on his horse, and when he meets with a jackal, the leopard leaps down, and creeps along till he thinks himself within reach of the prey, when he leaps upon it with incredible agility, throwing himself seventeen or eighteen feet at a time." These statements illustrate the force and propriety of those passages of holy writ, which allude to the arts and implements of the hunter and the fowler, by which the timid victim is taken ere it is aware; or the bold is compelled by main force, or by deadly wounds, to submit to his more cunning or powerful adversary. It is not without reason the Psalmist rejoiced that the snare was broken, and his soul had escaped as a bird from the snare of the fowler; and that God had brought his feet out of the net.—PAXTON.

PSALM XXVII.

Ver. 6. And now shall my head be lifted up above mine enemies round about me: therefore will I mine in his tabernacle sacrifices of joy; I will sing, yea, I will sing praises unto the LORD.

"The Medelias is now fixed in his situation."—"Is he?"—"Yes, yea, he is on the mountain, and is like unto it." "Who will take me out of this mud, and place me upon the mountain?"—ROBERTS.

PSALM XXVIII.

Ver. 1. Unto thee will I cry, O LORD, my rock; be not silent to me: lest, if thou be silent to me, I become like them that go down into the pit.

See on Job 33. 18, 24.

Ver. 2. Hear the voice of my supplications, when I cry unto thee, when I lift up my hands towards thy holy oracle.

See on Ps. 41. 20.

PSALM XXIX.

Ver. 5. The voice of the LORD breaketh the cedars; yea, the LORD breaketh the cedars of Lebanon.

See on Deut. 3. 25.

Ver. 9. The voice of the LORD maketh the hinds to calve, and discovereth the forests: and in his temple doth every one speak of his glory.

Ainsworth translates, "Jehovah maketh the hinds tremblingly to travel." The thunder of the East is far more terrific than that of England. The explosion is so sudden and so vast, that the earth literally trembles under its power; fierce animals rush into the covert, and birds fly affrighted to the shade. Then it is the people say, "Ah! this will cause the womb to tremble." "This thunder will make the pains to come." "I fear there will be a falling this day."—ROBERTS.

It seems to be generally admitted, that the hind brings forth her young with great difficulty; and, so much appears to be suggested in the third verse of the same chapter: "They bow themselves, they bring forth their young ones, they cast out their sorrows." But if Pliny, and other natural historians, are worthy of credit, divine providence has been graciously pleased to provide certain herbs, which greatly facilitate the birth; and by an unerring instinct, he directs the hind to feed upon them, when the time of gestation draws towards a close. Whatever be in this assertion, we know from higher authority, that providence does promote the parturition of the hind, by awakening her fears and agitating her frame by the rolling thunder: "The voice of Jehovah, (a common Hebrew phrase, denoting thunder,) maketh the hinds to calve." Nor ought we to wonder that so timorous a creature as the hind should be so much affected by that awfully imposing sound, when some of the proudest men that ever existed, have been made to tremble. Augustus, the Roman emperor, according to Suetonius, was so terrified when it thundered, that he wrapped a seal-skin round his body, with the view of defending it from the lightning, and concealed himself in some secret corner till the tempest ceased. The tyrant Caligula, who sometimes affected to threaten Jupiter himself, covered his head, or hid himself under a bed; and Horace confesses, he was reclaimed from atheism by the terror of thunder and lightning.—PAXTON.

PSALM XXX.

Title—A Psalm and Song at the dedication of the house of David.

It was common, when any person had finished a house, and entered into it, to celebrate it with great rejoicing, and keep a festival, to which his friends were invited, and to perform some religious ceremonies, to secure the protection of heaven. Thus, when the second temple was finished, the priests and Levites, and the rest of the captivity, kept the dedication of the house of God with joy, and offered numerous sacrifices, Ezra vi. 16. We read in the New Testament of the feast of the dedication, appointed by Judas Maccabeus, in memory of the purification and restoration of the temple of Jerusalem, after it had been defiled and laid in ruins by Antiochus Epiphanes; and celebrated annually, to the time of its destruction by Titus, by solemn sacrifices, music, songs, and hymns to the praise of God; and feasts, and every thing that could give the people pleasure, for eight days successively. (Josephus.) This was customary even among private persons. The Romans also dedicated their temples and their theatres. So also they acted with respect to their statues, palaces, and houses.—CHANDLER.

Ver. 1. I will extol thee, O LORD; for thou hast lifted me up, and hast not made my foes to rejoice over me.

"Thou hast lifted me up." The verb is used, in its original meaning, to denote the reciprocating motion of the buckets of a well, one descending as the other rises, and vice versa; and is here applied, with admirable propriety, to point out the various reciprocations and changes of David's fortunes, as described in this psalm, as to prosperity and adversity; and particularly, that gracious reverse of his afflicted condition, which he now celebrates, God having raised him up to great honour and prosperity; for having built his palace, "he perceived that the Lord had established him king over Israel, and that he had exalted his kingdom, for his people Israel's sake."—CHANDLER.

Ver. 5. For his anger endureth but a moment; in his favour is life: weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.

The Tamul method of expressing a moment is to move the hand once round the head, and give a snap of the finger. Thus they say of any thing which endures but a short time, "It is only as the snap of the fingers." The people of the East have nearly all their festivities in the night; they say it is the sorrowful time, and therefore adopt this plan to make it pass more pleasantly away. To those who are in difficulties or sorrow; to widows, orphans, and strangers, "night is the time to weep;" hence in passing through the village may be heard people crying aloud to their departed friends, or bitterly lamenting their own condition. They have, however, some very pleasing and philosophical sayings on the uncertainty of the sorrows and joys of life. In the book Scanda-Purāna, it is written, "The wise, when pleasure comes, do not greatly rejoice; and in sorrow they yield not to distress; for they judge that pleasure and pain are incident to life. The indigent become wealthy, and the wealthy indigent; and inferiors are exalted. Can wealth or poverty, pleasure or pain, be regarded as permanent to the soul? The phases of the moon remain not in one state; they diminish and increase: so your afflictions will one day terminate."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 9. What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to the pit? Shall the dust praise thee? shall it declare thy truth?

When I go down to the pit, what fruit will there be in my body? "Ah! he has fallen into the pit," i. e. he is dead. If those whose bodies have been burned, it is said, they are all sāmbal, i. e. all ashes. "Where is your father?"—"Alas! my lord, he is ashes."—ROBERTS.

PSALM XXXI.

Ver. 2. Bow down thine ear to me; deliver me speedily; be thou my strong rock, for a house of defence to save me.

"My lord, have you not always assisted me? As a mountain and a fortress have you been to me." When a man of rank dies, it is said, "that konam (bastion or fortress) has fallen."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 8. And hast not shut me up into the hand of the enemy: thou hast set my feet in a large room.

Dr. Boothroyd translates this, "hast set my foot in a wider place." Many figures in the English language are unquestionably borrowed from the scriptures, among which may be, "he is in his hands;" for he is in his power. When Zedekiah ordered Ebed-melech to draw Jeremiah out of the dungeon, he was directed to take thirty men with him; but the margin has it, "in thy hand." In eastern language, therefore, to be in the hands of a person, signifies to be in his possession or power. But David was not given into the hand of his enemy, and his feet were at liberty in a large place, so that he could walk whithersoever he pleased. In another verse, he says, "Thou hast enlarged me;" he was increased and at liberty: and again, in speaking of his enemies, and the misery he suffered, he says, "He brought me forth into a large place;" so that his feet were at liberty. The feet (as well as the hands) are sometimes taken for the whole man: thus, the Lord "will keep the feet of his saints," finds an illustration here. "Have I not had a protector through this journey?"—"Yes, the gods have kept my feet." "Well, have you heard from your son?"—"Yes; he has arrived in safety, and has written to me, saying, he will return next month, if the gods keep his feet." A man who is embarrassed in his circumstances, says, "My feet are in shackles." "Who will refresh my feet?" "Who will give liberty to my feet?"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 12. I am forgotten as a dead man out of mind; I am like a broken vessel.

"Yes," says the man who is reduced to poverty, "I am now a corpse to all my former friends." "What is a man without money? A naddukera-sarvam, a walking corpse! "I am now a broken chattle, a potsherd." "Truly, I am like the tam-bat tam," the drum with its head broken. "I am of no use; no one enjoys me."—ROBERTS.

PSALM XXXII.

Ver. 4. My moisture is turned into the drought of summer. Selah.

The fields of Canaan are refreshed with frequent and copious rains, while some of the neighbouring countries are scarcely ever moistened with a shower. In the winter months, the rain falls indiscriminately, but seldom in the summer. Soon after the heats commence, the grass withers, the flower fades, every green thing is dried up by the roots, and the fields, so lately clothed with the richest verdure, and adorned with the loveliest flowers, are converted into a brown and arid wilderness. To the uniform wretched appearance of the fields during the reign of an eastern summer, and not to any particular year of drought, the Psalmist refers in these plaintive terms: "My moisture is turned into the drought of summer." When conviction slept, and conscience was silent, the soul of David resembled a field refreshed by the genial showers of heaven; but the moment God in anger entered into judgment with him, and set his sins in order before his face, his courage failed, his beauty was turned into corruption, and his strength into weakness; "the commandment came, sin revived, and he died."—PAXTON.

In England and the neighbouring countries it is common for rain to fall in all months of the year. But it is not so in the Levant. Egypt has scarce any rain at all, and Dr

Shaw affirms that it is as uncommon in what they call at Algiers the Desert, which is the most southern part of that country. These, however, are peculiar cases. Rain indiscreetly in the winter months, and none at all in the summer, is what is most common in the East. Jacobus de Vitriaco assures us it is thus in Judea; for he observes that lightning and thunder are wont in the western countries, to be in the summer, but happen in the Holy Land in winter. In the summer it seldom or never rains there: but in winter, though the returns of rain are not so frequent, after they begin to fall, they pour down for three or four days and nights together, as vehemently as if they would drown the country.<sup>6</sup> The withered appearance of an eastern summer, which is very dry, is doubtless what the Psalmist refers to when he says, "my moisture is turned into the drought of summer." The reference is not to any particular year of drought, but to what commonly occurs.—HAMMER.

Ver. 7. Thou art my hiding-place; thou shalt preserve me from trouble; thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance. Selah.

We see in the case of David, and many others, that they often had to conceal themselves in caves, mountains, and desert places, from the pursuit of their enemies. In countries like these, where the police is imperfect, where population is so scattered, and where it is so easy to sustain life, it can be no wonder that offenders and injured men often conceal themselves for months and years from the vigilance of their pursuers. It is an every-day occurrence to hear of men thus hiding themselves. Has a person to account for his conduct, or to appear in a court of justice, he packs up his valuables, and makes a start into the jungle, or to some distant country. Perhaps he prowls about the skirts of a forest, and occasionally visits his family in the night. See him on his way, he walks so softly that the most delicate-eared animal cannot detect him; he looks in every direction; puts his ears near the ground, and listens for any sound; again he proceeds, sometimes crawling, sometimes walking, till he has reached his hiding-place. But the natives themselves are famous for assisting each other to elude the search of their pursuers; and often, as did Jonathan and Ahimaaz, they conceal themselves in the well! Sometimes an offender will run to a man of rank who is at enmity with his foe, and say, "My lord, you must be my hiding-place against that wicked man, who has committed so many crimes against you." "Ah! the good man, he was my hiding-place."—ROBERTS.

PSALM XXXIV.

Ver. 8. O taste and see that the LORD is good: blessed is the man that trusteth in him.

"I have russe-pârtain," i. e. tasted and seen the holy man. "The Modeliar is a good man; I have tasted of him many times." "Tamy, have you been to see the collector?"—"No, I am afraid of him."—"Fear not; I have tasted of him, and he is very sweet." "Do you pretend to know me?"—"Yes, I know you well; many times have I tasted of you, and have proved you to be all bitterness." A wife says of a good husband, "I have tasted him, and he is very sweet." Does a father chastise his child, he asks, "Do you now taste me? Am I sweet or sour? When you commit such things, I shall always be sour to you." Of a good and absent child, he says, "My son, my son! when will you return, that I may again taste your sweetness."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 20. He keepeth all his bones: not one of them is broken.

A curious opinion of the Jews is, that wherever their bodies may be buried, it is only in their own promised land that the resurrection can take place; and, therefore, they who are interred in any other part of the world must take their way to Palestine under ground; and this will be an operation of dreadful toil and pain, although clefts and caverns will be opened for them by the Almighty. Whether it arose from this superstition, or from that love for the land of their fathers, which, in the Jews, is connected with the strongest feeling of faith and hope, certain it is, that many have directed their remains to be sent there. "We were fraughted with wool," says an old traveller, "from Constantinople to Sidon, in which sacks, as most certainly was told to me, were many Jews' bones put into little chests, but unknown to any of the ship. The Jews, our merchants, told me of them at my return from Jerusalem to Saphet, but earnestly entreated me not to tell it, for fear of preventing them another time." Sometimes a wealthy Jew has been known to import earth from Jerusalem wherewith to line his grave. (Quarterly Review.)—BUNDEA.

PSALM XXXV.

Ver. 5. Let them be as chaff before the wind: and let the angel of the LORD chase them.

"Begone! fellow; contend not with my brother or me: thou art as chaff before the wind!" "Not a word, or soon wilt thou be as cotton before the wind!"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 21. Yea, they opened their mouth wide against me, and said, Aha, aha! our eye hath seen it.

Dr. Boothroyd, "They open wide their mouth against me, and say, Aha! aha! our eye seeth what we wished." See that rude fellow, who has triumphed over another; he distends his mouth to the utmost, then claps his hands, and bawls out, "Agâ! agâ! I have seen, I have seen." So provoking is this exclamation, that a man, though vanquished, will often commence another attack. An officer who has lost his situation is sure to have this salutation from those he has injured. Has a man been foiled in argument, has he failed in some feat he promised to perform, has he in any way made himself ridiculous, the people open their mouths, and shout aloud, saying, "Agâ! finished, finished, fallen, fallen." Then they laugh, and clap their hands, till the poor fellow gets out of their sight.—ROBERTS.

PSALM XXXVI.

Ver. 11. Let not the foot of pride come against me, and let not the hand of the wicked remove me.

Here we have another instance of the feet and hands being used for the whole man. Our Saviour said of the man: "The hand of him that betrayeth me." Of a sick person to whom the physician will not administer any more medicine, it will be said, paregâri-kivuttân, "The hand of the doctor has forsaken him." A servant is under the hand of his master. The foot of pride probably alludes to the custom of the conqueror trampling upon the vanquished: for in the next verse it is said, "The workers of iniquity are fullen; they are cast down, and shall not be able to rise."—ROBERTS.

PSALM XXXVII.

Ver. 6. And he shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noonday.

"Righteousness and the light are but one." "His righteousness is as the light." "Yes, he is indeed a wise judge, his decision is as the noonday." "What an erroneous judgment is this! my case was as powerful and clear as the sun in his zenith."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 35. I have seen the wicked in great power and spreading himself like a green bay-tree.

The margin has, instead of green bay-tree, "a tree that groweth in his own soil." Ainsworth, "I have seen the wicked daunting terrible, and spreading himself bare, as a green self-growing laurel." A truly wicked man is compared to a tamarind-tree, whose wood is exceedingly hard, and whose fruit is sour. "That passârû, i. e. fiend, is like the marûha-marraam," (Terminalia-Alata). This tree resists the most powerful storms; it never loses its leaves, and is sacred to Vyavrer, the prince of devils. I have seen some that would measure from thirty to forty feet in circumference. The tamarind-tree at Port Pedro, under which Baldeus preached, measures thirty feet.—ROBERTS.

PSALM XXXIX.

Ver. 5. Behold, thou hast made my days as a hand-breadth, and mine age is as nothing before thee: verily every man at his best state is altogether vanity. Selah.

"What are the days of man? Only four fingers." "My son has gone, and has only had a life of four fingers." "You have had much pleasure?"—"Not so; it has only been the breadth of four fingers." "Is he a great landowner?"—"Yes, he has about the breadth of four fingers." "I am told that the hatred betwixt those people is daily decreasing?"—"Yes; that which is left is about four fingers in breadth."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 10. Remove thy stroke away from me: I am consumed by the blow of thy hand.

11. When thou with rebukes dost correct man for iniquity, thou makest his beauty to consume away like a moth: surely every man is vanity. Selah.

See on Job 4. 9.

The moths of the East are very large and beautiful, but short-lived. After a few showers these splendid insects may be seen fluttering in every breeze; but the dry weather and their numerous enemies soon consign them to the common lot. Thus the beauty of man consumes away like that of this gay rover, dressed in his robes of purple, and scarlet, and green.—ROBERTS.

PSALM XL.

Ver. 6. Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; mine ears hast thou opened: burnt-offering and sin-offering hast thou not required.

Ainsworth, "Mine ears hast thou digged open." In scripture phrase, the Lord is said to speak in the ears of his people. Those young heathen who are above ten years of age, and under twenty, have the abbatheasum whispered in their ears, which is believed to have a very sacred effect.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 7. Then said I, Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me.

I have elsewhere observed, that the oriental books and letters, which are wont both of them to be rolled up, are usually wrapped in a covering of an elegant kind: I would here add, that they have sometimes words on these coverings, which have a general notion of what is contained in them; which management obtained in much elder times, and might possibly be in use when some of the Psalms were written. Sir John Chardin, describing the manner of dismissing the ambassadors and envoys that were at the court of the Persian monarch, when he was there, after mentioning the presents that were made them, goes on to inform us, "that the letters to the crowned heads were sealed; that for the cardinal patron was open: that for the pope was formed so as to be larger than the rest; it was enclosed in a bag of very rich brocade, and sealed at the ends, which had fringes hanging down the bag half way. The seal was applied to the place where the knot was on both sides, upon red wax, of the diameter of a piece of fifteen sols, and very thick. Upon the middle of one of the sides of the bag were written these two Persian words, Hamel Fasel, which signify, excellent or precious writing." After which he goes on to explain the reasons that occasion the Persian prince to treat the popes with such distinguished honour, which it would be of no use to consider here. The remark I would make relates to the inscription on the outside of the rich bag enclosing these despatches, and which, in few words, expressed the general nature of what was contained in the roll within: it was a royal writing. This practice of writing on the outside of the case of a letter, or book rolled up, seems to be at least as ancient as the time of Chrysostom, according to a note of Lambert Bos on the 40th Psalm. Chrysostom, we are told there, remarks, that they call a wrapper the Kepades, which is the word the Septuagint translators make use of to express the Hebrew word megillath, which we translate volume: "In the volume of the book it is written of me." Chrysostom seems to suppose there was written in or on the sacred volume, a word or words which signified the coming of the Messiah. But Chrysostom would hardly have thought of such an interpretation, had it not been frequently done at Constantinople in his time, or by the more eastern princes that had business to transact with the Greek emperors; or been known to have been before those times practised among the Jews.—HAMMER.

PSALM XLI.

Ver. 9. Yea, mine own familiar friend in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted his heel against me.

"The man who has eaten my rice has now become a traitor; yes, he has cut my kuthe-kal," i. e. heel.—ROBERTS. To eat of the same bread has been reckoned in every age a sure pledge of inviolable friendship. Pythagoras commanded his disciples not to break bread, because, say they, the bond of friendship is not to be broken; and all friends should assemble round the same cake. A cake of bread, observes Curtius, was the most sacred pledge of amity among the Macedonians. Nothing was reckoned baser, in the East, than to offer violence to those at whose table they had been entertained. Æschines, in his oration against Demosthenes, reproaches him especially because he had accused him, though they had eaten at the same table, and joined in the same sacred ceremonies. In perfect harmony with these views and feelings, which seem to have been derived from a very remote antiquity, the holy Psalmist complains of Ahiathophel: "Yea, mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, who did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me." And a greater than David, in reference to Judas Iscariot: "I speak not of you all: I know whom I have chosen; but that the scripture may be fulfilled, he that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me." The traitor had lived for more than three years in the relations of peace and amity with his Lord: he had been called in the apostolic office, and had been admitted to the same familiar intercourse with his divine Master, as the other disciples had enjoyed. These invaluable privileges greatly aggravated his crime; but his eating bread at his Master's table, while he was plotting against his life, was the crowning point of his enormous wickedness.—PAXTON.

PSALM XLII.

Ver. 1. As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God.

In the East, where streams are not common, and where the deer are so often chased by their savage co-tenants of the forest and the glade, no wonder that they are often driven from their favourite haunts to the parched grounds. After this, their thirst becomes excessive, but they dare not return to the water, lest they should again meet the enemy. When the good Ramer and his people went through the thirsty wilderness, it is written, "As the deer cried for water, so did they." "In going through the desert yesterday, my thirst was so great, I cried out like the deer for water."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 7. Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy water-spouts: all thy waves and thy billows are gone over me.

A water-spout at sea is a splendid sight; in shape it resembles a funnel, with the tube pointing to the water. In 1819, a large one burst near our ship, which caused considerable alarm to all on board. We were near to it before we were aware, and the captain ordered the guns to be loaded and discharged, to cause it to break. Happily for us, it burst at some distance; but the noise the water made in rushing from the water-spout, and again in dashing into the sea, strongly reminded me of this expression, "Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy water-spouts." ROBERTS.

Natural philosophers often make mention of water-spouts, which are most surprising appearances; but hardly any of the commentators, that I have observed, speak of them, though our translators have used the term, Psalm xlii. 7, and the Psalmist seems to be directly describing those phenomena, and painting a storm at sea. And none of them, I think, take notice of the frequency of water-spouts on the Jewish coasts, and consequently that it was natural for a Jewish poet to mention them, in the description of a violent and dangerous storm.

That this however is the fact, we learn from Dr. Shaw, who tells us, that water-spouts are more frequently near the capes of Latikea, Greeco, and Carmel, than in any other part of the Mediterranean. These are all places on the coast of Syria, and the last of them everybody knows in Judea, it being a place rendered famous by the prayers of the prophet Elijah. The Jews then could not be ignorant of what frequently happened on their coasts, and David must have known of these dangers of the sea, if he had not actually seen some of them, as Dr. Shaw did. Strange then! since this is the case, that commentators should speak of these water-spouts as only meaning vehement rains; or that any should imagine that he compares his afflictions to the pouring of water through the spouts of a house, as Bythner seems to do in his Lyra, when they have nothing to do with a storm at sea, which the Psalmist is evidently describing.

Others have remarked that these spouts are often seen in the Mediterranean, but I do not remember to have seen it anywhere remarked, before I read Dr. Shaw, that they are more frequent on the Syrian and Jewish coasts, than any other part of this sea; and as the doctor has not applied the observation to the explaining any part of scripture, I thought it was right to take notice of it in these papers, and as it belongs to the natural history of Judea, it comes into this chapter.—HARMER.

Ver. 11. Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God; for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

Aiasworth, "the salvations of my face." "Oh! Siva, are you not the salvation of my face?" says the prostrate devotee. "To whom shall I make known my distress? are not you the salvation of my face?" "Alas! alas! the salvation of my face has departed." "The blossoming on my face is now withered and gone," says the widow, lamenting over the corpse of her husband.—ROBERTS.

PSALM XLIV.

Ver. 20. If we have forgotten the name of our God, or stretched out our hands to a strange god.

The stretching out the hand towards an object of devotion, or a holy place, was an ancient usage among Jews and heathens both, and it continues in the East to this time, which continuance I do not remember to have seen remarked. "It," says the Psalmist, "we have forgotten the name of our God, or stretched out our hands to a strange god: shall not God search this out?" Ps. xlii. 20, 21. "Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God," Ps. lxxviii. 31. "Hear the voice of my supplications, when I cry unto thee: when I lift up my hand towards thy holy oracle," Psalm xxviii. 2.

That this attitude in prayer has continued among the eastern people, appears by the following passages from Pitts, in his account of the religion and manners of the Mohammedans. Speaking of the Algerines throwing wax candles and pots of oil overboard, as a present to some marabout, or Mohammedan saint, Pitts goes on, and says, "When this is done, they all together hold up their hands, begging the marabout's blessing, and a prosperous voyage." This they do in common, it seems, when in the Straits' mouth; "and if at any time they happen to be in a very great strait or distress, as being chased, or in a storm, they will gather money, and do likewise." In the same page he tells us, the "marabouts have generally a little neat room built over their graves, resembling in figure their mosques or churches, which is very nicely cleaned, and well looked after." And in the succeeding page he tells us, "Many people there are, who will scarcely pass by any of them without lifting up their hands, and saying some short prayer." He mentions the same devotion again as practised towards a saint that lies buried on the snor. of the Red Sea.

In like manner, he tells us, that at quitting ne oclt, or holy house at Mecca, to which they make devout pilgrimages, "they hold up their hands towards the beef, making earnest petitions; and then keep going backward till they come to the abovesaid farewell gate. All the way as they retreat, they continue petitioning, holding up their hands, with their eyes fixed on the beef, until they are out of sight of it: and so go to their lodgings weeping."—HARMER.

PSALM XLV.

Ver. 1. My heart is ending a good matter: I speak of the things which I have made touching the King; my tongue is the pen of a ready writer.

This Psalm is a poetical composition, in the form of an epithalamium, or song of congratulation, upon the marriage of a great king, to be sung to music at the wedding-feast. The topics are such as were the usual groundwork of such gratulatory odes with the poets of antiquity: they all fall under two general heads, the praises of the bridegroom, and the praises of the bride. The bridegroom is praised for the comeliness of his person, and the urbanity of his address, for his military exploits, for the extent of his conquests, for the upright administration of his government, for the magnificence of his court. The bride is celebrated for her high birth, for the beauty of her person, the richness of her dress, and her numerous train of blooming bride-maids. It is foretold that the marriage will be fruitful, and that the sons of the great king will be sovereigns of the whole earth. In this general structure of the poem, we find nothing but the common topics and the common arrangement of every wedding-song: but when we recollect that the relation between the Saviour and his church is represented in the writings both of the Old and New Testament, under the image of the relation of a husband to his wife, that it is a favourite image with all the ancient prophets, when they would set forth the loving-kindness of God for the church, or the church's dutiful return of love to him; while, on the contrary, the idolatry of the church, in her apostacies, is represented as the adultery of a married woman; that this image has been consecrated to this signification by our Lord's own use of it, who describes God in the act of settling the church in her final state of peace and perfection, as a king making a marriage for his son;—the conjecture that will naturally arise upon the recollection of these circumstances will be, that this epithalamium, preserved among the sacred writings of the ancient Jewish church, celebrates no common marriage, but the great mystical wedding, that Christ is the bridegroom, and the spouse his church. And this was the unanimous opinion of all antiquity, without exception even of the Jewish expositors. For although, with the veil of ignorance and prejudice upon their understandings and their hearts, they discern not the completion of this or of any of their prophecies in the Son of Mary, yet they allow, that this is one of the prophecies which relate to the Messiah and Messiah's people; and none of them ever dreamed of an application of it to the marriage of any earthly prince.

It is the more extraordinary, that there should have arisen in the Christian church, in later ages, expositors of great name and authority, and, indeed, of great learning, who have maintained, that the immediate subject of the psalm is the marriage of Solomon with Pharaoh's daughter, and can discover only a distant reference to Christ and the church, as typified by the Jewish king and his Egyptian bride. But read this psalm, and tell me if you can anywhere find King Solomon. We find, indeed, passages which may be applicable to Solomon, but not more applicable to him than to many other earthly kings; such as comeliness of person and urbanity of address, mentioned in the second vers. These might be qualities, for any thing that we know to the contrary, belonging to Solomon; I say, for any thing that we know to the contrary, for in these particulars the sacred history gives no information. We read of Solomon's learning, and of his wisdom, and of the admirable sagacity and integrity of his judicial decisions: but we read not at all, as far as I recollect, of the extraordinary comeliness of his person, or the affability of his speech. And if he possessed these qualities, they are no more than other monarchs have possessed, in a degree not to be surpassed by Solomon. Splendour and stateliness of dress, twice mentioned in this psalm, were not peculiar to Solomon, but belong to every great and opulent monarch. Other circumstances might be mentioned, applicable, indeed, to Solomon, but no otherwise than as generally applicable to every king. But the circumstances which are characteristic of the king who is the hero of this poem, are every one of them utterly inapplicable to Solomon, inasmuch, that not one of them can be ascribed to him, without contradicting the history of his reign. The hero of this poem is a warrior, who girds his sword upon his thigh, rides in pursuit of flying foes, makes havoc among them with his sharp arrows, and reigus at last by conquest over his vanquished enemies. Now Solomon was no warrior: he enjoyed a long reign of forty years of uninterrupted peace. He retained, indeed, the sovereignty of the countries which his father had conquered, but he made no new conquests of his own. "He had dominion over all the region west of the Euphrates, over all the kings on this side of the river, (they were his vassals,) and he had peace on all sides round about him. And Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine, and under his fig-tree, from Dan even to Beersheba, all the days of Solomon." If Solomon ever girded a sword upon his thigh, it must have been merely for state; if he had a quiver of sharp arrows, he could have had no use for them but in hunting. And it was with great good judgment, that upon the revision of our English Bible, in the reign of James the First, the Calvinistic argument of this psalm, as it stood in Queen Elizabeth's Bible, was expunged, and that other substituted which we now read in our Bible of the larger size, in these words: "The majesty and grace of Christ's kingdom; the duty of the church, and the benefits thereof," which, indeed, contain a most exact summary of the whole doctrine of the psalm. And the particulars of this, it is my intention in future discourses to expound.

The psalm takes its beginning in a plain, unaffected manner, with a verse briefly declarative of the importance of the subject, the author's extraordinary knowledge of it, and the manner in which it will be treated:—

"My heart is editing a good matter;"

or rather,

"My heart labours with a goodly theme:"

for the word "editing" answers but poorly, as our translators themselves appear from their margin to have been well aware, to the emphasis of the original, which expresses, that the mind of the prophet was excited and heated, boiling over, as it were, with his subject, and eager to give utterance to its great conceptions. "A good matter," or "a goodly theme," denotes a subject of the highest interest and importance:—

"My heart labours with a goodly theme:

I address my performance to the King:"

that is, as hath been abundantly explained, to the great King Messiah:—

"My tongue is the pen of a ready writer;"

that is, of a well-instructed writer, a writer prepared and ready, by a perfect knowledge of the subject he undertakes to treat.

But with what sense and meaning is it, that the Psalmist compares his "tongue" to the "pen" of such a writer? It is to intimate, as I apprehend, that what he is about to deliver is no written composition, but an extemporaneous effusion, without any premeditation of his own, upon the immediate impulse and suggestion of the Holy Spirit: that what will fall, however, in that manner, from his "tongue," for the coherence and importance of the matter, for the correct propriety of the expression, and for the orderly arrangement of the parts, will in no degree fall short of the most laboured production of the "pen" of any writer, the most prepared by previous study of his subject; inasmuch as the Spirit of God inspires his thoughts, and prompts his utterance. After this brief preface, declaring that his subject is Messiah, chiefly in his kingly character; that he cannot contain the thoughts which are rising in his mind; that he speaks not from himself, or from previous study, but from inspiration at the moment, he plunges at once into the subject he had propounded, addressing the King Messiah, as if he were actually standing in the royal presence. And in this same strain, indeed, the whole song proceeds; as referring to a scene present to the prophet's eye, or to things which he saw doing.—HORSLEY.

Ver. 2. Thou art fairer than the children of men: grace is poured into thy lips: therefore God hath blessed thee for ever.

We have no account in the gospels of our Saviour's person. Some writers of an early age (but none so early as to have seen him) speak of it as wanting dignity, and of his physiognomy as unpleasing. It would be difficult, I believe, to find any better foundation for this strange notion, than an injudicious interpretation of certain prophecies, in a literal meaning, which represent the humiliation which the Son of God was to undergo, by clothing his divinity with flesh, in images taken from personal deformity. But from what is recorded in the gospels, of the ease with which our Saviour mixed in what, in the modern style, we should call good company; of the respectful attention shown to him, beyond any thing his reputed birth or fortune might demand; and the manner in which his discourses, either of severe reproof or gentle admonition, were received, we may reasonably conclude, that he had a dignity of exterior appearance, remarkably corresponding with that authority of speech, which, upon some occasions, impressed even his enemies with awe, and with that dignified mildness, which seems to have been his more natural and usual tone, and drew the applause and admiration of all who heard him. External feature, however, is generally the impression of the mind upon the body, and words are but the echo of the thoughts; and, in prophecy, more is usually meant than meets the ear in the first sound, and most obvious sense of the terms employed. Beauty and grace of speech are certainly used in this text as figures of much higher qualities, which were conspicuous in our Lord, and in him alone of all the sons of men. That image of God in which Adam was created, in our Lord appeared perfect and entire; in the unspotted innocency of his life the sanctity of his manners, and his perfect obedience to the law of God; in the vast powers of his mind, intellectual and moral; intellectual, in his comprehension of all knowledge; moral, in his power of resisting all the allurements of vice, and of encountering all the difficulties of virtue and religion, despising hardship and shame, enduring pain and death. This was the beauty with which he was adorned beyond the sons of men. In him, the beauty of the divine image was refulgent in its original perfection; in all the sons of Adam, obscured and marred, in a degree to be scarce discernible; the will depraved, the imagination debauched, the reason weak, the passions rampant! This deformity is not externally visible, nor the spiritual beauty which is its opposite: but, could the eye be turned upon the internal man, we should see the hideous shape of a will at enmity with God; a heart disregarding his law, insensible of his goodness, fearless of his wrath, swelling with the passions of ambition, avarice, vain-glory, lust. Yet this is the picture of the unregenerated man, by the depravity consequent upon the fall, born in iniquity, and conceived in sin. Christ, on the contrary, by the mysterious manner of his conception, was born without spot of sin; he grew up and lived full of grace and truth, perfectly sanctified in flesh and spirit. With this beauty he was "adorned beyond the sons of men."—HORSLEY.

Ver. 3. Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most Mighty, with thy glory and thy majesty.

From the commendation of the comeliness of the king's person, and the graciousness of his speech, the Psalmist, in the same figurative style, passes to the topic of his prowess as a warrior, under which character our Lord is perpetually described in the prophecies. The enemies he had to engage are the wicked passions of men, the devil in his wiles and machinations, and the persecuting powers of the world. The warfare is continued through the whole of the period I have mentioned, commencing upon our Lord's ascension, at which time he is represented, in the Revelation, as going forth upon a "white horse, with a crown upon his head, and a bow in his hand, conquering and to conquer." The Psalmist, in imagery almost the same, accosts him as a warlike prince preparing to take the field; describes his weapons, and the magnificence of his armour, and promises him victory and universal dominion.

This verse, I fear, must be ill understood by the English reader. The words, "O most Mighty!" very weakly render the original, which is a single word, one of the titles of Christ, in its literal sense expressive of might and valour. But the great difficulty which, in my apprehension, must perplex the English reader, lies in the exhortation, to gird on glory and majesty together with the sword. The things have no obvious connexion; and how are majesty and glory, in any sense which the words may bear in our language, to be girt on upon the person? The truth is, that, in the Hebrew language, these words have a great variety and latitude of meaning; and either these very words, or their synonymes, are used in other places for splendid dress, and for robes of state; and being things to be girt on, they must here denote some part of the warrior's dress. They signify such sort of armour, of costly materials and exquisite workmanship, as was worn by the greatest generals, and by kings when they led their armies in person, and was contrived for ornament as well as safety. The whole verse might be intelligibly and yet faithfully rendered, in these words:—

"Warrior! gird thy sword upon thy thigh; Buckle on thy resplendent, dazzling armour."—HORSLEY.

Ver. 4. And in thy majesty ride prosperously, because of truth, and meekness, and righteousness; and thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things.

That is, take aim with thy bow and arrow at the enemy; be prosperous, or successful in the aim taken; ride on in pursuit of the flying foe, in the cause of religious truth, evangelical humility, and righteousness.

"And thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things;"

"And thy own right hand shall show thee wonderful things."

In these words, the Saviour, effecting every thing by his own power, is represented under the image of a great champion in the field, who is prompted by his own courage, and a reliance on his own strength and skill, to attempt what might seem impracticable; singly to attack whole squadrons of the enemy; to cut his way through their embattled troops; to scale their ramparts and their walls, and at last achieve what seems a wonder to himself, when the fray is over, when he is at leisure to survey the bulwarks he has demolished, and the many carcasses his single arm has stretched upon the plain. Such great things he will be able to effect.

It yet remains to be more fully explained, what is meant in the Psalmist's detail of the Messiah's war, by those "wonders" which "his own right hand was to show him;"

"Thy own right hand shall show thee wonders."

Our public translation has it, "terrible things." But the notion of terror is not of necessity included in the sense of the original word, as it is used by the sacred writers: it is sometimes, indeed, applied by them to frightful things; but it is also applied, with great latitude, to things extraordinary in their kind; grand, admirable, amazing, awful; although they should not be frightful. We have no right, therefore, to take it in the strict sense of "frightful," unless something in the context points to that meaning, which is not the case in this passage. And, accordingly, instead of "terrible," we find, in some of the oldest English Bibles, the better chosen word, "wonderful."

Now the "wonderful things" which Messiah's "own right hand" showed him, I take to be the overthrow of the pagan superstition, in the Roman empire, and other great kingdoms of the world, by the mere preaching of the gospel, seconded by the exemplary lives and the miracles of the first preachers, and by the patient endurance of imprisonment, torture, and death, for the sake of Christ. It was, indeed, a wonderful thing, wrought by Christ's single arm, when his religion prevailed over the whole system of idolatry, supported as it was by the authority of sovereigns, by the learning of philosophers, and most of all, by the inveterate prejudices of the vulgar, attached to their false gods by the gratification which their very worship afforded to the sensual passions, and by the natural partiality of mankind in favour of any system, however absurd and corrupt, sanctioned by a long antiquity. It was a wonderful thing, when the devil's kingdom, with much of its invisible power, lost at once the whole of its external pomp and splendour; when silence being imposed on his oracles, and spells and enchantments divested of their power, the idolatrous worship which by those engines of deceit had been universally established, and for ages supported, notwithstanding the antiquity of its institutions, and the bewitching gayety and magnificence of its festivals, fell into neglect; when its cruel and lascivious rites, so long holden in superstitious veneration, on a sudden became the objects of a just and general abhorrence; when the unfrequented temples, spoiled of their immense treasures, sunk in ruins, and the images, stripped of their gorgeous robes and costly jewels, were thrown into the Tiber, or into the common receptacles of filth and ordure. It was a wonderful thing, when the minds of all men took a sudden turn; kings became the nursing fathers of the church, statesmen courted her alliance, philosophy embraced her faith, and even the sword was justly drawn in her defence. These were the "wonderful things" effected by Christ's right hand; and in these, this part of the Psalmist's prophecy has received its accomplishment. Less than this his words cannot mean; and to more than this they cannot with any certainty be extended; since these things satisfy all that is of necessity involved in his expressions.—HORSLEY.

Ver. 5. Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the King's enemies; whereby the people fall under thee.

The war in which the Psalmist represents the Saviour as engaged, is very different from the wars which the princes of this world wage with one another: it is not for the destruction of the lives of men, but for the preservation of their souls. This prophetic text of the Psalmist relates only to that spiritual war which Christ wages with the enemies of man, for man's deliverance; to the war arising from that enmity which was originally put between the seed of the serpent and the woman's seed. The offensive weapons in this war of charity, according to the Psalmist, are of two sorts, a sword and arrows. The common military sword is a heavy massive weapon, for close engagement: wielded by a strong and skilful arm, it stabs and cuts, opens dreadful gashes where it falls, severs limbs, lops the head, or cleaves the body. The arrow is a light missile weapon, which, in ancient times, was used to annoy the enemy at a distance, and particularly when put to flight. It comes whizzing through the air unseen, and, when it hits, so small is the wound, and so swift the passage of the weapon, that it is scarcely felt, till it fixes its sharp point in the very heart.

Now both these weapons, the sword and the arrow, are emblems of one and the same thing; which is no other than the word of God, in its different effects, and different manners of operation on the minds of men, represented under these two different images.

The word of God may be divided, indeed, into two parts, the word of reproof, commination, and terror; and the word of persuasion, promise, and hope. The former holds up to the sinner the picture of himself; sets forth the turpitude of sin, the holiness of God, God's hatred of unrighteousness; and alarms the conscience with the danger of a state of enmity with God, and with denunciations of implacable wrath and endless punishment.

The second, the word of persuasion, promise, and hope sets before the penitent the riches of God's mercy, displayed in the scheme of man's redemption; points to the cross, where man's guilt was expiated; bids the contrite sinner rely on the Redeemer's intercession; offers the daily supply of grace to confirm him in his resolutions, and assist him in his efforts to conform himself to the precepts and example of the Saviour, and promises victory and glory to them that persevere: thus turning despondency into hope, and fear into love.

The first, the word of terror, is the sword girt upon Messiah's thigh; the second, the word of persuasion, is the arrow shot from his bow.

For the sense of the first metaphor, we have the authority of the sacred writers themselves. "The sword of the Spirit," says St. Paul to the Ephesians, "is the word of God." And in the Epistle to the Hebrews, the full signification of the figure is opened, and the propriety of the application shown: "For the word of God," says the inspired author, "is quick and powerful, (rather, lively and energetic, and sharper than any two-edged sword, and piercing to the parting of soul and spirit, and to the joints and marrow;—that is, as the soldier's sword of steel cuts through all the exterior integuments of skin and muscle, to the bone, and even through the hard substance of the bone itself, to the very marrow, and divides the ligaments which keep the joints of the body together; so this spiritual sword of God's awful word penetrates the inmost recesses of the human mind, pierces to the very line of separation, as it were, of the sensitive and the intelligent principle, lops off the animal part, divides the joints where reason and passion are united, sets the intellect free to exert its powers, kills sin in our members, opens passages for grace to enter and enrich the marrow of the soul, and thus delivers the man from his body of death. Such are the effects for which the powerful word of terror is compared to a two-edged sword.

The comparison of the word of promise to the arrow is more easily understood, being more familiar, and analogous to those figures of speech which run through all languages, by which, whatever makes a quick and smart impression on the moral feelings, is represented under the image of a pointed missile weapon; as when we speak of "the thrilling darts of harmony," or "the shafts of eloquence." The Psalmist speaks of these arrows of God's word, as sticking in "the hearts of the King's enemies," that is, of the King Messiah; for he, you will remember, is the only king in question. His enemies, in the highest sense of the word, are those who are avowedly leagued with the apostate faction; atheists, deists, idolaters, heretics, perverse disputers, those who, in any manner of set design, oppose the gospel; who resist the truth by argument, or encounter it with ridicule; who explain it away by sophisticated interpretations, or endeavour to crush it by the force of persecution. Of such hardened enemies there is no hope, till they have been hacked and bewed, belaboured, and all but slain (in the strong language of one of the ancient prophets) by the heavy sword of the word of terror. But, in a lower sense, all are enemies till they hear of Christ, and the terms of his peace are offered to them. Many such are wrought upon by mild admonition, and receive in their hearts the arrows of the word of persuasion. Such, no doubt, were many of those Jews who were pricked to the heart by St. Peter's first sermon, on the day of Pentecost: and even those worse enemies, if they can be brought to their feeling by the ghastly wounds and gashes of the terrific sword of the word of threatening, may afterward be pierced by the arrow, and carry about in their hearts its barbed point. And by the joint effect of these two weapons, the sword and the arrow, the word of terror and the word of persuasion, "peoples," says the Psalmist, that is, whole kingdoms and nations in a mass, "shall fall under thee;" shall forsake their ancient superstitions, renounce their idols, and submit themselves to Christ.

So much for the offensive weapons, the sword and the arrows. But the defensive armour demands our attention: for it has its use, no doubt, in the Messiah's war. His person, you will remember, is clad, in the third verse, "with refulgent, dazzling armour." This may be understood of whatever is admirable and amiable in the external form and appearance of the Christian religion. First, the character of Jesus himself; his piety towards God, his philanthropy towards man; his meekness, humility, ready forgiveness of injuries, patience, endurance of pain and death. Secondly, the same light of good works shining, in a less degree, in the lives of his disciples, particularly the apostles and blessed martyrs. Thirdly, whatever is decent and seemly in the government, the discipline, and the rites of the church. All these things, as they tend to draw the admiration, and conciliate the good-will of men, and mitigate the malice of the persecutor, are aptly represented under the image of the Messiah's defensive armour, and had a principal share in making "peoples fall under him."—HORSLEY.

Ver. 6. Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre. 7. Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness: therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows.

It was before shown, how inapplicable this address is to Solomon; and it is obvious, that it is equally inapplicable to any earthly monarch: for of no throne but God's can it be affirmed with truth, that it is for ever and ever; of no king, but of God and of his Christ, it can be said, that he loves righteousness with a perfect love, and hates wickedness with a perfect hate; of no sceptre, but the sceptre of God and of his Christ, that it is a straight sceptre. The sceptre has been, from the earliest ages, a badge of royalty. It was originally nothing more than a straight slender rod, studded sometimes for ornament with little nails of gold. It was an emblem of the perfect integrity of the monarch in the exercise of his power, both by himself and by his ministers, inflexibly adhering to the straight line of right and justice, as a mason or carpenter to his rule. The perfection of the emblem consisted in the straightness of the stick; for every thing else was ornament. The straightness, therefore, ascribed by the Psalmist to Messiah's sceptre, is to be understood of the invariable justice of the administration of his government. Now, certainly there have been many kings, both in ancient and in modern times, to whom the praise is due of a cordial regard in general to righteousness, and of a settled principle of dislike to wickedness; many who, in the exercise of their authority, and the measure of their government, have been generally directed by that just sense of right and wrong; but yet kings are not exempt from the frailties of human nature; the very best of them are, at least, in an equal degree with other good men, liable to the surprises of the passions, and the seductions of temptation; insomuch that that predominant love of righteousness and hatred of iniquity, maintaining an absolute ascendancy in the mind, in all times, and upon all occasions, which the Psalmist attributes to his heavenly King, has belonged to none that ever wore an earthly crown: much less is the perfect straightness of the sceptre, a perfect conformity to the rule of right, to be found in the practice and execution of the governments of the world.

But the kingdom of the God-man is in this place intended. This is evident from what is said in the seventh verse: "God, even thine own God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows;" that is, God hath advanced thee to a state of bliss and glory above all those whom thou hast vouchsafed to call thy fellows. It is said too, that the love of righteousness, and hatred of wickedness, is the cause that God hath so anointed him, who yet, in the sixth verse, is himself addressed as God. It is manifest, that these things can be said only of that person in whom the God-head and the manhood are united; in whom the human nature is the subject of the union, and the elevation to the mediatorial kingdom is the reward of the man Jesus; for, in his divine nature, Christ, being equal with the Father, is incapable of any exaltation. Thus, the union with the oil of gladness, and the elevation above his fellows, characterize the manhood; and the perpetual stability of the throne, and the unsullied justice of the government, declare the Godhead. It is therefore with the greatest propriety that the text is applied to Christ, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, and made an argument of his divinity; not by any forced accommodation of words which, in the mind of the author, related to another subject, but according to the true intent and purpose of the Psalmist, and the literal sense, and only consistent exposition of his words.—HORSLEY.

Ver. 8. All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, whereby they have made thee glad.

The holy Psalmist having seated the King Messiah on his everlasting throne, proceeds to the magnificence of his court, as it appeared on the wedding-day; in which, the thought that first strikes him, and fixes his attention, is the majesty and splendour of the king's own dress, which, indeed, is described by the single circumstance of the profusion of rich perfumes with which it was scented. But this, by inference, implies every thing else of elegance and costly ornament: for among the nations of the East, in ancient times, perfume was considered as 'be finishing of the dress of persons of condition, when they appeared in public; and modern manners give us no conception of the costliness of the materials employed in the composition of their odours, their care and nicety in the preparation of them, and the quantity in which they were used. The high-priest of the Jews was not sprinkled with a few scanty drops of the perfume of the sanctuary; but his person was so bedewed with it, that it literally ran down from his beard to the skirts of his garment. The high-priest of the Jews, in his robes of office, was in this, as I shall presently explain, and in every circumstance, the living type of our great High-priest. The Psalmist describes the fragrance of Messiah's garments to be such, as if the aromatic woods had been the very substance out of which the robes were made:—

"Thy garments are all myrrh, aloes, and cassia."

The sequel of this verse is somewhat obscure in the original, by reason of the ambiguity of one little word, which different interpreters have taken differently. I shall give what, in my judgment, is the literal rendering of the passage, and trust I shall not find it difficult to make the meaning of it very clear.

"Thy garments are all myrrh, aloes, and cassia,
Excelling the palaces of ivory,
Excelling those which delight thee."

Ivory was highly valued and admired among the Jews, and other eastern nations of antiquity, for the purity of its white, the delicate smoothness of the surface, and the durability of the substance; being not liable to tarnish or rust like metals, or, like wood, to rot or to be worm-eaten. Hence, it was a favourite ornament in the furniture of the houses and palaces of great men; and all such ornamental furniture was plentifully perfumed. The Psalmist, therefore, says, that the fragrance of the King's garments far exceeded any thing that met the nostrils of the visitors in the stateliest and best-furnished palaces. But this is not all: he says, besides, that these perfumes of the royal garments "excel those which delight thee." To understand this, we must recollect that there were two very exquisite perfumes used in the symbolical service of the temple, both made of the richest spices, mixed in certain proportions, and by a process directed by the law. The one was used to anoint every article of the furniture of the sanctuary, and the robes and persons of the priests. The composition of it was not to be imitated, nor was it to be applied to the person of any but a consecrated priest, upon pain of death. Some, indeed, of the kings of David's line were anointed with it; but when this was done, it was by the special direction of a prophet, and it was to intimate, as I apprehend, the relation of that royal house to the eternal priesthood, to be instituted in due season in that family. The other was a compound of other ingredients, which made the incense that was burnt upon the golden altar as a grateful odour to the Lord. This, too, was most holy, and to attempt to make the like for private use was a capital offence.

Now the perfumed garments of the Psalmist's King denote the very same thing which was typified under the law by the perfumed garments of the high-priest; the Psalmist's King being, indeed, the real person of whom the high-priest, in every particular of his office, his services, and his dress, was the type. The perfumed garments were typical: first, of the graces and virtues of the Redeemer himself in his human character; secondly, of whatever is refreshing, encouraging, consoling, and cheering, in the external ministrations of the word; and, thirdly, of the internal comforts of the Holy Spirit. But the incense fumed upon the golden altar was typical of a far inferior, though of a precious and holy thing; namely, of whatever is pleasing to God in the faith, the devotions, and the good works of the saints. Now the Psalmist says, that the fragrance breathing from the garments of the King far excels, not only the sweetest odour of any earthly monarch's palace, but that it surpasses those spiritual odours of sanctity in which the King himself delights. The consolations which the faithful, under all their sufferings, receive from him, in the example of his holy life, the ministrations of the word and sacraments, and the succours of the Spirit, are far beyond the proportion of any thing they have to offer in return to him, in their praises, their prayers, and their good lives, notwithstanding in these their services he condescends to take delight. This is the doctrine of his highly mystic text, that the value of all our best works of faith and obedience, even in our own eyes, must sink into nothing, when they are contrasted with the exuberant mercy of God extended to us through Christ.—HOSLEY.

Ver. 9. Kings' daughters were among thy honourable women: upon thy right hand did stand the queen in gold of Ophir.

It will be observed that the word "women," in the Bibles of the larger size, is printed in that character which is used to distinguish the words which have been inserted by the translators, to make the sense perspicuous to the English reader, without any thing expressly corresponding in the original. Omitting the word "women," our translators might have given the verse, according to their conceptions of the preceding word, which describes the women, thus:—

"Kings' daughters are among thy honourables;"

that is, among the persons appointed to services of honour. But the original word, thus expressed by "honourable women," or, by "honourables," is indeed applied to whatever is rare and valued in its kind, and, for that reason, to illustrious persons, ennobled and distinguished by marks of royal favour; and in this sense, it certainly is figuratively applicable to the persons whom I shall show to be intended here. But the primary meaning of the word is, "bright, sparkling;" and it is particularly applied to brilliant gems, or precious stones. Sparkling is, in all languages, figuratively applied to female beauty; and the imagery of the original would be better preserved, though the sense would be much the same, if the passage were thus rendered:—

"Kings' daughters are among the bright beauties of thy court."

The beauty certainly is mystic; the beauty of evangelical sanctity and innocence.

But who and what are the kings' daughters, the lustre of whose beauty adorns the great monarch's court? "Kings' daughters," in the general language of holy writ, are the kingdoms and peoples which they govern, of which, in common speech, they are called fathers. The expression may be so taken here; and then the sense will be, that the greatest kingdoms and empires of the world, converted to the faith of Christ, and shining in the beauty of the good works of true holiness, will be united, at the season of the wedding, to Messiah's kingdom. But, inasmuch as Messiah's kingdom is not one of the kingdoms of the world, and that secular kingdoms will never be immediately, and in their secular capacity, vassals of his kingdom, I rather think, that the kings' daughters mentioned here, are the various national churches, fostered for many ages by the piety of Christian princes, and now brought to the perfection of beauty, by the judgments which shall have purged every one of them of all things that offend: for they may well be called "kings' daughters," of whom kings and queens are called, in the prophetic language, the fathers and the mothers. From these, the Psalmist turns our attention to another lady, distinguished above them all, by her title, her place, and the superlative richness of her robes.

"Kings' daughters are among the bright beauties of thy court;
At thy right hand the consort has her station,
In standard gold of Ophir."

Some expositors have imagined, that the consort is an emblem of the church catholic in her totality; the kings' daughters, typical of the several particular churches, of which that one universal is composed. But the queen consort here, is unquestionably the Hebrew church; the church of the natural Israel, reunited, by her conversion, to her husband, and advanced to the high prerogative of the mother church of Christendom; and the kings' daughters are the churches which had been gathered out of the Gentiles, in the interval between the expulsion of his wife, and the taking of her name again: that is between the dis-person of the Jews by the Romans, and their restoration. The restoration of the Hebrew church to the rights of a wife, to the situation of the queen consort in Messiah's kingdom upon earth, is the constant strain of prophecy. To prove this, by citing all the passages to that purpose, would be to transcribe whole chapters of some of the prophets, and innumerable detached passages from almost all. I shall produce only the latter part of the second chapter of Hosea. In that chapter, Jehovah, after discarding the incontinent wife, and threatening terrible severity of punishment, adds, that nevertheless the time should come, when she should again address her offended lord, by the endearing name of husband. "And I will betroth thee to myself for ever. Yes; I will betroth thee to myself, with justice, and with righteousness, and with exuberant kindness, and with tender love. Yes; with faithfulness, to myself I will betroth thee." These promises are made to the woman that had been discarded, and cannot be understood of mercies to be extended to any other. The prophet Isaiah speaks to the same effect, and describes the Gentile converts as becoming, upon the reunion, children of the pardoned wife. And I must not omit to mention, that St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans, to clear up the mystery of God's dealing with the Jews, tells us, that "blindness is, in part only, happened unto Israel, till the time shall arrive for the fullness of the Gentiles to come in; and then all Israel shall be saved; for the gifts and callings of God are without repentance." To expound these predictions of the ancient prophets, and this declaration of the apostle, of any thing but the restoration of the natural Israel, is to introduce ambiguity and equivocation into the plainest oracles of God.

The standard gold upon the queen's robe, denotes the treasures of which the church is the depository; the written word, and the dispensation of grace, and forgiveness of sins, by the due administration of the sacraments.—HORSLEY.

Ver. 10. Harken, O daughter, and consider, and incline thine ear; forget also thine own people, and thy father's house; 11. So shall the King greatly desire thy beauty; for he is thy LORD, and worship thou him.

If a princess from a distant land, taken in marriage by a great king, were admonished to forget her own people and her father's house, the purport of the advice would easily be understood to be, that she should divest herself of all attachment to the customs of her native country, and to the style of her father's court, and learn to speak the language, and assume the dress, the manners, and the taste of her husband's people. The "father's house," and "own people," which the Psalmist advises the queen consort to forget, is the ancient Jewish religion in its external form, the ceremonies of the temple service, the sacrifices and the typical purgations of the Levitical priesthood. Not that she is to forget God's gracious promises to Abraham, nor the covenant with her forefathers, (the benefit of which she will enjoy to the end of time,) nor the many wonderful deliverances that were wrought for them; nor is she to forget the history of her nation, preserved in the scriptures of the Old Testament; nor the predictions of Moses and her prophets, the full accomplishment of which she will at this time experience; and historically, she is never to forget even the ceremonial law; for the Levitical rites were nothing less than the gospel itself in hieroglyphics; and, rightly understood, they afford the most complete demonstration of the coherence of revelation with itself, in all its different stages, and the best evidence of its truth; showing that it has been the same in substance, in all ages, differing only in external form, in the rites of worship, and in the manner of teaching. But practically, the rites of their ancient worship are to be forgotten, that is, laid aside: for they never were of any other importance than in reference to the gospel, as the shadow is of no value but as it resembles the substance. Practically, therefore, the restored Hebrew church is to abandon her ancient Jewish rites, and become mere and pure Christian; and thus she will secure the conjugal affections of her husband, and render the beauty of her person perfect in his eyes. And this she is bound to do; for her royal husband is indeed her Lord.

Moses was no more than his servant; the prophets after Moses, servants in a lower rank than he. But the authority of Christ, the husband, is paramount over all; he is entitled to her unreserved obedience; he is indeed her God, entitled to her adoration.—HORSLEY.

Ver. 12. And the daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift; even the rich among the people shall entreat thy favour.

This submission of the consort to her wedded lord, will set her high in the esteem of the churches of the Gentiles. The "daughter of Tyre," according to the principles of interpretation we have laid down, must be a church established, either literally at Tyre, or in some country held forth under the image of Tyre. Ancient Tyre was famous for her commerce, her wealth, her excellence in the fine arts, her luxury, the profligate debauched manners of her people, and the grossness of her idolatry. The "daughter of Tyre" appearing before the queen consort "with a gift," is a figurative prediction, that churches will be established, under the protection of the government, in countries which had been distinguished for profligacy, dissipated manners, and irreligion. It is intimated in the next line, that some of these churches will be rich; that is, rich in spiritual riches, which are the only riches of a church, in the mystic language of prophecy; rich in the holy lives of their members, in the truth of their creeds, and the purity of their external forms of worship, and in God's favour.—HORSLEY.

Ver. 13. The King's daughter is all glorious within; her clothing is of wrought gold.

From this address to the queen, the Psalmist, in the present verse, returns to the description of the great scene lying in vision before him.

"The King's daughter is all glorious within."

In this line, the same person that has hitherto been represented as the King's wife, seems to be called his daughter. This, however, is a matter upon which commentators have been much divided. Some have imagined that a new personage is introduced; that the King's wife is, as I have all along maintained, the figure of the Hebrew church; but that this "daughter of the King" is the Christian church in general, composed of Jews and Gentiles indiscriminately considered as the daughter of the King Messiah by his Hebrew queen. This was Martin Luther's notion. Others have thought that the wife is the Hebrew church by itself, and the daughter, the church of the Gentiles by itself. But neither of these explanations are perfectly consistent with the imagery of this psalm. Far to be preferred is the exposition of the late learned and pious Bishop Horne, who rejects the notion of the introduction of a new personage, and observes, "that the connexion between Christ and his spouse unites in itself every relation and every affection." She is, therefore, daughter, wife, and sister, all in one. The same seems to have been the notion of a learned Dominican of the seventeenth century, who remarks, that the Empress Julia, in the legends of some ancient coins, is called the daughter of Augustus, whose wife she was.

But, with much general reverence for the opinions of these learned commentators, I am persuaded that the stops have been misplaced in the Hebrew manuscripts, by the Jewish critics, upon the last revision of the text; that translators have been misled by their false division of the text, and expositors misled by translators. The stops being rightly placed, the Hebrew words give this sense:—

"She is all glorious?"—

She, the consort of whom we have been speaking, is glorious in every respect.—

"Daughter of a king!"

That is, she is a princess born; (by which title she is saluted in the Canticles;) she is glorious, therefore, for her high birth. She is, indeed, of high and heavenly extraction! She may say of herself, collectively, what the apostle has taught her sons to say individually, "Of his own will begat he us, with the word of his truth." Accordingly, in the Apocalypse, the bride, the Lamb's wife, is "the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven, from God."

The Psalmist goes on:—

"Her inner garment is bespangled with gold;
Her upper garment is embroidered with the needle."

These two lines require little comment. The spangles of gold upon the consort's inner garment, are the same thing with the standard gold of Ophir, of the ninth verse; the invaluable treasure with which the church is endowed, with the custody and distribution of which she is intrusted. The embroidery of her upper garment is, whatever there is of beauty in her external form, her discipline and her rites. —HORSLEY.

Ver. 14. She shall be brought unto the King in raiment of needle-work: the virgins her companions that follow her shall be brought unto thee. 15. With gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought: they shall enter into the King's palace.

Our public translation has simple, "She is brought;" but the original word implies, the pomp and conduct of a public procession. The greatest caution is requisite in attempting to interpret, in the detail of circumstances, the predictions of things yet remote. We may venture, however, to apply this conducting of the queen to the palace of her lord, to some remarkable assistance which the Israelites will receive from the Christian nations of the Gentile race, in their resettlement in the Holy Land; which seems to be mentioned under the very same image by the prophet Isaiah, at the end of the eighteenth chapter, and by the prophet Zephaniah, chap. iii. 10, and is clearly the subject of more explicit prophecies. "Thou: saith Jehovah," speaking to Zion, in the prophet Isaiah, "Behold, I will lift up my hand to the Gentiles, and set up my standard to the peoples; and they shall bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders." And in another place, "They" (the Gentiles mentioned in the preceding verse) "shall bring all your brethren, for an offering unto Jehovah, out of all nations, upon horses, and in chariots, and in litters, and upon mules, and upon swift beasts, to my holy mountain Jerusalem."

But the Psalmist is struck with the appearance of a very remarkable band, described in the next verse, which makes a part in this procession:—

"She is conducted in procession to the King,
Virgins follow her, her companions,
Coming unto thee;
They are conducted in procession, with festivity and rejoicing;
They enter the palace of the King."

These virgins seem to be different persons from the king's daughters of the ninth verse. Those "king's daughters" were already distinguished ladies of the monarch's own court: these virgins are introduced to it by the queen: they follow her as part of her retinue; and are introduced as her companions. The former represent, as we conceive, the churches of Gentile origin, formed and established in the period of the wife's disgrace: these virgins we take to be new churches, formed among nations, not sooner called to the knowledge of the gospel, and the faith in Christ, at the very season of the restoration of Israel, in whose conversion the restored Hebrew church may have a principal share. This is that fulness of the Gentiles of which St. Paul speaks as coincident in time with the recovery of the Jews, and, in a great degree, the effect of their conversion. "Have they stumbled that they should fall?" saith the apostle, speaking of the natural Israel; "God forbid: but rather, through their fall, salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to emulation. Now, if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and their loss the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fulness? For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?" In these texts, the apostle clearly lays out this order of the business, in the conversion of the whole world to Christ: First, the rejection of the unbelieving Jews; then, the first call of the Gentiles: the recovery of the Jews, after a long season of obstinacy and blindness, at last provoked to emulation, brought to a right understanding of God's dispensations, by that very call which hitherto has been one of their stumbling-blocks: and lastly, in consequence of the conversion of the Jews, a prodigious influx from the Gentile nations yet unconverted, and immersed in the darkness and corruptions of idolatry; which make little less than two thirds, not of the civilized, but of the inhabited world. The churches of this new conversion seem to be the virgins, the queen's bridesmaids, in the nuptial procession.—HORSLEY.

Ver. 16. Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children, whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth. 17. I will make thy name to be remembered in all generations; therefore shall the people praise thee for ever and ever.

In the next verse (the sixteenth) the Psalmist again addresses the queen:—

"Thy children shall be in the place of thy fathers;
Thou shalt make their princes in all the earth."

Thy children shall be what thy fathers were, God's peculiar people; and shall hold a distinguished rank and character in the earth.

The Psalmist closes his divine song with a distich setting forth the design, and predicting the effect, of his own performance:—

"I will perpetuate the remembrance of thy name to all generations.
Inasmuch that the peoples shall praise thee for ever."

By editing this marriage-song, he hoped to be the means of celebrating the Redeemer's name from age to age, and of inciting the nations of the world to join in his praise. The event has not disappointed the holy prophet's expectation. His composition has been the delight of the congregations of the faithful for little less than three thousand years. For one thousand and forty, it was a means of keeping alive in the synagogue the hope of the Redeemer to come: for eighteen hundred since, it has been the means of perpetuating in Christian congregations the grateful remembrance of what has been done, anxious attention to what is doing, and of the cheering hope of the second coming of our Lord, who surely cometh to turn away ungodliness from Jacob, and to set up a standard to the nations which yet sit in darkness and the shadow of death "He that witnesseth these things, saith, Behold, I come quickly. And the Spirit saith, Come; and the bride saith, Come; and let every one that heareth say, Amen. Even so. Come, Lord Jesus!"—HORSLEY.

PSALM XLVI.

Ver. 5. God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved: God shall help her, and that right early.

The Hebrew has, instead of early, "when the morning appeareth." Ainsworth, "God will help it at the looking forth of the morning." A person in perplexity says, "Yes, I hope the morning will soon come; then will my friends help me." "When the daylight shall appear, many will be ready to assist me." "Ah! when will the morning come? How long has been this night of adversity!"—ROBERTS.

PSALM XLVIII.

Ver. 6. Fear took hold upon them there, and pain, as of a woman in travail.

"His pain not great? it was equal to that of a woman in travail." "Alas! alas! this is like the agony of the womb." "Nothing but the womb knows trouble like this."—ROBERTS.

PSALM LI.

Ver. 7. Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean: wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.

Hyssop, a name, derived from the Hebrew eschba, and like many other names of plants, passed from the eastern into the Greek, and from this into most European languages, signifies the plant called in German, wohlgemuth, (i. e. pleasant,) probably on account of its aromatic smell, and also marjoram, but called by botanists origanum creticum. Rauwolf found this plant on the Mount of Olives, and between Ramah and Joppa.—ROSEN-MÜLLER.

PSALM LV.

Ver. 6. And I said, Oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would I flee away, and be at rest.

The Hindoos have a science called Aagya-Kannam, which teaches the art of FLYING! and numbers in every age have tried to acquire it. Those who wish to attain a blessing which is afar off, or who desire to escape from trouble, often exclaim, "Oh! that I had learned the Aagya-Kannam; then should I gain the desire of my heart." "Could I but fly, these things would not be so."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 7. Lo, then would I wander far off, and remain in the wilderness. Selah.

The classical bards of Greece and Rome make frequent allusions to the surprising rapidity of the dove, and adorn their lines with many beautiful figures from the manner in which she flies. Sophocles compares the speed with which she cleaves the ethereal clouds, to the impetuous rapidity of the whirlwind; and Euripides, the furious impetuosity of the Bœchanals rushing upon Pentheus, to the celerity of her motions. And Kimchi gives it as the reason why the Psalmist prefers the dove to other birds, that while they become weary with flying, and alight upon a rock or a tree to recruit their strength, and are taken, the dove, when she is fatigued, alternately rests one wing and flies with the other, and by this means escapes from the swiftest pursuers. The Orientals knew well how to avail themselves of her impetuous wing on various occasions. It is a curious fact, that she was long employed in those countries as a courier, to carry tidings of importance between distant cities. Ælian asserts, that Taurosthenes communicated to his father at Ægina, by a carrier pigeon, the news of his success in the Olympic games, on the very same day in which he obtained the prize. The Romans, it appears from Pliny, often employed doves in the same service; for Brutus, during the siege of Mutina, sent letters tied to their feet, into the camp of the consuls. This remarkable custom has descended to modern times; Volney informs us, that in Turkey the use of carrier pigeons has been laid aside, only for the last thirty or forty years, because the Kurd robbers killed the birds, and carried off their despatches.—PAXTON.

Ver. 17. Evening, and morning, and at noon, will I pray, and cry aloud; and he shall hear my voice.

The frequency and the particular seasons of prayer are circumstances chiefly connected with the situation and disposition of such as habituate themselves to this exercise. But from a singular conformity of practice in persons remote both as to age and place, it appears probable that some idea must have obtained generally, that it was expedient and acceptable to pray three times every day. Such was the practice of David, and also of Daniel, (see ch. vi. 10.) and as a parallel, though, as far as connected with an idolatrous system, a different case, we are informed that "it is an invariable rule with the Bramins to perform their devotions three times every day: at sunrise, at noon, and at sunset." (Maurice.)—BURDEN.

Ver. 21. The words of his mouth were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart: his words were softer than oil, yet were they drawn swords.

See on Cant. 3. 8.

PSALM LVI.

Ver. 8. Thou tellest my wanderings: put thou my tears into thy bottle: are they not in thy look?

The lachrymatories used in Greece and Rome are, I believe, unknown to the Hindoos. A person in distress, as he weeps, says, "Ah! Lord, take care of these tears, let them not run in vain." "Alas! my husband, why beat me? my tears are known to God."—ROBERTS.

The custom of putting tears into the ampulla or urna lachrymæ, so well known among the Romans, seems to have been more anciently in use in Asia, and particularly among the Hebrews. These lachrymal urns were of different materials, some of glass, some of earth, and of various forms and shapes. One went about to each person in the company at the height of his grief with a piece of cotton in his hand, with which he carefully collects the falling tears, and which he then squeezes into the bottle, preserving them with the greatest care. This was no difficult matter; for Homer says the tears of Telemachus, when he heard of his father, dropped on the ground. They were placed on the sepulchres of the deceased as a memorial of the affection and sorrow of their surviving relations and friends. It will be difficult to account, on any other supposition, for the following expressions of the Psalmist: "Put thou my tears into thy bottle." If this view be admitted, the meaning will be: "Let my distress, and the tears I shed in consequence of it, be ever before thee."—PAXTON.

PSALM LVII.

Ver. 4. My soul is among lions; and I lie even among them that are set on fire, even the sons of men, whose teeth are spears and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword.

The arrows were usually made of light wood, with a head of brass or iron, which was commonly barbed. Sometimes they were armed with two, three, or four hooks. The heads of arrows were sometimes dipped in poison. Horace mentions the venenata agitte, the poisoned arrows of the ancient Moors in Africa. They were used by many other nations in different parts of the world; and if we believe the reports of modern travellers, these cruel weapons are not yet laid aside by some barbarous tribes. The negroes in the countries of Bornou and Soudan fight with poisoned arrows; the arrow is short, and made of iron; the smaller scatch with it causes the body to swell, and is infallibly mortal, unless counteracted by an antidote known among the natives. Everywhere, the poison used for this inhuman purpose was of the deadliest kind; and the slightest wound was followed by almost instant death. From this statement it will appear, that arrows were by no means contemptible instruments of destruction, although they are not to be compared with the tremendous inventions of modern warfare. We are not therefore to be surprised that so many striking allusions to the arrow, and the trodden bow, occur in the loftier strains of the inspired writers. The bitter words of the wicked are called "their arrows;" "their teeth are spears and arrows;" and the man that beareth false witness against his neighbour, is "a sharp arrow." But in these comparisons there is perhaps a literal meaning, which supposes a connexion between the mouth and the arrow. The circumstance related by Mr. Park might possibly have its parallel in the conduct of the ancients; and if it had, clearly accounts for such figures as have been quoted. "Each of the negroes took from his quiver a handful of arrows, and putting two between his teeth, and one in his bow, waved to us with his hand to keep at a distance." Some are of opinion, that "the fiery darts," concerning which the apostle Paul warned his Ephesian converts, allude to the poisoned arrows, or javelins, which were so frequently used in those times; others contend, that the allusion is made to those missile weapons, which were sometimes employed by the ancients in battles and sieges, to scatter fire in the ranks, or among the dwellings of their enemies. These were the πυρρορα βολη of Arrian, and the πυρρορα σινη of Thucydides, the heads of which were surrounded with combustible matter, and set on fire, when they were launched against the hostile army."—PAXTON.

Ver. 8. Awake up, my glory; awake psaltery and harp; I myself will awake early.

Dr. Boothroyd has this, "Awake, my glory! awake, lyre and harp!" The Orientals often speak of inanimate objects as if they had intelligence. Thus, a strolling musician, before he begins to play in your presence, says, "Arise, arise, my harp, before this great king I play sweetly in his hearing, and well shalt thou be rewarded." A person who has sold an article, says to it, when being carried away, "Go, thou, go." The Prophet says, "Awake, oh sword!" "When two heroes were preparing for a duel, one of them found a difficulty in drawing his sword from the scabbard; at which his antagonist asked, 'What! is thy sword afraid?'—'No,' replied the other, 'it is only hungry for thy blood.'"—ROBERTS.

PSALM LVIII.

Ver. 3. The wicked are estranged from the womb; they go astray as soon as they are born, speaking lies. 4. Their poison is like the poison of a serpent; they are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear.

"Do you ask whence he had this disposition? I will tell you; it was from the womb." "Expect him not to change; he had it in the womb." The figure of the wicked going astray as soon as they are born, seems to be taken from the disposition and power of a young serpent soon after its birth. The youngest serpent can convey poison to any thing it bites; and the suffering in all cases is great, though the bite is seldom fatal. Put a stick near the reptile, whose age does not amount to many days, and he will immediately snap at it. The young of the tiger and alligator are equally fierce in their earliest habits.—ROBERTS.

Several of the serpent tribe are believed to be deaf, or very dull of hearing. Perhaps that which is called the puddena, the beaver serpent, is more so than any other. I have several times been close upon them, but they did not offer to get out of the way. They lurk in the path, and the victim bitten by them will expire a few minutes after the bite. "Talk not to him: he is as the deaf serpent, he will not hear." "Truly, I am a deaf serpent, and may soon bite you." "Young man, if you repeat the abtheasum, which the priest has whispered in your ear, your next birth will be that of a deaf serpent."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 4. Their poison is like the poison of a serpent; they are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear.

"It appears, says Chardin, that all the teeth of a serpent are not venomous, because those that charm them will cause their serpents to bite them till they draw blood, and yet the wound will not swell. Adders will swell at the sound of a flute, raising themselves up on one half of their body, turning the other part about, and beating proper time; being wonderfully delighted with music, and following the instrument. Its head, before round and long like an eel, it spreads out broad and flat, like a fan. Adders and serpents twist themselves round the neck and naked body of young children, belonging to those that charm them. At Surat, an Armenian seeing one of them make an adder bite his flesh, without receiving any injury, said, I can do that; and causing himself to be wounded in the hand, he died in less than two hours." A serpent's possessing a musical ear, its keeping time in its motions with the harmony, its altering the shape of its head, are circumstances which, if true, are very wonderful.—HARMER.

Ver. 5. Which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely.

Whether any man ever possessed the power to enchant or charm adders and serpents; or whether those who pretended to do so profited only by popular credulity, it is certain that a favourable opinion of magical power once existed. Numerous testimonies to this purpose may be collected from ancient writers. Modern travellers also afford their evidence. Mr. Browne, in his Travels in Africa, thus describes the charmers of serpents. Romelli is an open place of an irregular form, where feats of juggling are performed. The charmers of serpents seem also worthy of remark, their powers seem extraordinary. The serpent most common at Khaira is of the viper class, and undoubtedly poisonous. If one of them enter a house, the charmer is sent for, who uses a certain form of words. I have seen three serpents enticed out of the cabin of a ship lying near the shore. The operator handled them, and then put them into a bag. At other times I have seen the serpents twist round the bodies of these psylli in all directions, without having had their fangs extracted or broken, and without doing them any injury.—BRADER.

Ver. 5. Which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely. 6. Break their teeth, O God, in their mouth; break out the great teeth of the young lions, O LORD.

See on Eccl. x. 11.

The kuravan, or serpent charmer, may be found in every village, and some who have gained great fame actually live by the art. Occasionally they travel about the district, to exhibit their skill. In a basket they have several serpents, which they place on the ground. The kuravan then commences playing on his instrument, and to talk to the reptiles, at which they creep out, and begin to mantle about with their heads erect, and their hoods distended. After this, he puts his arm to them, which they affect to bite, and sometimes leave the marks of their teeth.

From close observation I am convinced that all these serpents thus exhibited have their poisonous fangs extracted, and the Psalmist seems to have had his eyes on that when he says, "Break their teeth." Living animals have been repeatedly offered to the man for his serpents to bite, but he would never allow it; because he knew no harm would ensue.

It is, however, granted, that some of these men may believe in the power of their charms, and there can be no doubt that serpents in their wild state are affected by the influence of music. One of these men once went to a friend of mine (in the civil service) with his serpents, and charmed them before him. After some time the gentleman said, "I have a cobra-capella in a cage, can you charm him?" "Oh! yes," said the charmer. The serpent was let out of the cage, and the man began his incantations and charms; the reptile fastened on his arm, and he was dead before the night.

The following is said to be a most potent charm for all poisonous serpents:—Suttellam, pande, keere, soolare, akavudan, varan, oru, vattani, kiddantha, pomba, raliya, vaitakal, vaya; which means, "Oh! serpent, thou who art coiled in the path, get out of my way; for around thee are the mongoos, the porcupine, and the kite in his circles is ready to take thee." The mongoos is in shape and size much like the English weasel. The porcupine is also a great enemy of the serpent. The kite, before he pounces on his prey, flies round in circles, and then drops like a stone; he seizes the reptile with his talons just behind the head, carries it up in the air, and bills it in the head till it expires.

But there are also charmers for bears, tigers, elephants, and other fierce animals. A party having to go through forests or deserts to a distant country, generally contrive to have some one among them possessed of that art. A servant of mine joined himself to a company who were going from Batticaloa to Colombo. There was a magician, who walked in front, who had acquired great fame as a charmer of serpents and other wild animals. After a few days they saw a large elephant, and the charmer said, "Fear not." But the animal continued to approach; and my servant thought it expedient to decamp and climb a tree. The others, also, began to retire; but the old man remained on the spot, repeating his charms. At last the elephant took him in his proboscis, and laid him gently on the ground; then lopped off the charmer's head, arms, and legs, and crushed the lifeless body flat on the earth.

By the power of charms the magicians pretend to have influence over ghosts, beasts, fire, wind, and water.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 8. As a snail which melteth, let every one of them pass away; like the untimely birth of a woman, that they may not see the sun.

The snail is, in the Hebrew scriptures, called sabbal, which the learned Bochar translates שֶׁבַע sheva, because the snail marks out his path with his slime, and so is called שׁוֹמֵר, the path-maker; or, from שׁוּר, to lodge 2 in, and שׁוּר, a winding shell, cochlea, the well-known habitation which this animal carries about with him. Parkhurst is of opinion, that a better account of the name may be deduced from the peculiar manner in which snails thrust themselves forward in moving, and from the force with which they adhere to any substance on which they light. The wise Author of nature, having refused them feet and claws to creep and climb, has compensated them in a way more commodious for their state of life, by the broad skin along each side of the belly, and the undulating motion observable there. By the latter, they creep; by the former, assisted by the glutinous slime emitted from their body, they adhere firmly and securely to all kinds of superficies, partly by the tenacity of their slime, and partly by the pressure of the atmosphere. Thus, the snail wastes herself by her own motion, every undulation leaving some of her moisture behind; and in the same manner, the actions of wicked men prove their destruction. They may, like the snail, carry their defence along with them, and retire into it on every appearance of danger; they may confidently trust in their own resources, and banish far away the fear of evil; but the principles of ruin are at work within them, and although the progress may be slow, the result is certain. The holy Psalmist, guided by the spirit of inspiration, prayed, "As a snail which melteth, let every one of them pass away;" and Jehovah answered, "The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God."—PAXTON.

Ver. 9. Before your pots can feel the thorns, he shall take them away as with a whirlwind, both living, and in his wrath.

The Arabs heat stone pitchers by kindling fires in them, and then daub the outside with dough, which is thus baked. "They kindle a fire in a large stone pitcher, and when it is hot they mix the meal in water, as we do to make paste, and daub it with the hollow of their hands upon the outside of the pitcher, and this soft pappy dough spreads and is baked in an instant; the heat of the pitcher having dried up all its moisture, the bread comes off in small thin slices, like one of our wafers." (D'ARVIEUX.)—BURDER.

PSALM LX.

Ver. 14. And at evening let them return, and let them make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city.

Many cities in Syria, and other parts of the East, are crowded with dogs, which belong to no particular person, and by consequence, have none to feed them, but get their food in the streets, and about the markets. Dogs also abound in all the Indian towns and villages, and are numerous, noisy, and troublesome, especially to travellers. Like those in Syria, they have no respective owner, generally subsist upon charity, and are never destroyed. They frequently hunt in large packs, like the jackals, which they resemble in many other respects. These allusions are clearly involved in the prayer of the royal Psalmist for deliverance from his enemies: "And at evening let them return; and let them make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city. Let them wander up and down for meat, and grudge, if they be not satisfied."—PAXTON.

Ver. 15. Let them wander up and down for meat, and grudge, if they be not satisfied.

The great external purity which is so studiously attended to by the modern eastern people, as well as the ancient, produces some odd circumstances with respect to their dogs. They do not suffer them in their houses, and even with care avoid their touching them in the streets, which would be considered as a defilement. One would imagine then, that under these circumstances, as they do not appear by any means to be necessary in their cities, however important they may be to those that feed flocks, there should be very few of these creatures found in those places; they are notwithstanding there in great numbers, and crowd their streets. They do not appear to belong to particular persons, as our dogs do, nor to be fed distinctly by such as might claim some interest in them, but get their food as they can. At the same time they consider it as right to take some care of them, and the charitable people among them frequently give money every week, or month, to butchers and bakers, to feed them at stated times, and some leave legacies at their deaths, for the same purpose. This is Le Bryn's account. Thevenot and Maillet mention something of the same sort.

In like manner, dogs seem to have been locked upon among the Jews in a disagreeable light, yet they had them in considerable numbers in their cities, Ps. lix. 14. They were not, however, shut up in their houses or courts, Ps. lix. 6, 11; but seem to have been forced to seek their food where they could find it, Ps. lix. 15; to which I may add, that some care of them seems to be indirectly enjoined to the Jews, Exod. xxii. 31; circumstances that seem to be more illustrated by these travellers into the East, than by any commentators that I know of.—HARMER.

PSALM LX.

Ver. 3. Thou hast showed thy people hard things; thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment. 4. Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee, that it may be displayed because of the truth. Selah.

Albertus Aquensis tells us, that when Jerusalem was taken in 1099, about three hundred Saracens got upon the roof of a very lofty building, and earnestly begged for quarter, but could not be induced by any promises of safety to come down, until they had received the banner of Tancred, one of the chiefs of the crusade army, as a pledge of life. It did not indeed avail them, as that historian observes; for their behaviour occasioned such indignation, that they were destroyed to a man. The event showed the faithlessness of these zealots, whom no solemnities could bind; but the Saracens surrendering themselves upon the delivery of a standard to them, proves in what a strong light they looked upon the giving them a banner, since it induced them to trust it, when they would not trust any promises. Perhaps the delivery of a banner was anciently esteemed, in like manner, an obligation to protect, and that the Psalmist might consider it in this light, when, upon a victory gained over the Syrians and Edomites, after the public affairs of Israel had been in a bad state, he says, Thou hast showed thy people hard things, &c. Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee. Though thou didst for a time give up thine Israel into the hands of their enemies, thou hast now given them an assurance of thy having received them under thy protection. When the Psalmist is represented as saying, Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee, that it may be displayed, it may be questioned whether it is rightly translated, since it is most probable they used anciently only a spear, properly ornamented, to distinguish it from a common one, as this same Albertus tells us, that a very long spear, covered all over with silver, to which another writer of those crusade wars adds a ball of gold on the top, was the standard of the Egyptian princes at that time, and carried before their armies. Thou hast given a banner, &c. an ensign, or a standard, to them that fear thee, that it may be lifted up, may perhaps be a better version; or rather, that they may lift it up to themselves, or encourage themselves with the confident persuasion that they are under the protection of God because of the truth, thy word of promise, which is an assurance of protection, like the giving me and my people a banner, the surest of pledges.—HARMER.

Ver. 4. Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee, that it may be displayed because of the truth. Selah.

Has a person gained a signal triumph over his enemy by the assistance of another, he then says of the latter, "He has given me a victorious kuddi," banner. "Yes," say the conquerors, "we have gained a victorious banner"—ROBERTS.

PSALM LXII.

Ver. 3. How long will ye imagine mischief against a man? ye shall be slain all of you:

as a bowing wall shall ye be, and as a tottering fence.

Dr. Boothroyd, "like a tottering wall." In consequence of heavy rains and floods, and unsound foundations, it is very common to see walls much out of perpendicular, and some of them so much so, that it might be thought scarcely possible for them to stand. "Poor old Raman is very ill, I hear."—"Yes, the wall is bowing." "Begone, thou low caste; thou art a kutte-chivver," i. e. a ruined wall. "By the oppression of the head man the people of that village are like a ruined wall."—ROBERTS.

PSALM LXIII.

Ver. 10. They shall fall by the sword; they shall be a portion for foxes.

The jackal is here probably referred to. In India, the disgusting sight of jackals devouring human bodies, may be seen every day. So ravenous are these animals, that they frequently steal infants as they lie by the breast of the mother; and sick persons, who lie friendless in the street, or by the side of the Ganges, are sometimes devoured alive by these animals in the night. Persons in a state of intoxication have thus been devoured as they lay in the streets of Calcutta. (Ward.)—BURDER.

PSALM LXV.

Ver. 1. Praise waiteth for thee, O God, in Zion; and unto thee shall the vow be performed.

Margin, "is silent." Ainsworth, "Pray silent waiteth for thee, O God." The people of the East are much given to meditation and silent praise, and sometimes they may be seen for hours so completely absorbed, as to be insensible to all surrounding objects. "Oh! Swamy, have you not heard my silent praises?" Among the devotees are to be found the silent praises of Siva. "My lord, only grant me this favour, and you will hear even my silent praises."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 13. The pastures are clothed with flocks; the valleys also are covered over with corn; they shout for joy, they also sing.

People in passing fields or gardens, after a fine rain, say, "Ah! how these fields and trees are laughing to-day." "Yes, you may well laugh; this is a fine time for you." "How nicely these flowers are laughing together."—ROBERTS.

PSALM LXVIII.

Ver. 9. Thou, O God, didst send a plentiful rain, whereby thou didst confirm thine inheritance, when it was weary.

I have taken notice of the traces of rain found in the desert between the Nile and the Red Sea; and I would here remark, that rain sometimes is found to fall in that part of the desert which lies on the eastern side of the Red Sea, where Israel wandered so many years, which circumstance is referred to in the scripture, and therefore claims some attention among the other observations contained in these papers.

Pitts, in his return to Egypt from Mecca, which he visited on a religious account, found rain in this desert. His words are as follows: "We travelled through a certain valley, which is called by the name of Atash el Wail, i. e. the river of the fire, the vale being so excessively hot, that the very water in their goat skins has sometimes been dried up with the gloomy, scorching heat. But we had the happiness to pass through it when it rained, so that the fervent heat was much allayed thereby; which the bagges looked on as a great blessing, and did not a little praise God for it." This naturally reminds us of a passage in the 68th Psalm, ver. 9: "Thou, O God, didst send a plentiful rain, whereby thou didst confirm thine inheritance, when it was weary;" speaking of God's going before his people when they came out of Egypt, and entered upon their sojourning in this wilderness. The Mohammedan pilgrims that were with Pitts, do not seem to have wanted water to drink, but the fall of rain, it seems, was highly acceptable to them, on account of cooling the air in a place where, from its situation, it was frequently wont to be extremely hot.

One of the first things that occurs to a reflecting mind upon reading this passage of the Psalmist, is, an inquiry whether this rain was miraculous, or a common exertion of the power of the God of nature, though under the direction of a gracious providence. It seems now, from this account of Mr. Pitts, to have been the last, and not contrary to the common course of things in that wilderness.

No mention is made of this merciful shower in the books of Moses, so far as I remember; but as we are told in the Psalm, immediately after, of the fleeing of kings, if the circumstances referred to here are ranged in exact order, it must have been before the Amalekites set upon Israel in Rephidim; but there can be no dependence upon that, especially as mention is made of Sinai in a preceding verse, and in the outset of the description of God's marching before his people through the wilderness.—HARMER.

Ver. 13. Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold.

The dove is universally admitted to be one of the most beautiful objects in nature. The brilliancy of her plumage, the splendour of her eye, the innocence of her look, the excellence of her dispositions, and the purity of her manners, have been the theme of admiration and praise in every age. To the snowy whiteness of her wings, and the rich golden hues which adorn her neck, the inspired Psalmist alludes in these elegant strains: "Though ye have lain among the pots, yet ye shall be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold." These bold figures do not seldom occur in the classical poets of antiquity. Virgil celebrates the argenteus anser, the silver-coloured goose; Ovid, the crow, which once rivalled the dove in whiteness; Lucretius, the changeful hues of her neck, which she turns to the sunbeam, as if conscious of its unrivalled beauty. Mr. Harmer is of opinion, that the holy Psalmist alludes, not to an animal adorned merely by the hand of nature, but to the doves that were consecrated to the Syrian deities, and ornamented with trinkets of gold; and agreeably to this view, he interprets the passage, "Israel is to me as a consecrated dove; and though your circumstances have made you rather appear like a poor dove, blackened by taking up its abode in a smoky hole of the rock; yet shall ye become beautiful and glorious as a Syrian silver-coloured pigeon, on whom some ornament of gold is put." But this view makes the Holy Ghost speak with some approbation, or at least without censure, of a heathenish rite, and even to borrow from it a figure to illustrate the effects of divine favour among his chosen people. No other instance of this kind occurs in the sacred scriptures, and therefore it cannot be admitted here without much stronger evidence than that respectable writer has produced. It is much more natural to suppose, that the Psalmist alludes to party-coloured doves, with white wings, and the rest of their feathers of a bright brown. Buffon mentions a species of turtle-dove in the bay of Campeachy, which is entirely brown, while others are of a snowy white; and both Ælian and Homer mention a dove of a red, or deep yellow colour, resembling gold. To these varieties the sacred writer might refer; and the more effectually to represent the blissful effects of divine favour, might combine the beauties of each into one picture.—PAXTON.

In Asia Minor, according to Chandler, the dove lodges in the holes of the rock; and Dr. Shaw mentions a city in Africa, which derives its name from the great number of wild pigeons which breed in the adjoining cliffs. It is not uncommon for shepherds and fishermen, to seek for shelter in the spacious caverns of that country, from the severity of the weather, and to kindle fires in them, to warm their shivering limbs, and dress their victuals; in consequence of which, the doves which happen to build their nests on their shelves, must be frequently smothered, and their plumage soiled. Some have conjectured, that the royal Psalmist may allude to this scene, in which he had perhaps acted a part, while he tended his father's flocks, in that singular promise, "Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold." The people of Israel, who had long bent their necks to the galling yoke of Egypt, and groaned under the most cruel oppression, may not unfitly be compared to a dove in the fissure of a rock, which had been terrified by the intrusion of strangers, and polluted by the smoke of their fires, which ascended to the roof of the cavern, and penetrated into the most remote and secret corner; or by the smut of the pots, which they had set over these fires for culinary purposes, among which she fluttered in her haste to escape. The dove issues from the cave of the shepherds, black and dirty, her heart dejected, and her feathers in disorder; but, having washed herself in the running stream, and trimmed her plumage, she gradually recovers the serenity of her disposition, the purity of her colour, and the elegance of her appearance. So did the people of Israel more than once escape by the favour of Jehovah, from a low and despised condition, and gradually rise to great prosperity and splendour. In Egypt, they laboured in the brick-kilns, and in all the services of the field—a poor, enslaved, and oppressed people; and after their settlement in the land of promise, they were often reduced to a state of extreme distress; but in their misery they cried to the Lord, and he heard and delivered them from all their calamities; he subdued the surrounding nations to their sway; he poured the accumulated riches of ancient kings into their treasury; he made them the terror or the admiration of the East. But the holy Psalmist may have a prospective reference to the deliverance which the Gentile nations were to obtain, from the basest and most despicable condition, the worshipping of wood and stone, the gratifying of the vilest lusts, and their advancement to the service of Christ, and the practice of universal holiness and virtue. His words are not less applicable to the deliverance of the church, from the distresses in which she may be at any time involved, and the restoration of individual believers from a state of spiritual decline. On these joyous occasions, the people of God shake off their fears and their sorrows, and resume their wonted serenity, peace, and joy; they worship God in the beauty of holiness; they press forward with renovated vigour to the promised inheritance; they are as a dove, the most beautiful of the species, whose wings rival silver in whiteness, and the feathers of whose neck, the yellow radiance of gold.—IBM.

The Hebrew word may refer to those fire-ranges or rows of stones on which the caldrons or pots were placed for boiling, probably something like, but more durable in their structure, than those which Niebuhr says are used by the wandering Arabs. "Their fireplace is soon constructed; they only set their pots upon several separate stones, or over a hole digged in the earth." Lying among these, denotes the most abject slavery; for this seems to have been the place of rest allotted to the vilest slaves. So old Laertes, grieving for the loss of his son, is described in Homer, as in the winter, sleeping where the slaves did, in the ashes near the fire.—BURDEA.

Ver. 14. When the Almighty scattered kings in it, it was white as snow in Salmon.

Perhaps in allusion to the bones of the slaughtered foe, which were scattered about, and lay bleaching on the summit of Salmon.—B.

Ver. 15. The hill of God is as the hill of Bashan; a high hill, as the hill of Bashan.

The Hebrew word is plural, and means a mountain of eminences, or backs. This may, perhaps, be a title peculiarly applicable to Bashan. The mountain with teeth, might be a name given it, from the appearance of the face of it, studded over with small hills. Monserrat, in Spain, is an instance of a mountain deriving its name from its shape; as it is Mons Serratas, or a mountain whose craggy cliffs have, at a distance, the resemblance of the teeth of a saw. The Sierra Morena, in Spain, is named from its shape and colour.—BURDEA.

Ver. 21. But God shall wound the head of his enemies, and the hairy scalp of such a one as goeth on still in his trespasses.

This language, in the East, is equivalent to saying, "I will kill you." "The king will soon break the uche (the scalp) of that fellow." "Tamban's uche is broken, he died last week." "Under the scalp is the royal wind, which is the last to depart after death." "With those who are buried, it remains three days in its place; but when the body is burned, it immediately takes its departure, which is a great advantage."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 25. The singers went before, the players on instruments followed after; among them were the damsels playing with timbrels.

This, no doubt, is a description of a religious procession in the time of David. In the sacred and domestic processions of the Hindoos they observe the same order, and have the same class of people in attendance. See them taking their god to exhibit to the people, or to remove some calamity; he is put into his car or tabernacle, and the whole is placed on men's shoulders. As they move along, the men and women precede, and sing his praises; then follow the musicians, who play with all their might in honour of the god, and for the enjoyment of the people.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 30. Rebuke the company of spearmen, the multitude of the bulls, with the calves of the people, till every one submit himself with pieces of silver; scatter thou the people that delight in war.

Literally, rebuke the beast of the reeds, or canes. This in all probability means the wild-boar, which is considered as destructive to the people of Israel, Psalm lxxx. 13. That wild-boars abound in marshes, fens, and reedy places, appears from Le Bruyn, who says, "we were in a large plain full of canals, marshes, and bullrushes. This part of the country is infested by a vast number of wild-boars, that march in troops, and destroy all the seeds and fruits of the earth, and pursue their ravages as far as the entrance into the villages. The inhabitants, in order to remedy this mischief, set fire to the rushes which afford them a retreat, and destroyed above fifty in that manner: but those that escaped the flames spread themselves all round in such a manner, that the people themselves were obliged to have recourse to flight, and have never disturbed them since for fear of drawing upon themselves some greater calamity. They assured me that some of these creatures were as large as cows."—BURDEA.

Ver. 31. Princes shall come out of Egypt; Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God.

See on Ps. 44. 20.

PSALM LXIX.

Ver. 9. For the zeal of thy house hath eaten me up; and the reproaches of them that reproached thee are fallen upon me.

He who is zealous in his religion, or ardent in his attachments, is said to be eaten up. "Old Muttoo has determined to leave his home for ever; he is to walk barefoot to the Ganges for the salvation of his soul: his zeal has eaten him up."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 14. Deliver me out of the mire, and let me not sink: let me be delivered from them that hate me, and out of the deep waters.

"Ah! this chearu, this chearu," (this mud, this mud,) says the man who is in trouble, "who will pull me out?" "I am like the bullock, with his legs fast in the mud; the more I struggle, the faster I am."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 21. They gave me also gall for my meat; and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink.

The refreshing quality of vinegar cannot be doubted; but a royal personage had reason to complain of his treatment in having this only presented to him to quench his thirst, when it was only made use of by the meanest people. Pits tells us, that the food that he and the rest had when first taken by the Algerines, was generally only five or six spoonfuls of vinegar, half a spoonful of oil, a few olives, with a small quantity of black biscuit, and a pint of water, a day. The juice of lemons is what those of higher life now use, and probably among the higher orders the juice of pomegranates might be used, to produce a grateful acidity.—HARRIS.

Ver. 31. This also shall please the LORD better than an ox or bullock that hath horns and hoofs.

Dr. Boothroyd, "For this will be more acceptable to Jehovah than a full-horned and a full-hoofed steer." Buffaloes which are offered in sacrifice, must always be full grown, and must have their horns and hoofs of a particular size and shape. Those without horns are offered to devils. Thus, it is difficult and expensive to procure a victim of the right kind. The writer of this psalm is supposed to have been a captive in Babylon, and consequently poor, and otherwise unable to bring an acceptable sacrifice to the Lord; but he rejoiced to know that he "heareth the poor, and despiseth not his prisoners;" and that, by praising "the name of God with a song," and by magnifying him with thanksgiving, would be more acceptable than the most perfect victim offered to him in sacrifice.—ROBERTS.

PSALM LXXI.

Ver. 11. Saying, God hath forsaken him; persecute and take him: for there is none to deliver him.

When a respectable man, in the service of his sovereign, or superior, falls into disgrace; when rich men become poor, or servants lose the favour of their masters; then a horde of accusers, who did not before dare to show their faces, come forward with the most fearful stories of the wickedness of the fallen man. Formerly they were ever flattering and cringing at his feet; but now they are the most brutal and bold of his enemies.—ROBERTS.

PSALM LXXII.

Ver. 5. They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure, throughout all generations.

At the time appointed for the commencement of the new year, which, among the Singalese, is always in April, the king sat on his throne in state, surrounded by his chiefs, and the event was announced to the people by the discharge of jingals. At the hour appointed for the second ceremony, young women of certain families, with lighted tapers in their hands, and a silver dish containing undressed rice, and turmeric water, stood at a little distance from the king, and when he directed his face to the southeast, with imbal leaves under his feet, and nuga leaves in his hand, and applied the medicinal juice to his head and body, they thrice exclaimed, Increase of age to our sovereign of five thousand years! Increase of age as long as the sun and moon last! Increase of age as long as heaven and earth exist! By the chiefs and people of consequence, this part of the ceremony was performed in a manner as nearly similar as possible. (Davy's Account of Ceylon).—BURDER.

Ver. 9. They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him; and his enemies shall lick the dust.

This is a very favourite way of threatening among the Hindoos. The half frantic man says to his foe, "Yes, thou shalt soon eat the earth;" which means his mouth will soon be open to receive it, as in death. "Soon, soon wilt thou have man," i. e. earth, "in thy mouth." In time of great scarcity, it is said, "The people are now eating earth; the cruel, cruel king, did nothing but put earth in the mouths of his subjects."—ROBERTS.

In Mr. Hugh Boyd's account of his embassy to the king of Candy, in Ceylon, there is a paragraph which singularly illustrates this part of the Psalm; and shows the adulation and obsequious reverence with which an eastern monarch is approached. Describing his introduction to the king, he says, "The removal of the curtain was the signal of our obeisances. Mine, by stipulation, was to be only kneeling. My companions immediately began the performance of theirs, which were in the most perfect degree of eastern humiliation. They almost literally licked the dust; prostrating themselves with their faces almost close to the stone floor, and throwing out their arms and legs; then rising on their knees, they repeated in a very loud voice a certain form of words of the most extravagant meaning that can be conceived;—that the head of the king of kings might reach beyond the sun; that he might live a thousand years," &c. Compare this with the passage of scripture now referred to. "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him, and his enemies shall lick the dust," i. e. the wild unconquered Arabians shall be brought to abject submission. This is beautifully emblematic of the triumph of Christ over those nations and individuals, whom it appeared impossible for the Gospel to subdue. "The kings of Tarshish and of the Isles shall bring presents; the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts. Yea, all kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall serve him."—BURDER.

Ver. 16. There shall be a handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains; the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon: and they of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth.

The rapidity with which grass grows in the East is the idea here referred to. "When the ground there hath been destitute of rain nine months together, and looks all of it like the barren sand in the deserts of Arabia, where there is not one spire of green grass to be found, within a few days after those fat enriching showers begin to fall, the face of the earth there (as it were by a new resurrection) is so revived, and, as it were, so renewed, as that it is presently covered all over with a pure green mantle. (Sir Thomas Roe).—BURDER.

PSALM LXXIV.

Ver. 11. Why withdrawest thou thy hand, even thy right hand? pluck it out of thy bosom.

The word which we translate bosom does not always, in eastern language, mean the breast; but OFTEN the lap, or that part of the body where the long robe folds round the loins. Thus, in the folds of the garment, in front of the body, the Orientals keep their little valuables, and there, when they are perfectly at ease, they place their hands. Sternhold and Hopkins, who translated from the original text, have the same idea:—

"Why dost thou draw thy hand back,
And hide it in thy lap?"

To a king, whose enemies have invaded his territories, and are ravaging his kingdom, it will be said, should he not make any exertions to repel them, "Why does your majesty keep your hands in your maddervila, (bosom?) Take your sword, your heroism thence." When two men go to a magistrate to complain of each other, perhaps one says, "He has beaten me severely, my lord." Then the other replies, "It is true, I did strike him, but these wounds on my body show he did not keep his hands in his bosom." "Complain not to me, fellow, for want of food; do I not see you always with your hands in your bosom?" "He has been cursing me in the most fearful way, but I told him to put the imprecations in his own bosom." "Thy right hand," which is the hand of honour. Hence, "the right hand of the Most High." The Hindoos have a right-hand caste, and when they take a solemn oath they lift up that hand to heaven.

The whole of the right side of a man is believed to be more honourable than the left, and all its members are said to be larger and stronger; and, to give more dignity to it, they call it the ampackhom, i. e. the male side; whereas the other is called the female. This idea, also, is followed up in reference to their great deity, Siva; his right side is called male, and the other the female; which notion also applies to the Jupiter of western antiquity, as he was said to be male and also female.—ROBERTS

Ver. 13. Thou didst divide the sea by thy strength: thou brakest the heads of the dragons in the waters. 14. Thou brakest the heads of leviathan in pieces, and gavest him to be meat to the people inhabiting the wilderness.

See on Job 41. 1, &c.

Ver. 19. O deliver not the soul of thy turtle-dove unto the multitude of the wicked; forget not the congregation of thy poor for ever.

It has already been observed, that the turtle-dove never admits a second mate, but lingers out her life in sorrowful widowhood. To this remarkable circumstance, these words of David are by many thought to refer: "O deliver not the soul of thy turtle-dove unto the multitude of the wicked; forget not the congregation of thy poor for ever." As the turtle cleaves to her mate with unshaken fidelity, so these interpreters say, had Israel adhered to their God. But it is well known that God's ancient people were a stiff-necked and rebellious race, equally fierce and perfidious, and discovering on almost every occasion a most violent and unreasonable inclination to the worship of heathen deities. It is, therefore, more natural to suppose, that the holy Psalmist, by this term, alludes to the weak and helpless state of his people, that like the turtle had neither power nor inclination to resist their numerous enemies. The dove is a harmless and simple creature, equally destitute of skill and courage for the combat; and the turtle is the smallest of the family. She is therefore a most proper emblem of the national imbecility into which the people of Israel had sunk, in consequence of their numerous iniquities, with which they had long provoked the God of their fathers. They who were the terror of surrounding nations, while they feared the Lord and kept his commandments, whom God himself instructed in the art of war, and led to certain victory, had by their folly become the scorn of their neighbours, and an easy prey to every invader.—PAXTON.

Sometimes those that have no tents, shelter themselves from the inclemency of the night air, in holes and caverns which they find in their rocky hills, where they can kindle fires to warm themselves, as well as to dress their provisions; to which may be added, that doves also, in those countries, frequently haunt such places, as well as some other birds. Dr. Richard Chandler, in his travels in Asia Minor, has both taken notice of the doves there lodging in holes of the rocks; and of the shepherds and fishermen being wont to make use of such retreats, and of their killing fire in them, by which practice those doves must be frequently very much smuted, and their feathers dirtied. And I have been sometimes ready to imagine, that an attention to these circumstances may afford as easy and satisfactory an account as any that has been given of that association of such very different things as doves and smoky places, which we meet with in the 68th Psalm. It is certain the people of Israel are compared to a dove, in the book of Psalms; "O deliver not the soul of thy turtle-dove unto the multitude of the wicked; forget not the congregation of thy poor for ever." Ps. lxxiv. 19; and the same image appears to have been made use of, in this 68th Psalm. If it was made use of, it was not unnatural to compare Israel, who had been in a very afflicted state in Egypt, to a dove making its abode in the hollow of a rock, which had been smuted by the fires shepherds had made in it for the heating their milk, or other culinary purposes; which led them to make such little heaps of stones, on which they might set their pots, having a hollow under them, in which they put the fuel, according to the eastern mode, of which I have given an account elsewhere, and which little buildings are meant by the word here translated pots.

This image might very properly be made use of to express any kind of affliction Israel might have suffered, when they are compared as a body of people to a dove; and certainly not less so, when they had been forced to work without remission in the brick-kilns of Egypt. For so the sense will be something like this: O my people! though ye have been like a dove in a hole of a rock, that hath been blackened by the fires of the shepherds for the boiling their pots; ye, on this joyous occasion did you appear as the most beautiful of that species, whose wings are like silver, and the more muscular parts, from whence the strength of the wings are derived, like the splendour of gold.—HAMMER.

PSALM LXXV.

Ver. 4. I said unto the fools, Deal not foolishly; and to the wicked, Lift not up the horn: 5. Lift not up your horn on high: speak not with a stiff neck.

This passage will receive some illustration from Bruce's remarks in his Travels to discover the source of the Nile, where, speaking of the head-dress of the governors of the provinces of Abyssinia, he represents it as consisting of a large broad fillet bound upon their forehead, and tied behind their head. In the middle of this was a horn, or a conical piece of silver gilt, about four inches long, much in the shape of our common candle extinguishers. This is called kirn, or horn, and is only worn in reviews, or parades after victory. The crooked manner in which they hold the neck, when this ornament is on their forehead, for fear it should fall forward, seems to agree with what the Psalmist calls speaking with a stiff neck, for it perfectly shows the meaning of speaking with a stiff neck, when you hold the horn on high, or erect, like the horn of a unicorn.—BRUCE.

Mr. Munroe, speaking of the females in a Maronite village, in Mount Lebanon, observes: "But the most remarkable peculiarities of their dress, are the immense silver ear-rings hanging forward upon the neck, and the tantoura, or 'horn,' which supports the veil. This latter ornament varies in form, material, and position, according to the dignity, taste, and circumstances of the wearer. They are of gold, silver gilt, or silver, and sometimes of wood. The former are either plain or figured in low relief, and occasionally set with jewels; but the length and position of them is that upon which the traveller looks with the greatest interest, as illustrating and explaining a familiar expression of scripture. The young, the rich, and the vain, wear the tantoura of great length, standing straight up from the top of the forehead; whereas the humble, the poor, and the aged, place it upon the side of the head, much shorter, and spreading at the end like a trumpet. I do not mean to say, that these distinctions are universal, but I was told that they are very general, and thus the 'exalted horn' still remains a mark of power and confidence, as it was in the days of Israel's glory."—(Summer Ramble in Syria, 1833).—B.

We stopped for the night at the village of Barook, chiefly inhabited by Druses, many of whom are said to have adopted the creed of their Maronite neighbours. Our tent was placed close to the house of the principal vender of small wares, round which an arrival soon attracted a crowd, but far superior in appearance and civility to the inhabitants of any district we had previously seen. Most of the men wore clean white turbans, and the women were wrapped in blue veils, beneath which a tantoura, that invariable article of Druse luxury, which is worn day and night, made a conspicuous figure. This we had now an opportunity of examining, for our host, accompanied by his wife, came to our tent, attracted by the novelty of tea, which they both drank, when well sweetened, with apparent satisfaction. The lady, in return, satisfied our curiosity by taking off her tantoura, which was of silver, rudely enclosed with flowers, stars, and other devices. In length it was, perhaps, something more than a foot: but in shape had little resemblance to a horn, being a mere hollow tube, increasing in size from the diameter of an inch and a half at one extremity, to three inches at the other, where it terminated like the mouth of a trumpet. If the smaller end was closed, it might serve for a drinking-cup; and in Germany glasses of the same form and size are occasionally used. This strange ornament, placed on a cushion, is securely fixed to the upper part of the forehead by two silk cords, which, after surrounding the head, hang behind nearly to the ground, terminating in large tassels, which among the better classes are capped with silver."—(Hogg's Visit to Damascus, Jerusalem, &c., 1833).—B.

A man of lofty bearing is said to carry his nose very high. To him who is proudly interfering with the affairs of another it will be said, "Why show your kombu (nose) here?" "What! are you a horn for me?" "See that fellow, what a fine horn he has; he will make the people run." "Truly, my lord, you have a great horn." "Chinnan has lost his money, ay, and his horns too." "Alas! alas! I am like the deer, whose horns have fallen off."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 8. For in the hand of the LORD there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full of mixture, and he poureth out of the same: but the dregs thereof, all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them.

Red wine, in particular, is more esteemed in the East than white. And we are told in the travels of Olearius, that it is customary with the Armenian Christians in Persia to put Brazil wood, or saffron, into their wine, to give it a higher colour, when the wine is not so red as they like, they making no account of white wine. He mentions the same thing also in another place. These accounts of their putting Brazil wood or saffron into their wines, to give them a deeper red, seem to discover an energy in the Hebrew word ayin adam, which is used Prov. xxiii. 31, that I never remarked anywhere. It is of the conjugation called Hithpael, ayithaddam, which, according to grammarians, denotes an action that turns upon the agent itself: it is not always, it may be accurately observed; but in this case it should seem that it ought to be taken according to the strictness of grammar, and that it intimates the wine's making itself redder by something put into it: Look not on the wine when it maketh itself red. It appears, indeed, from Is. lxiii. 2, that some of the wines about Judea were naturally red; but so Olearius supposed those wines to be which he met with in Persia, only more deeply tinged by art; and this colouring it, apparently is to make it more pleasing and tempting to the eye.

There are two other places relating to wine, in which our translators have used the term red; but the original word ayin chemer differs from that in Proverbs, and I should therefore imagine intended another idea; what that might be, may, perhaps, appear in the sequel. The word, it is certain, sometimes signifies what is made thick or turbid; so it expresses the thickening water with mud, Ps. lxxv. 3. May it not then signify the thickening wine with its lees? It seems plainly to do so in one of the passages: "In the hand of the Lord is a cup, and the wine is red, or turbid: it is full of mixture, and he poureth out the same: but the dregs thereof, all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them," Ps. lxxv. 8. The turbidness of wine makes it very intoxicating, and consequently expressive of the disorder affliction brings on the mind; thus, Thevenot, I remember, tells us the wine of Shiras, in Persia, is full of lees, and therefore very heady; to remedy which, they filtrate it through a cloth, and then it is very clear, and free from fumes.—HARMER.

The punishments which Jehovah inflicts upon the wicked, are compared to a cupful of fermenting wine, mixed with intoxicating herbs, of which all those to whom it is given must drink the dregs or sediment. The same image is found, not only frequently in other places in the Old Testament, but also very often in the Arabian poets. Thus Taabbata Scharran, in a passage of an Arabic Anthology, by Alb. Schultens: "To those of the tribe of Hodail, we gave the cup of death, whose dregs were confusion, shame, and reproach." Another poet says: "A cup such as they gave us, we gave to them." When Calif Almansor had his valiant, though dreaded general, Abre-Moslem, murdered, he repeated the following verse, in which he addressed the corpse: "A cup such as he gave, gave I him, bitterer to the taste than wormwood." (Elmagaci).—BURNER.

PSALM LXXVI.

Ver. 11. Vow, and pay unto the LORD your God: let all that be round about him bring presents unto him that ought to be feared.

Taxes in Persia are commonly levied under the form of presents to the monarch. The usual presents are those made annually by all governors of provinces and districts, chiefs of tribes, ministers, and all others invested with high office, at the feast of the vernal equinox. These gifts are regulated by the nature of the office, and the wealth of the individual, and consist of the best of the produce of every part of the kingdom. Sometimes a large sum of money is given, which is always the most acceptable present. Allusive to this custom is that command in relation to Messiah: "Let all that are round about him bring presents unto him that ought to be feared." Besides these ordinary presents, extraordinary largesses, of a less defined nature, but which are also of very considerable amount, are expected. Of this kind were, in the opinion of some writers, the presents which the enemies of Saul refused to bring, at his accession to the throne of Israel: "But the children of Belial said, How shall this man save us? And they despised him, and brought him no presents. But he held his peace."—PAXTON.

PSALM LXXVII.

Ver. 2. In the day of my trouble I sought the LORD: my sore ran in the night, and ceased not: my soul refused to be comforted.

The margin has, instead of sore, "hand." Ainsworth. "In the day of my distress I sought the Lord: my hand by night reached out and ceased not." Dr. Boothroyd, "In the day of my distress I seek Jehovah: by night, my hand, without ceasing, is stretched out unto him." Dr. A. Clarke says, "My hand was stretched out," i. e. in prayer. The Talmul translation, "My hands, in the night, were spread out, and ceased not." "Ah!" says the sorrowful mother, over her afflicted child, "all night long were my hands spread out to the gods on thy behalf." In that position do they sometimes hold their hands for the night together. Some devotees do this with their right hand throughout the whole of their lives, till the arm becomes quite stiff.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 10. And I said, this is my infirmity: but I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High.

Dr. Boothroyd, "Then I said, this is the time of my sorrow; but the right hand of the Most High can change it." I have shown that superior honour is given to the right hand. It is that with which men fight: the "sword arm," consequently protection, or deliverance, comes from that. David was in great distress; but, he asks, "God forgotten to be gracious?" To this his heart replied, No! and he determined to believe in the right hand of the Most High, which had often delivered and defended him in days past, and which could again change all his circumstances. The right hand is that which dispenses gifts; no Hindoo would offer a present with his left hand. A miser is said to have two left hands! "Never, never shall I forget the right hand of that good man: he always relieved my wants." "Ah! the ungrateful wretch, how many years have I helped him! he has forgotten my right hand." "Yes, poor fellow, he has lost all his property; he cannot now use his right hand." "My children, my children," says the aged father, "how many years have I supported you? Surely you will never forget the right hand of your father."—ROBERTS.

PSALM LXXVIII.

Ver. 21. Therefore the LORD heard this, and was wroth: so a fire was kindled against Jacob, and anger also came up against Israel.

The first supply of quails was followed by no visible judgment from heaven; for although they were guilty of murmuring against the Lord, he spared them in his love and in his pity; but they provoked him on this occasion, by their indecent desire of good living; by loathing the manna, which was provided for them by his distinguishing kindness; by regretting the provisions which they had enjoyed in Goshen; and by denying the divine power and goodness, which they had already experienced in supplying them with quails, soon after they came out of Egypt, and of which they had every day the most substantial proofs, in giving them bread from heaven. Incensed by this ungrateful conduct, Jehovah unequivocally notified his righteous displeasure, before he granted their demands: "Ye shall eat it a whole month, until it come out at your nostrils, and it be loathsome unto you; because that ye have despised the Lord which is among you, and have wept before him, saying, Why came we forth out of Egypt?" These words are a proof, that he had heard the murmurings of his people with great indignation. When, therefore, the month was completed, and while the flesh with which they had gorged themselves was yet in their mouth, "the wrath of the Lord was kindled against the people, and the Lord smote the people with a very great plague." Various are the views which interpreters have given of this judgment; but their opinion seems entitled to the preference, who suppose it was a fire from heaven, by which some of the people were consumed. Their undutiful murmurings were punished in this manner, a very short time before: "And when the people complained, it displeased the Lord; and the Lord heard it, and his anger was kindled; and the fire of the Lord burnt among them, and consumed them that were, in the uttermost parts of the camp." Bochart, indeed, considers this brief statement as a summary view of the scene which is more minutely described in the rest of the chapter. The same place, he thinks, is called Taberah, from the conflagration, and Kibroth-hataavah, "because there they buried the people that lusted." But this opinion seems to rest upon no solid foundation; no trace of a more brief, and then of a more extended narrative, can be discovered in the passage. The sacred writer plainly describes two different calamities, of which the first was indubitably by fire, which renders it not improbable that the second was also produced by the same devouring element. This probability is greatly increased by the words of David, in his sublime description of this very judgment: "Therefore, the Lord heard, and was wroth; so a fire was kindled against Jacob, and anger also came up against Israel; because they believed not God, nor trusted in his salvation." An instance of similar perverseness is recorded of this people, soon after they came out of Egypt. But, although they were perhaps equally blameable, they were not subjected to the same punishment; for, in this instance, Jehovah bestowed upon them a supply of quails that evening; and the day after, he rained manna from heaven around their tents. He had a right to punish them for their iniquity; but he graciously turned away his anger, and yielded to their importunities. And for this forbearance, several reasons may be assigned. If any fall a second time into the sins which had already been forgiven, he is more guilty than before; because he both insults the justice, and tramples on the grace and mercy of God. Besides, in this instance, the people of Israel murmured against their leaders, because they were pressed by famine, and in want of all the necessaries of life. But in the desert of Paran, bread from heaven descended in daily showers around their encampment, in sufficient quantity to satisfy the whole congregation; they lived on angel's food; they were satiated with the bread of heaven; and by consequence, the flesh which they demanded with so great eagerness and importunity, was not required to supply their necessity, but to gratify their lustful desires. When they murmured against Moses and Aaron in the wilderness of Sin, they had but lately come out of Egypt—they were still in a rude and untried state, for the law was not yet given; but in Paran they rebelled, after long and various experience of the divine care and goodness, after the law was given, and after they had been instructed by many sufferings, in the evil nature and bitter consequences of sin; their conduct, therefore, was much more criminal, and deservedly subjected them to severe castigation.—PAXTON.

Ver. 25. Man did eat angels' food: he sent them meat to the full. 26. He caused an east wind to blow in the heaven; and by his power he brought in the south wind. 27. He rained flesh also upon them as dust, and feathered fowls like as the sand of the sea.

See on Ex. 16. 12, 13.

On this passage it has been asked, How can these winds blow together, and at the same time bring up the quails from the sea into the desert? The Seventy interpreters, and the Vulgate, found it so difficult to give a satisfactory answer to these queries, that they were induced to render the first clause, "He removed the east wind from the heaven;" as if the removal of one wind was necessarily succeeded by another. But this version cannot be admitted, because the Psalmist clearly intends to represent the east and the south winds, as the joint instruments of divine goodness, which, by their united force, collected and brought up the quails from the sea. If the Psalmist had meant to express the removing of the east wind, he must have used the phrase, (מִן הַשָּׁמַיִם) from the heaven; but instead of this, he uses the words, (מִן הַשָּׁמַיִם) in or into the heavens, which convey an idea quite the reverse. Our version, therefore, gives the true sense of the sacred text: He caused an east wind to blow in the heaven; that is, he introduced it for the very purpose of bringing the quails into the camp. To this may be added, that in the whole of this Psalm, as often in the other poetical books of the Hebrews, the two hemistiches are almost parallel, and mutually explain each other. From whence it follows, that (מִן הַשָּׁמַיִם) gashah in this text, has nearly the same meaning as its parallel verb, (רָחַק) raihag, which signifies to introduce. This is accordingly the sense which all interpreters, ancient and modern, have adopted, except the Septuagint and the Vulgate.

From this statement it appears, that the royal Psalmist in this passage means to excite, not to remove the east wind; to introduce, not to expel it from the heavens. But to understand the matter clearly, let it be remembered, that the people of Israel were at that time in the wilderness of Paran; at the distance of three days' journey from Sinai, directly north from the extremity of the Arabian gulf; and by consequence, from Theman, the country from whence the south wind blows, whose name it commonly bears, in the Hebrew text, which brought the quails into the camp of Israel. The same region is named (קָדִים) kadim, that is, the east; because it lay towards the southeast; and was denominated sometimes by the one name, and sometimes by the other. Although the cardinal winds are reckoned four in number, which are again subdivided into many more; yet the ancient philosophers, and particularly Aristotle and Theophrastus, distributed them into two, the north and the south. The westerly winds they included in the north, because they are colder; and the easterly winds in the south, because they are attended by a greater degree of heat. But, since the east wind was anciently comprehended in the south, the east and the south may be used in this text as synonymous; and by consequence, the east is the same, or nearly the same, as the south wind. Nor is it in this text alone, that the sacred writers ascribe to the east, what might seem to be the proper effects of the south wind; the same thing may be observed in every part of scripture. It burns up the fruits of the earth; it blasts the vines, and other fruit-bearing trees; it drove back the Red Sea, and opened a passage to the people of God; it dries up the fountains of water; and by its irresistible violence, it dashes the ships of Tharshish in pieces; and, in fine, scatters destruction among the dwellings of wicked men, and sweeps them from the face of the earth, into the silent mansions of the grave. The prophet Isaiah on this account, calls it a rough wind; and Jonah feelingly describes the vehemence with which it beat upon his head till he fainted, and wished in himself to die. The Greek interpreters uniformly render it the south wind; and Theodoret regards these two winds as nearly the same. Although, therefore, the phrase (מִן הַקָּדִים) suañ hakadim, properly and precisely speaking, denotes the east wind; yet, because the east and the south winds resemble each other in many particulars, the Hebrews, in the opinion of Bochart and other learned writers, appear to have used these names promiscuously; which is the reason that (מִן הַקָּדִים) kadim is, in every part of the Greek version, and particularly in the text under review, rendered the south wind. Thus the same wind seems to have been intended by both these terms, the south or African wind, which, from the interior of Egypt, wafted the quails into the desert, and scattered them round the tents of Israel.

This difficulty admits of other solutions equally natural and easy. The inspired writer may be understood to mean the southeast wind, which might bring the quails as well from the east as from the south; or, that both the east and the south winds were employed on that occasion, the first to scatter about the tents of Israel the congregated flocks, which the last had swept into the desert; or, in order to secure a complete supply for so great a multitude, to gather at the same time from the east and the south, the widely dispersed troops of these birds, which, in distant regions of the sky, were pursuing their annual journey from their winter quarters, to the more temperate latitudes.

It is indeed objected by some writers, that the west wind, rather than the east, ought to blow, in order to produce the effect recorded by Moses; and that, according to Pliny and Aristotle, the quails do not trust themselves to the sky when the humid and boisterous south wind blows; and for this reason, the winds blowing from the north and west, are distinguished by the name of oruithian, because they are favourable to the migratory tribes. But no miracle is involved in this circumstance; for these ancient authors only mean, that the quails pursue their journey with greater difficulty, and are more easily taken when the south wind blows; while, according to the observation of others, these birds of passage were brought back in the spring, by the south winds, which are the most proper for conducting them from the banks of the Nile and the shores of the Red Sea, into the wilderness of Paran.—Paxton.

Ver. 31. The wrath of God came upon them, and slew the fattest of them, and smote down the chosen men of Israel.

See on Ps. 22. 12.

Ver. 45. He sent divers sorts of flies among them, which devoured them; and frogs, which destroyed them.

See on Ex. 8. 4.

Ver. 47. He destroyed their vines with hail, and their sycamore-trees with frost.

The land of Egypt never produced a sufficient quantity of wine to supply the wants of its inhabitants; but still it contained many vines, although it could not boast of extensive and loaded vineyards. The vines of Egypt are conjoined by the Psalmist, with the sycamores, in his triumphant song on the plagues which desolated that country, and procured the liberation of his ancestors: "He destroyed their vines with hail, and their sycamore-trees with frost." This was to the people of Egypt a very serious loss; for the grape has been in all ages a principal part of the viands, with which they treated their friends. Norden was entertained with coffee and grapes by the aga of Essauen; and when Maillet resided in that country, the natives used the young leaves of their vines even more than the fruit. A principal article of their diet consist in minced meat, which they wrap up in small parcels in vine leaves, and laying thus one leaf upon another, they season it according to the custom of their country, and make of it one of the most delicate dishes presented on their tables. The remainder of the vintage they convert into wine, of so delicious a taste and flavour, that it was carried to Rome in the days of her pride and luxury, and esteemed by epicures the third in the number of their most esteemed wines. The use of wine being prohibited by the Mohammedan law, very little is manufactured at present; but it seems, in ancient times, to have been produced in much greater abundance. In the reign of the Pharaohs, it was certainly made in considerable quantities for the use of the court, who probably could procure no such wine from other countries, nor were they acquainted with such liquors as the great now drink in Egypt; and consequently the loss of their vines, as the sacred writer insinuates, must have been considerable.

The grapes of Egypt are said to be much smaller than those which grow in the land of Canaan. Dandini, though an Italian, seems to have been surprised at the extraordinary size of the grapes produced in the vineyards of Lebanon. They are as large as prunes, and as may be inferred from the richness and flavour of the wines for which the mountains of Lebanon have been renowned from time immemorial, of the most delicious taste. To the size and flavour of these grapes, brought by the spies to the camp in the wilderness, the Italian traveller, little versed, it should seem, in the history of the Old Testament, imputes the ardour with which the people of Israel prosecuted the conquest of Palestine. The magnificent cluster which the spies brought from Eschool, was certainly fixed, in no common degree, to stimulate the parched armies of Israel to deeds of heroic valour; but their kindling spirit was effectually damped by the report of the spies, who were intimidated by the robust and martial appearance of the Canaanites, the strength of their cities, and the gigantic stature of the sons of Anak.

The grapes produced in the land of Egypt, although very delicious, are extremely small: but those which grow in the vineyards of Cælia Syria and Palestine, swell to a surprising bigness. The famous bunch of Esheel required the strength of two men to bear it. This difference sufficiently accounts for the surprise and pleasure which the people of Israel manifested, when they first beheld, in the barren and sandy desert, the fruits which grew in their future inheritance. The extraordinary size of the grapes of Canaan, is confirmed by the authority of a modern traveller. In traversing the country about Bethlehem, Doubdan found a most delightful valley full of aromatic herbs and rose bushes, and planted with vines, which he supposed were of the choicest kind: it was actually the valley of Eschool, from whence the spies carried that prodigious bunch of grapes to Moses, of which we read in the book of Numbers. That writer, it is true, saw no such cluster, for he did not visit that fruitful spot in the time of the vintage; but the monks assured him, they still found some, even in the present neglected state of the country, which weighed ten or twelve pounds.

The vineyards of Canaan produce grapes of different kinds; some of them are red, and some white, but the greater part are black. To the juice of the red grape, the sacred writers make frequent allusions: "Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the wine fat?" "In that day, sing ye unto her a vineyard of red wine: I the Lord do keep it." It is, therefore, with strict propriety, the inspired writer calls it "the blood of the grape," a phrase which seems intended to indicate the colour of the juice, or the wine produced from it: "Thou didst drink the pure blood of the grape."

The sycamore forms the middle link in the vegetable kingdom, between the fig and the mulberry; and partakes, according to some natural historians, of the nature of both. This is the reason the Greeks call it σικαμωρος,—a name compounded of σικκος, a fig-tree, and μορος, a mulberry. It resembles the fig-tree in the shape and size of its fruit; which grows neither in clusters, nor at the end of the branches, but by a very singular law, sticking to the trunk of the tree. Its taste is much like that of the wild fig, and pretty agreeable: Pliny says the fruit is very sweet.

It may seem strange that so inferior a tree as the sycamore should be classed by the Psalmist with the choicest vines, in his ode on the plagues of Egypt: "He destroyed their vines with hail, and their sycamore-trees with frost." Many other trees, it may be supposed, might be of much greater consequence to them; and in particular, the date, which, on account of its fruit, the modern Egyptians hold in the highest estimation. But it ought to be remembered, that several trees which are now found in Egypt, and highly valued, might not then be introduced. Very few trees at present in Egypt, are supposed to be natives of the country. If this idea be just, the sycamore and the vine might, at that early period, be in reality the most valuable trees in that kingdom. But, admitting that the sycamore was, in respect of intrinsic properties or general utility, much inferior to some other trees which they possessed, accidental circumstances might give it an importance to which it had originally no claim. The shade of this umbrageous tree is so grateful to the inhabitants of those warm latitudes, that they plant it along the side of the ways near their villages; and as a full-grown sycamore branches out to so great a distance, that it forms a canopy for a circle of forty paces in diameter, a single row of trees on one side of the way is sufficient. It is often seen stretching its arms over the houses, to screen the fainting inhabitant from the glowing heats of the summer. This was a benefit so important to them, that it obtained a place in the divine promise: "They shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig-tree;" and to show at once the certainty of the promise, and the value of the favour, it is repeated by another inspired prophet: "Ye shall call every man his neighbour under his vine and under his fig-tree." Now, it appears from the most authentic records, that the ancient Egyptian coffins, intended to preserve to many generations the bodies of departed relatives; the little square boxes which were placed at the feet of the mummies, enclosing the instruments and utensils in miniature, which belonged to the trade and occupation of the deceased; the figures and instruments of wood found in the catacombs,—are all made of sycamore wood, which, though spongy and porous to appearance, has continued entire and uncorrupted for at least three thousand years. The innumerable barks which ply on the river and over all the vale, in the time of the inundation, are also fabricated of sycamore wood. But besides the various important uses to which the wood was applied, the sycamore produces a species of fig, upon which the people almost entirely subsist, thinking themselves well regaled, when they have a piece of bread, a couple of sycamore figs, and a pitcher filled with water from the Nile.—PAXTON.

Ver. 63. The fire consumed their young men; and their maidens were not given to marriage.

This is described as one of the effects of God's anger upon Israel. In Hindoo families, sometimes, the marriage of daughters is delayed; this is, however, always considered as a great calamity and disgrace. If a person sees girls more than twelve years of age unmarried in a family, he says, "How is it, that that Bramin can sit at home, and eat his food with comfort, when his daughters, at such an age, remain unmarried?" (Ward).—BURDER.

Ver. 64. Their priests fell by the sword; and their widows made no lamentation.

When the cholera swept off such multitudes, the cities from every house had a fearful effect on the passers by; but, after some time, though the scourge remained, the people ceased to lament, asking, "Why should we mourn? the Anama," i. e. the goddess, "is at her play." Thus, instead of the shrieks and howls so common on such occasions, scarcely a sigh or a whisper was heard from the survivors.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 65. And he smote his enemies in the hinder parts; he put them to a perpetual reproach.

Dr. Boothroyd, "And smote his enemies in the hinder parts, and he put them to perpetual disgrace." Some commentators think this alludes "to the emeralds inflicted on the Philistines;" but the figure is used in reference to those who are conquered, and who consequently show their backs when running away. "I will make that fellow show his back," means, "I will cause him to run from me." It is also considered exceedingly disgraceful to be beaten on that part.—ROBERTS.

PSALM LXXIX.

Ver. 2. The dead bodies of thy servants have they given to be meat unto the fowls of the heaven, the flesh of thy saints unto the beasts of the earth. 3. Their blood have they shed like water round about Jerusalem; and there was none to bury them.

See on 1 Sam. 31. 9.

Criminals were at other times executed in public; and then commonly without the city. To such executions without the gate, the Psalmist undoubtedly refers in this complaint: "The dead bodies of thy saints have they given to be meat unto the fowls of the heaven, the flesh of thy saints unto the beasts of the earth. Their blood have they shed like water round about Jerusalem; and there was none to bury them." The last clause admits of two senses. 1st. There was no friend or relations left to bury them. 2d. None were allowed to perform this last office. The despotism of eastern princes often proceeds to a degree of extravagance which is apt to fill the mind with astonishment and horror. It has been thought, from time immemorial, highly criminal to bury those who had lost their lives by the hand of an executioner, without permission. In Morocco, no person dares to bury the body of a malefactor without an order from the emperor; and Windus, who visited that country, speaking of a man who was sawed in two, informs us, that "his body must have remained to be caten by the dogs, if the emperor had not pardoned him; an extravagant custom to pardon a man after he is dead; but unless he does so, no person dares bury the body." To such a degree of savage barbarity it is probable the enemies of God's people carried their opposition, that no person dared to bury the dead bodies of their innocent victims.—PAXTON.

Ver. 11. Let the sighing of the prisoner come before thee; according to the greatness of thy power preserve thou those that are appointed to die.

To illustrate the miserable condition of an oriental prisoner, Chardin relates a story of a very great Armenian merchant, who for some reason was thrown into prison. So long as he bribed the jailer with large donations, he was treated with the greatest kindness and attention; but upon the party who sued the Armenian presenting a considerable sum, first to the judge and afterward to the jailer, the prisoner first experienced a change of treatment. His privileges were retrenched; he was then closely confined; then treated with such inhumanity, as not to be permitted to drink but once in twenty-four hours, and this in the hottest time of the year; and no person was suffered to see him but the servants of the prison; at length he was thrown into a dungeon, where he was in a quarter of an hour brought to the point, which all this severe usage was intended to gain. After such a relation, we cannot be surprised to find the sacred writers placing so strong an emphasis on "the sighing of the prisoner," and speaking of its coming before God, and the necessity of almighty power being exerted for his deliverance.—PAXTON.

PSALM LXXX.

Ver. 4. O Lord God of hosts, how long wilt thou be angry against the prayer of thy people.

Hebrew, "wilt thou smoke?" Ainsworth, "Jehovah, God of hosts; how long wilt thou smoke against the prayer of thy people?" Of an angry man, it is said, "He is continually smoking." "My friend, why do you smoke so to-day?" "This smoke drives me away; I cannot bear it." "How many days is this smoke to remain in my house?" "What care I for the smoke? It does not hurt me."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 5. Thou feedest them with the bread of tears; and givest them tears to drink in great measure.

When a master or a father is angry, he says to his children or servants, "Yes, in future you shall have rice, and the water of your eyes to eat." "You shall have the water of your eyes in abundance to drink." "Alas! alas! I am ever drinking tears."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 13. The bear out of the wood doth waste it, and the wild beast of the field doth devour it.

See on 2 Sam. 18. 8.

Wild hogs are exceedingly numerous and destructive in the East: hence a fine garden will in one night be completely destroyed. The herd is generally led by old boars, that go along with great speed and fierceness. Should there be a fence, they will go round till they find a weak place, and then they all rush in. In travelling, sometimes a large patch of grass may be seen completely torn up, which has been done by the wild hog for the sake of the roots. These animals are also very ferocious, as they will not hesitate to attack either man or beast, when placed in circumstances of difficulty. One of them once ran at a friend of mine, when travelling in his palanquin; but the creature, not calculating well as to the speed of the coolies, only just struck the pole with his tusk; but the hole he left behind in the hard wood was nearly half an inch deep.—ROBERTS.

Under the beautiful allegory of a vine, the royal Psalmist describes the rise and fall of the Jewish commonwealth, in this address to Jehovah: "Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt, thou hast cast out the heathen and planted it

Thou preparedst a room before it, and didst cause it to take deep root, and it filled the land. The hills were covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars. She sent out her boughs unto the sea, and her branches unto the river. Why hast thou then broken down her hedges, so that all they that pass by the way, do pluck her? The boar out of the wood doth waste it, and the wild beast of the field doth devour it." This terrible animal is both fierce and cruel, and so swift that few of the savage tribes can outstrip him in running. His chief abode, says Forbes, is in the forests and jungles; but when the grain is nearly ripe, he commits great ravages in the fields and sugar plantations. The powers that subverted the Jewish nation, are compared to the wild boar and the wild beast of the field, by which the vine is wasted and devoured; and no figure could be more happily chosen. That ferocious and destructive animal, not satisfied with devouring the fruit, lacerates and breaks with his sharp and powerful tusks the branches of the vine, or with his snout digs it up by the roots, pollutes it with his touch, or tramples it under his feet. In Egypt, according to Herodotus and other writers, the labours of this ferocious animal are rendered useful to man. When the Nile has retired within his proper channel, the husbandman scatters his grain upon the irrigated soil, and sends out a number of swine, that partly by treading it with their feet, partly by digging it with their snout, immediately turn it up, and by this means cover the seed. But in every other part of the world, the hog is odious to the husbandman. It was an established custom among the Greeks and Romans, to offer a hog in sacrifice to Ceres, at the beginning of harvest, and another to Bacchus, before they began to gather the vintage; because that animal is equally hostile to the growing corn and the loaded vineyard. From these examples it is quite evident that the prophet meant to describe, under the figure of a wild boar, the cruel and implacable enemies of the church. And it is extremely probable, that he alluded to some more remarkable adversary, as Sennacherib, the king of Assyria, or Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon; both of whom were not less ferocious and destructive than the savage by which they were symbolized.—PAXTON.

Ver. 17. Let thy hand be upon the map of thy right hand, upon the son of man whom thou madest strong for thyself.

If we would understand the genuine import of this phrase, we must attend to a custom which obtained in Judea and other eastern countries. At meals the master of the feast placed the person whom he loved best on his right hand, as a token of love and respect: and as they sat on couches, in the intervals between the dishes, when the master leaned upon his left elbow, the man at his right hand, leaning also on his, would naturally repose his head on the master's bosom; while at the same time the master laid his right hand on the favourite's shoulder or side, in testimony of his favourable regard. See also John xxi. 20. (Pirrie.)—BURROU.

PSALM LXXXI.

Ver. 2. Take a psalm, and bring hither the timbrel, the pleasant harp with the psaltery.

By timbrels are meant the hand-instruments, still used in the East, and called diff, the same name which stands here in the Hebrew text. By the Hebrew word kinnor, here translated harp, we are probably to understand a stringed instrument, a kind of guitar, similar to those called by the Arabs, tambura. Josephus says, that this instrument had ten strings, and was played with a plectrum; in more ancient times, however, it appears to have been played with the fingers, as we may infer from 1 Sam. xvi. 23. xviii. 16. xix. 9. It is almost always mentioned in the Old Testament on occasions of cheerful entertainments and rejoicings. The name of the third instrument, nabel, mentioned in the text, and here translated psaltery, has also been preserved in the Greek and Latin languages, nabla, nabulum. As the Hebrew word signifies a leathern bottle, it has been conjectured that the sounding-board was of that shape. But St. Jerome and Isidore say that the instrument resembled a Greek delta inverted,  $\nabla$ . This leads us to conjecture that nabel was that kind of lyre so frequently found on ancient monuments, and in statues of Apollo. A similar stringed instrument is still usual in the East. Niebuhr has given a description and drawing of one in his Travels, vol. i. p. 179. He saw it in the hand of the barbari, who came from Dongola to Cairo, and call it in their language kussir, whereas the Arabs call it, like other foreign stringed instruments, tambra. "The belly of it is like a wooden dish, with a small hole below, and having a skin stretched over it, which is higher in the middle than on the sides. Two sticks, which are united at the top by a third, go obliquely through the skin. Five catgut strings lie over it, supported by a bridge. There are no pegs to this instrument, but each string is tuned by having some linen wound with it round the transverse stick. It is played in two different ways, namely, either pinched with the fingers, or by passing a piece of leather, which hangs at the side, over the strings; and my barbari danced as he played." According to the observation of one Rabbi Simeon, quoted by Rabbi Salomon Jarchi, in his commentary on the above passage in the Psalms, kinnor differed from nabel only in number of strings and pegs.—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 10. I am the LORD thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt: open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it.

"My friend, you tell me you are in great distress: take my advice: go to the king, and open your mouth wide." I went to the great man and opened my mouth, but he has not given me any thing." "I opened my mouth to him, and have gained all I wanted." "Why open your mouth there? it will be all in vain." Does a person not wish to be troubled, he says to the applicant, "Do not say Ah, ah! here;" which means, do not open your mouth, because that word cannot be pronounced without opening the mouth.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 16. He should have fed them also with the finest of the wheat: and with honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee.

The soil, both of the maritime and inland parts of Syria and Phœnicia, is of a light loamy nature, and easily cultivated. Syria may be considered as a country consisting of three long strips of land, exhibiting different qualities: one extending along the Mediterranean, forming a warm humid valley, the salubrity of which is doubtful, but which is extremely fertile; the other, which forms its frontier, is a hilly, rugged soil, but more salubrious; the third, lying beyond the eastern hills, combines the drought of the latter with the heat of the former. We have seen by what a happy combination of climate and soil this province unites in a small compass the advantages and productions of different zones, insomuch that the God of nature seems to have designed it for one of the most agreeable habitations of this continent. The soil is a fine mould, without stones, and almost without even the smallest pebble. Volney himself, who furnishes the particulars of this statement, is compelled to admit, that what is said of its actual fertility, exactly corresponds with the idea given of it in the Hebrew scriptures. Wherever wheat is sown, if the rains do not fail, it repays the cultivator with profusion, and grows to the height of a man. The Mount of Olives, near Jerusalem, and several other districts in Judea and Galilee, are covered with olive plantations, whose fruit is equal to any produced in the Levant. The fig-trees in the neighbourhood of Joppa, are equally beautiful and productive as the olive. Were the Holy Land as well inhabited and cultivated as formerly, Dr. Shaw declares it would still be more fruitful than the very best part of Syria or Phœnicia; for the soil itself is generally much richer, and all things considered, yields a preferable crop. Thus, the cotton, which is gathered in the plains of Rama, Esdraelon, and Zabulon, is in greater esteem, according to that excellent writer, than what is cultivated near Sidon and Tripoli; neither is it possible for pulse, wheat, or grain of any kind, to be richer or better tasted, than what is commonly sold at Jerusalem. The barrenness, or scarcity rather, of which some authors may either ignorantly or maliciously complain, does not proceed, in the opinion of Dr. Shaw, from the incapacity or natural unfruitfulness of the country, but from the want of inhabitants, and from the great aversion to labour and industry in those few by whom it is possessed. The perpetual discords and depredations among the petty princes who share this fine country, greatly obstruct the operations of the husbandman, who must have small encouragement to sow, when it is quite uncertain who shall gather in the harvest. It is in other respects a fertile country, and still capable of affording to its neighbours the like ample supplies of corn and oil, which it is known to have done in the days of Solomon, who gave yearly to Hiram twenty thousand measures of wheat for food to his household, and twenty measures of pure oil.

The parts about Jerusalem particularly, being rocky and mountainous, have been therefore supposed to be barren and unfruitful; yet, granting this conclusion, which is however far from being just, a country is not to be characterized from one single district of it, but from the whole. And besides, the blessing which was given to Judah was not of the same kind with the blessing of Asher or of Issachar, that "his bread should be fat or his land pleasant," but that "his eyes should be red with wine, and his teeth should be white with milk." In the estimation of the Jewish lawgiver, milk and honey (the chief dainties and subsistence of the earlier ages, as they still continue to be of the Bedouin Arabs) are the glory of all lands; these productions are either actually enjoyed in the lot of Judah, or at least, might be obtained by proper care and application. The abundance of wine alone is wanting at present; yet the acknowledged goodness of that little, which is still made at Jerusalem and Hebron, clearly proves, that these barren rocks, as they are called, would yield a much greater quantity, if the abstemious Turk and Arab would permit the vine to be further propagated and improved.

Wild honey, which formed a part of the food of John the Baptist in the wilderness, may indicate to us the great plenty of it in those deserts; and, that consequently taking the hint from nature, and enticing the bees into hives and larger colonies, it might be produced in much greater quantity. Josephus accordingly calls Jericho the honey-bearing country. The great abundance of wild honey is often mentioned in scripture; a memorable instance of which occurs in the first book of Samuel: "And all they of the land came to a wood, and there was honey upon the ground; and when the people were come to the wood, behold the honey dropped." This circumstance perfectly accords with the view which Moses gave of the promised land, in the song with which he closed his long and eventful career: "He made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock." That good land preserved its character in the time of David, who thus celebrates the distinguishing bounty of God to his chosen people: "He would have fed them also with the finest of the wheat, and with honey out of the rock would I have satisfied thee." In these holy strains, the sacred poet availed himself of the most valuable products of Canaan, to lead the faith and hope of his nation to bounties of a higher order, of greater price, and more urgent necessity than any which the soil even of that favoured region, stimulated and sustained as it certainly was by the special blessing of heaven, produced,—the bounties of sovereign and redeeming mercy, purchased with the blood, and imparted by the spirit of the Son of God.—Paxton.

PSALM LXXXIV.

Ver. 1. How amiable are thy tabernacles, O LORD of hosts! 2. My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth, for the courts of the LORD; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God.

The first part of the Psalm cannot be better illustrated (let there be no misinterpretation of our meaning) than by the example of those who go in pilgrimage to Mecca. As their enthusiasm increases in proportion as they advance through the desert to the holy place; as they are used to be ravished when they behold the shining towers of the Kaaba, so does the journey to Jerusalem proceed with increasing jingling spirit and joy through the scorched valleys. They become as it were a well of water, for already at Baca they behold the face of Jehovah.—ROSEMILLER.

A parallel instance of pious enthusiasm is exhibited in Clarke's account of his approach to the Holy City, (Travels in the Holy Land, p. 144.) "At three P. M. we again mounted our horses, and proceeded on our route. No sensation of fatigue or heat could counterbalance the eagerness and zeal which animated all our party, in the approach to Jerusalem; every individual pressed forward, hoping first to announce the joyful intelligence of its appearance. We passed some insignificant ruins, either of ancient buildings or of modern villages; but had they been of more importance, they would have excited little notice at the time, so earnestly bent was every mind towards the main object of interest and curiosity. At length, after about two hours had been passed in this state of anxiety and suspense, ascending a hill towards the south, 'HAGIOPOLIS!' exclaimed a Greek in the van of our cavalcade; and instantly throwing himself from his horse, was seen bareheaded, upon his knees, facing the prospect he surveyed. Suddenly the sight burst upon us all. Who shall describe it? The effect produced was that of total silence throughout the whole company. Many of the party, by an immediate impulse, took off their hats, as if entering a church, without being sensible of so doing. The Greeks and Catholics shed torrents of tears; and presently beginning to cross themselves with unfeigned devotion, asked if they might be permitted to take off the covering from their feet, and proceed, barefooted, to the Holy Sepulchre. We had not been prepared for the grandeur of the spectacle, which the city alone exhibited. Instead of a wretched and ruined town, by some described as the desolated remnant of Jerusalem, we beheld, as it were, a flourishing and steady metropolis; presenting a magnificent assemblage of domes, towers, palaces, churches, and monasteries; all of which, glittering in the sun's rays, shone with inconceivable splendour. As we drew nearer, our whole attention was engrossed by its noble and interesting appearance. The lofty hills whereby it is surrounded give to the city itself an appearance of elevation inferior to that which it really possesses."—B.

Ver. 3. Yea, the sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O LORD of hosts, my King, and my God.

The ibis was so venerated in Egypt, as to be an allowed inmate in sacred structures. Something of the same kind occurs also in Persia. "Within a mosque at Oudjunc, lies interred the son of a king, called Schah-Zadeh-Imam Degafer, whom they reckon a saint: the dome is rough cast over; before the mosque there is a court, well planted with many high plane-trees, on which we saw a great many storks that haunt thereabout all the year round." (Thevenot.)

By the altars of Jehovah we are to understand the temple. The words probably refer to the custom of several nations of antiquity, that birds which build their nests on the temples, or within the limits of them, were not suffered to be driven away, much less killed, but found a secure and uninterrupted dwelling. Hence, when Aristodikus disturbed the birds' nests of the temple of Kumæ, and took the young from them, a voice, according to a tradition preserved by Herodotus, is said to have spoken these words from the interior of the temple: "Most villainous of men, how darest thou do such a thing? to drive away such as seek refuge in my temple?" The Athenians were so enraged at Atarbes, who had killed a sparrow which built on the temple of Æsculapius, that they killed him. Among the Arabs, who are more closely related to the Hebrews, birds which have built their nests on the temple of Mecca were inviolable from the earliest times. In the very ancient poem of a Dschorhamidish prince, published by A. Schultens, in which he laments that his tribe had been deprived of the protection of the sanctuary of Mecca, it is said,

We lament the house, whose dove
Was never suffered to be hurt,
She remained there secure; in it also
The sparrow built its nest.

Another ancient Arabian poet, Nabega, the Dhobianit, swears "by the sanctuary which affords shelter to the birds which seek it there." Niebuhr says: "I will observe, that among the Mohammedans, not only is the Kaaba a refuge for pigeons, but also on the mosques over the graves of Ali and Hossein, on the Dsjamea, or chief mosque at Helle and in other cities, they are equally undisturbed."—ROSEN-MULLER.

The term in this passage is connected with the proper name of the swallow; and therefore cannot be understood as the common name of the feathered race, but like the other, must denote a particular species of bird, which, by the general suffrage of interpreters, is the sparrow. This idea is confirmed by the plaintive description of David, according to which, that little bird, under the direction of instinct alone, provides a habitation for herself, in the abodes of men, where she rears her young, and enjoys the sweets of repose. Some of these birds the Psalmist had probably seen constructing their nests, and propagating their kind, in the buildings near the altar, or in the courts of the temple; and piously longs to revisit a scene so dear to his heart. The altar is here by a synecdoche of a part for the whole, to be understood of the tabernacle, among the rafters of which the sparrow and the swallow were allowed to nestle; or rather, for the buildings which surrounded the sacred edifice, where the priests and their assistants had their ordinary residence. Even these exterior buildings were extremely desirable to the exiled monarch, because of their vicinity to the splendid symbols of the divine presence, and the instruments of his worship. The holy Psalmist sometimes wished for the wings of a dove, to waft him into the desert from the cruel oppression of his enemies; but on this occasion, when he is compelled to flee for his life into the wilderness, he longs for the enjoyment of a sparrow, which flew unobserved into the courts of the tabernacle, and flitted among the beams without interruption.—PAXTON.

Ver. 6. Who passing through the valley of Baca, make it a well: the rain also filleth the pools.

The words, Who passing through the valley of Baca, make it a pool: the rain also filleth the pools,—are, in the margin, Who passing through the valley of mulberry-trees. The Seventy, in Chronicles, render it pear-trees; in which they are followed by Aquila and the Vulgate. Some think Baca, in the eighty-fourth Psalm, is the name of a rivulet, which burst out of the earth, at the foot of a mountain, with a plaintive murmur, from which it derived its name. But it is more probable that Baca is the name of some shrub or tree. Those who translate it the mulberry-tree, to illustrate the passage in the Psalm, pretend it grows best in the dry ground; but this seems to be unfounded. Marinus imagines, that Baca signifies the mulberry-tree, because the fruit of the mulberry exudes a juice resembling trees. Parkhurst rather thinks that Baca means a kind of large shrub, which the Arabs likewise call Baca, and which probably was so named from its distilling an odiferous gum. For Baca with an aleph, seems to be related to Bacah with a hay, which signifies to ooze, to distil in small quantities, to weep or shed tears. This idea perfectly corresponds with the description which Celsius has given of this valley. It is not, according to him, a place abounding with fountains and pools of water, but rugged and embarrassed with bushes and stones, which could not be passed through without labour and suffering; a striking emblem of that vale of thorns and tears, through which all believers must pass to the heavenly Jerusalem.

The great uncertainty among interpreters concerning the real meaning of the term Bacah, has induced Mr. Harmer to hazard a conjecture, that the tree meant in this passage is the weeping-willow. But this plant is not found in a dry sandy vale, where the thirsty traveller is compelled to dig for water, and to form cisterns in the earth, to receive the rain of heaven. In such a situation, we expect to find the pungent aromatic shrub distilling its fragrant gum; not the weeping-willow, the favourite situation of which is the watery plain, or the margin of the brook.—PAXTON.

Ver. 7. They go from strength to strength; every one of them in Zion appeareth before God.

The scarcity of water in the East makes travellers particularly careful to take up their lodgings as much as possible near some river or fountain. D'Herbelot informs us, that the Mohammedans have dug wells in the deserts, for the accommodation of those who go in pilgrimage to Mecca. To conveniences perhaps of this kind, made, or renewed, by the devout Israelites in the valley of Baca, to facilitate their going up to Jerusalem, the Psalmist may refer in these words. Hence also there appears less of accident than we commonly think of, in Jacob's lodging on the banks of Jabbol, and the men of David awaiting for him by the brook Besor, when they could not hold out with him in his march.—HARMER.

In this Psalm are described the journeys of the Israelites to their feasts at Jerusalem, from the distant parts of the country. It mentions their digging wells in the valley of Baca, which, in the rainy season, were filled with excellent water, and became a great convenience to succeeding travellers. In reference to them, the travellers are said to have gone from strength to strength till they arrived at Mount Zion, in Jerusalem, to appear before God there, which was the object of their journey. When a weary traveller arrives at a well in the wilderness, his strength is nearly gone, but on drinking of its water he is revived and strengthened for another stage; and, on falling in with another well, he receives fresh vigour for again proceeding on his journey. So that going from strength to strength may literally mean from well to well; though some understand by this, going from company to company.—CAMFELL.

Ver. 10. For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand. I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness.

Ainsworth, "I have chosen to sit at the threshold, in the house of my God." And Dr. Boothroyd, "Abide, or sit, at the threshold." I believe the word door-keeper does not convey the proper meaning of the words, "to sit at the threshold;" because the preference of the Psalmist was evidently given to a very humble situation, whereas that of a door-keeper, in eastern estimation, is truly respectable and confidential. The gods are always represented as having door-keepers, who were of great dignity and power, as they also fought against other deities. In the heathen temples there are images near the entrance, called kaval-kāran, i. e. guards or door-keepers. Kings and great men have also officers, whose business it is to stand at the door, or gate, as keepers of the entrance. The most dignified native of Ceylon is the Maha Modeliar of the governor's gate, to whom all others must make obeisance. The word door-keeper, therefore, does not convey the idea of humility, but of honour.

The marginal reading, however, "to sit at the threshold," at once strikes an eastern mind as a situation of deep humility. See the poor heathen devotee, he goes and sits near the threshold of his temple. Look at the beggar, he sits or prostrates himself at the threshold of the door or gate till he shall have gained his suit. "I am in great trouble. I will go and lie down at the door of the temple." "Friend, you appear to be very ill."—"Yes!" "Then go and prostrate yourself at the threshold of the temple!" "Muttoo, I can get you the situation of a Peon; will you accept of it?"—"Excuse me, sir, I pray you; I had better lie at your threshold than do that." "Go, do that! it is far better for me to lie at the threshold as a common beggar." I think, therefore, the Psalmist refers to the attitude of a beggar, a suppliant at the threshold of the house of the Lord, as being preferable to the splendid dwellings of the wicked.—ROBERTS.

PSALM LXXXV.

Ver. 10. Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other.

Dr. Boothroyd, "Righteousness and peace are embraced." In the Hindoo book called Iraku-Vangesham, it is said, the "lotus flowers were kissing each other." When the branches of two separate trees meet, in consequence of strong winds, it is said, "they kiss each other." When a young palm-tree, which grows near the parent stock, begins to move, (by the wind,) the people say, "Ah! the mother is kissing the daughter." A woman says of the ornaments around her neck, "Yes, these embrace my neck." Has a female put on the nose-ring, it is, it is said, kissing her. The idea, therefore, is truly oriental, and shows the intimate union of righteousness and peace.—ROBERTS.

PSALM LXXXVII.

Ver. 2. The LORD loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob.

"Truly, I love the gates of Chinna Amma more than the gates of Pun-Amma." "No, no; he does not love the gates of that woman; he will never marry her." "He is angry with my gates; he will not pass them." "Love his gates! ay, for a good reason; he gets plenty of help from them."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 7. As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be there: all my springs are in thee.

A man of great charities is said to have many springs: "His heart is like the springs of a well." "Where are my springs, my lord; are they not in you?" Tears also are spoken of as coming from springs in the body; thus the mother of Rāmar said to him, in consequence of great sorrow, "The waters of my eyes have dried up the springs of affection."—ROBERTS.

PSALM LXXXIX.

Ver. 9. Thou rulest the raging of the sea: when the waves thereof arise, thou stillest them.

10. Thou hast broken Rahab in pieces, as one that is slain: thou hast scattered thine enemies with thy strong arm. 11. The heavens are thine, the earth also is thine: as for the world, and the fulness thereof, thou hast founded them.

See on Eph. 6. 16.

Ver. 12. The north and the south thou hast created them: Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name.

The northeast part of Lebanon, adjoining to the Holy Land, is in scripture distinguished by the name of Hermon; and is, by consequence, mentioned as the northern boundary of the country beyond Jordan, and more particularly of the kingdom of Og, or of the half tribe of Manasseh, on the east of that river. But, besides this Mount Hermon, in the northern border of the country beyond Jordan, we read of another mountain of the same name, lying within the land of Canaan, on the west of the river Jordan, not far from Mount Tabor. To this mountain the holy Psalmist is thought to refer in these words: "The north and the south thou hast created them: Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name;" and in the following passage: "As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descends upon the mountains of Sion."—PAXTON.

Ver. 14. Justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne: mercy and truth shall go before thy face.

Dr. Boothroyd, "Are the basis of thy throne." The Hebrew, "the establishment of thy throne." "What was the foundation of his throne?" "Justice! Truly righteousness is the alle-nāram, foundation or basis, of all his ways."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 25. I will set his hand also in the sea, and his right hand in the rivers.

The meaning is: he shall reign from the Mediterranean Sea to the Euphrates. This is figuratively expressed thus: his right hand shall extend to the sea, or his left to the Euphrates. A similar expression was used, according to Curtius, by the Scythian ambassadors to Alexander. "I," said they, "the gods had given thee a body as great as thy mind, the whole world would not be able to contain thee; thou wouldst reach with one hand to the east, and with the other to the west."—ROSENMULLER.

PSALM XC.

Ver. 4. For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night.

It is evident in the scriptures, that besides these cares, they had watchmen who used to patrol in their streets: and it is natural to suppose, that they were these people that gave them notice how the seasons of the night passed away. I am indebted for this thought to Sir John Chardin. He observes, in a note on Ps. x. 4, that as the people of the East have no clocks, the several parts of the day and of the night, which are eight in all, are given notice of. In the Indies, the parts of the night are made known as well by instruments of music, in great cities, as by the rounds of the watchmen, who with cries and small drums, give them notice that a fourth part of the night is passed. Now as these cries awaked those who had slept all that quarter part of the night, it appeared to them but as a moment. There are sixty of these people in the Indies, by day, and as many by night; that is, fifteen for each division.

It is apparent the ancient Jews knew how the night passed away, which must probably be by some public notice given them: but whether it was by simply publishing at the close of each watch, what watch was then ended; or whether they made use of any instruments of music in this business, may not be easily determinable; and still less what measures of time the watchmen made use of.—HARMER.

Ver. 5. Thou carriest them away as with a flood; they are as a sleep: in the morning they are like grass which groweth up. 6. In the morning it flourisheth, and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down, and withereth.

In temperate latitudes, the fields are generally covered with durable verdure; but in Asia, gramineous plants of all kinds are extremely perishable. The wonderful rapidity of their growth is celebrated by every traveller into the East. Sir Thomas Roe says, that when the ground has been destitute of rain nine months together, and looks all of it like the barren sand in the desert of Arabia, where there is not one spire of green grass to be found, within a few days after those fat enriching showers begin to fall, the face of the earth there (as it were by a new resurrection) is so revived, and throughout so renewed, as that it is presently covered all over with a pure green mantle. Dr. Russel, in the same admiring terms, describes the springing of the earth as a resurrection of vegetable nature. Vegetation is so extremely quick in Hindostan, that, as fast as the water rises, the plants of rice grow before it, so that the ear is never immersed. To the powerful influence of the rain upon the face of oriental nature, Moses compares, with singular beauty and force, the effect which the lessons of heavenly wisdom produce in the human mind: "My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distil as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass." Even the dews, which are most copious in those regions, produce a change so beneficial and sudden, that Solomon compares to their energy, the influence of royal favour, which, in oriental courts, frequently raises in one day a person from the lowest condition, to the highest ranks of life: The king's "favour is as a dew upon the grass." But such extraordinary quickness of growth is incompatible with strength and permanence; the feeble and sickly blade yields as quickly to the burning heat, and vanishes away. To this rapid change the Psalmist compares the short-lived prosperity of wicked men: his own evanescent comforts; the swift progress of his days, and of time in general. So soon are the powers of nature exhausted, that the grass does not always come to maturity, even in the best soils; in the language of ancient prophecy, "it is blasted before it be grown up."—PAXTON.

Ver. 9. For all our days are passed away in thy wrath; we spend our years as a tale that is told.

"This year has been to me as a fabulous story: like the repetition of a dream, my days pass away. The beginning of life is as the dew-drop upon the tender herb: in ten moons it assumes its shape, and is brought forth; it lies down, crawls, prattles, walks, and becomes acquainted with science. At sixteen he is a man; goes forth in the pride of his youth, gets a wife, and becomes the father of children. The husk of his rice he refuses to part with, and his wish is to enjoy all. He thinks by living cheaply, by refusing to support charities, or to dispense favours, he is of all men the most happy. He is regardless of the writing on his forehead, (late, and is like the lamp which shineth, and ceaseth to shine; pour in oil, and there will be light; take it away, and there will be darkness. In old age come the rheumatics, the jaundice, and an enlarged belly; the eyes are filled with rheums, and the phlegm comes forth. His body becomes dry, his back bends, his wife and children abhor him, and in visions he sees the deathly car and horse. The place of burning says, 'Come, come,' and his family say, 'Go, go.' His strength is gone, his speech falters, his eyeballs roll, and his living soul is taken away. The people then talk of his good and evil deeds, and ask, 'Is this life?' The funeral rites follow; the music sounds forth, and the living carry the dead to its place of burning." Thus sung the devoted Aruna-Kiryār.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 14. O satisfy us early with thy mercy, that we may rejoice and be glad all our days.

Ainsworth, "Satisfie us in the morning with thy mercie." Afflictions and sorrows are spoken of as the "night of life," and the deliverance from them, as the "morning of joy." "Yes, the night has been long and gloomy, but the morning has at last come." "Ah! morning, morning, when wilt thou come?"—ROBERTS.

PSALM XCI.

Ver. 1. He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.

To say a person is under the shadow of a great man, means, he is under his protection. "Oh, my lord, all the people are against me; they are pursuing me as the tiger: let me come under your shade," i. e. shadow. "Ay, ay, the fellow is safe enough, now he has crept under the shadow of the king." "Begone, miscreant, thou shalt not creep under my shadow." "Many years have I been under the shadow of my father; how shall I now leave it?" "Gone, for ever gone, is the shadow of my days!" says the lamenting widow.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 5. Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day.

6. Nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday.

When the cholera rages, no one will go out while the sun is at its zenith, because it is believed that the demon of the pestilence is then actively engaged. "The hot exhalations of noonday are the chariots of the fiends." The demons of darkness are said to have the most power at midnight.—ROBERTS.

The arrow, in this passage, means the pestilence. The Arabs thus denote it: "I desired to remove to a less contagious air. I received from Solyman, the emperor, this message: that the emperor wondered what I meant, in desiring to remove my habitation. Is not the pestilence God's arrow, which will always hit his mark. If God would visit me herewith, how could I avoid it. 'Is not the plague,' said he, 'in my own palace; and yet I do not think of removing.'" (Busbequins.)

We find the same opinion expressed in Smith's Remarks on the Turks. "What," say they, "is not the plague the dart of Almighty God, and can we escape the blow he levels at us. Is not his hand steady to hit the persons he aims at? Can we run out of his sight, and beyond his power?" So Herbert, (p. 99,) speaking of Curroon, says, "that year his empire was so wounded with God's arrows of plague, pestilence, and famine, as that thousand years before was never so terrible."—BURDER.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under foot.

"Thou shalt tread upon the lion." This expression denotes the subjection of the lion, and the fiercest beasts, to the power of man. His superiority is indisputable. Eastern monarchs have on particular occasions displayed their grandeur by exhibiting lions in a tame condition. When a Greek ambassador was introduced to the Calif Mootader, "among the other spectacles of rare and stupendous luxury, a hundred lions were brought out, with a keeper to each lion." This embassy was received at Bagdad, A. H. 305. A. D. 917. When Mr. Bell, of Anternomy, accompanied the Russian ambassador to the audience of the unfortunate Shah Hussein, of Persia, two lions were introduced, to denote the power of the king over the fiercest animals.—BURDER.

The adder was known to the ancient Hebrews under various names.—It is the opinion of some interpreters, that the word sachal, which in some parts of scripture denotes a lion, in others means an adder, or some other kind of serpent. Thus, in the ninety-first Psalm, they render it the basilisk: "Thou shalt tread upon the adder and the basilisk, the young lion and the dragon thou shalt trample under foot." Indeed, all the ancient expositors agree, that some species of serpent is meant, although they cannot determine what particular serpent the sacred writer had in his eye. The learned Bochart thinks it extremely probable, that the holy Psalmist in this verse treats of serpents only; and by consequence, that both the terms sachal and shephir, mean some kind of snakes, as well as phethan and tannin, because the coherence of the verse is by this view better preserved, than by mingling lions and serpents together, as our translators and other interpreters have commonly done. The union of lions, adders, and dragons, is not natural; nor is it easy to imagine what can be meant by treading upon the lion, and trampling the young lion under foot; for it is not possible in walking to tread upon the lion, as upon the adder, the basilisk, and other serpents.

As the term sachal, when applied to wild beasts, denotes a black lion; so in the present application, it means the black adder. Many serpents are of a black colour, but some of them are much blacker than others. The sachal, therefore, denotes the black snake, the colour of which is intensely deep.

Another name which the adder bears in scripture is achshub. It occurs in the following description of wicked men: "They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent: adders' poison is under their lips." The Chaldee renders it the poison of a spider; but the most common interpretation is that which our translators have adopted. Some, however, contend that the asp is intended; and in support of their opinion, quote the authority of many Greek and Latin interpreters, and what must be decisive with every Christian, the suffrage of an inspired apostle, who gives this version of the Hebrew text: "The poison of asps is under their lips." The name in Hebrew is derived from an Arabic verb, which signifies to coil up; which perfectly corresponds with the nature of this animal, for, in preparing to strike, it contracts itself into a spiral form, and raises its horrid head from the middle of the orb. It assumes the same form when it goes to sleep, coiling its body into a number of circles, with its head in the centre. This is the reason that in Greek, Aspis denotes a shield, as well as a serpent. Now, the Grecian shields are circular, as we learn from Virgil, but whether the name of the shield (Aspis) was derived from the serpent, or the name of the serpent from the form of the shield, it is of no consequence to determine.—PAXTON.

PSALM XCII.

Ver. 10. But my horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of a unicorn: I shall be anointed with fresh oil.

Montanus has, instead of fresh oil, anointed with the literal meaning of the original, rufido oleo, with green oil. Ainsworth also says, "fresh or green oil." Calmet, "As the plants imparted somewhat of their colour, as well as of their fragrance, hence the expression green oil." Harmer, "I shall be anointed with green oil." Some of these writers think the term GREEN, as it is in the original, means "precious fragrant oil;" others, literally green in colour; and others, FRESH or NEWLY made oil. But I think it will appear to mean COLD DRAWN oil, that which has been expressed or squeezed from the nut or fruit without the process of boiling. The Orientals prefer this kind for anointing themselves to all others; it is considered the most precious, the most pure and efficacious. Nearly all the medicinal oils are thus extracted; and because they cannot gain so much by this method as by the boiling process, oils so drawn are very dear. Hence their name for the article also thus prepared is patche, i. e. GREEN oil! But this term in eastern phraseology is applied to other things, which are unboiled or raw; thus unboiled water is called patche, green water; patche-pil, also, green milk, means that which has not been boiled, and the butter made from it is called green butter; and uncooked meat, or yams, go by the same name. I think, therefore, the Psalmist alludes to that valuable article which is called GREEN oil, on account of its being expressed from the nut, or fruit, without the process of boiling.—ROBERTS.

The virgin-oil (Pogloe virgineo) is made as well from green and unripe, as from ripe fruit; but with the difference, that no hot water, or very little, is used, in the pressing; by which the berries are less affected, and less of the acid or crude elements extracted from them. In this mannerless oil is obtained, but it is whiter, more pleasant, and justly preferred to every other sort. The ancients called it green oil, probably on account of its being extracted from green and unripe berries. This explains a passage in Suetonius, which says, "that Julius Cesar, out of politeness, ate old and spoiled oil, instead of green, not to give the person who had invited him any ground to complain of his want of politeness, or his inattention. Some commentators on the Bible reasonably suppose that this green oil is spoken of as being the best, when the Psalmist expresses the happiness with which God had blessed him: I am anointed with green oil. (Keyssler).—BRANER.

Mr. Bruce, after having given it as his opinion that the reem of scripture is the rhinoceros, says, "the derivation of this word, both in the Hebrew and in the Ethiopic, seems to be from erectness, or standing straight. This is certainly no particular quality in the animal itself, which is not more, or even so much erect, as many other quadrupeds, for in its knees it is rather crooked; but it is from the circumstance and manner in which his horn is placed. The horns of other animals are inclined to some degree of parallelism with the nose or os frontis. The horn of the rhinoceros alone is erect and perpendicular to this bone, on which it stands at right angles, thereby possessing a greater purchase, or power, as a lever, than any horn could possibly have in any other position. "This situation of the horn is very happily alluded to in the sacred writings: my horn shall thou exalt like the horn of a unicorn; and the horn here alluded to is not wholly figurative, as I have already taken notice in the course of my history, but was really an ornament worn by great men in the days of victory, preference, or rejoicing, when they were anointed with new, sweet, or fresh oil, a circumstance which David joins with that of erecting the horn."

The term for unicorn, in the Hebrew text, is (רִמ) rim, or (רִמָּה) reem; and is derived from a verb, which signifies to be exalted or lifted up. This term, which in Hebrew signifies only height, is rendered by the Greek interpreters μυρκερος, and by the Latins unicornis; both which answer to our English word unicorn. Jerome and others, doubtful to what animal it belongs, render it sometimes rhinoceros, and sometimes unicorn. It is evident from the sacred scriptures, that the reem is an animal of considerable height, and of great strength. Thus Balaam reluctantly declared concerning Israel: "God brought them out of Egypt; he hath as it were the strength of (a reem) a unicorn." So great in the estimation of that reluctant seer, was the strength of the reem, that he repeats the eulogium in the very same words in the next chapter. From the grateful ascriptions of David, we learn that it is a horned animal: "But my horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of a unicorn." And Moses, in his benediction of Joseph, states a most important fact, that it has two horns; the words are: His horns are like the horns of (a reem), in the singular number) a unicorn. Some interpreters, determined to support the claims of the unicorn to the honour of a place in the sacred volume, contend, that in this instance the singular, by an enallage or change of number, is put for the plural. But this is a gratuitous assertion; and besides, it admitted, would greatly diminish the force and propriety of the comparison. The two sons of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh, had been adopted into the family of Jacob and appointed the founders of two distinct tribes, whose descendants in the times of Moses were become numerous and respectable in the congregation. These were the two horns with which Joseph was to attack and subdue his enemies; and by consequence, propriety required an allusion to a creature, not with one, but with two horns.

In the book of Job, the reem is represented as a very fierce and intractable animal, which, although possessed of sufficient strength to labour, sternly and pertinaciously refuses to bend his neck to the yoke: "Will the unicorn (in Hebrew the reem) be willing to serve thee, or abide by thy crib? Canst thou bind the reem with his band in the furrow, or will he harrow the valleys after thee? Wilt thou trust him because his strength is great? Or wilt thou leave thy labour to him? Wilt thou believe him that he will bring home thy seed, and gather it into thy barn?" So far from being disposed to submit to the dominion of man, he is extremely hostile and dangerous. Little inferior to the lion himself in strength and fury, he is sometimes associated in scripture with that destroyer. "Save me," cried our Lord to his Father, "save me from the lion's mouth: for thou hast heard me from the horns of the unicorns." In the prophecies of Isaiah, it is united with other powerful animals, to symbolize the great leaders and princes of the hostile nations, that laid waste his native land: "And the unicorns shall come down with them, and the bullocks with the bulls; and their land shall be soaked with blood, and their dust made fat with fatness." Such are the general characters of the reem, as delineated in the sacred volume: but besides these, several hints are given, which seem to point out, with no little certainty, the genus under which the reem ought to be classed. In that sublime composition, where the Psalmist assigns the reasons why God is to be honoured, he joins the calf with the young reem, and ascribes to them the same kind of movement: "He maketh them also to skip like a calf; Lebanon and Sirion like a young (reem, or) unicorn." The prophet Isaiah, in a passage already quoted, classes him with the bullocks and the bulls; and Moses assigns him the same station, furnishes him with horns, and makes him push like a bullock. If these circumstances are duly considered, no doubt will remain that he is nearly allied to the creatures with which he is associated.

These observations will enable us to examine with more success the various interpretations of the original name proposed by different expositors. Our translators, following the Greek fathers, consider the reem as a creature with one horn; and, agreeably to this idea, render it unicorn. But this interpretation is encumbered with insuperable difficulties. The unicorn is a creature totally unknown in those countries where the scriptures were written, and the patriarchs sojournd. But it is probable, that God himself, in his exposition with Job, would take an illustration of considerable length, from a creature with which the afflicted man was altogether unacquainted; and mention this unknown animal in the midst of those with which he was quite familiar? Nor is it to be supposed, that Moses, David, and the prophets, would so frequently speak of an animal unknown in Egypt and Palestine, and the surrounding countries; least of all, that they would borrow their comparisons from it, familiarly mention its great strength, and describe its habits and dispositions. Aware of this objection, and at less how to elude its force, some writers, on the authority of Pliny, remove the native land of the unicorn to India. But this will be found of no advantage to their cause; for still the objection returns with nearly undiminished force; how could the sacred writers borrow their illustrations from a creature with which, even on this supposition, they were so little acquainted? They make no mention of the elephant, a creature not less powerful and fierce than the unicorn, renowned for its docility, and the various important services which it renders to man; and numerous in Africa, and many countries of Asia. Of this noble animal, the people of Israel seem to have had no knowledge at all, except what they derived from trade in ivory, which they carried on during the reign of Solomon to some extent. But if the elephant, which abounded in countries much nearer the Holy Land than India, whose teeth formed an article of commerce among the ancient Israelites, was so little known to them; it cannot be supposed that they had any knowledge of an animal which was proper to India.

But we have in reality no proof that such an animal ever existed in any part of the world. It must be admitted, that both Pliny and Ælian have described the unicorn in their writings; but these eminent authors borrowed their statements from Ctesias, a writer of little respectability. Had the unicorn existed in any part of the East, it must have been discovered and brought to Rome by those whom the Romans employed to explore the remotest countries, with the express view of collecting the rarest animals they contained; in order to be exhibited at the public shows. The tiger, the rhinoceros, and other animals, natives of regions which the Roman eagles never visited, were often exhibited in the amphitheatre, before the proud oppressors of the world. So numerous and diversified were the animals produced on the arena at their public entertainments, that Aristides, in his encomium of Rome, declared, "All things meet here, whatever is bred or made; and whatsoever is not seen here, is to be reckoned among those things which are not, nor ever were." But although these shows continued for many ages, not a single unicorn was ever exhibited at Rome; a strong proof that no such animal existed. In modern times, the remotest countries in Asia have been traversed, in almost every direction, by intelligent and inquisitive travellers; but no animal of this kind has been discovered; nor has the least information been obtained concerning the unicorn, among the natives. From these facts it may be safely concluded, that the unicorn exists only in the imagination of vain and credulous writers, and by consequence, cannot be the reem of the sacred scriptures.

The rhinoceros, on the contrary, was often exhibited in the amphitheatre at Rome; and has been frequently seen by modern travellers. No doubt, therefore, can be entertained concerning the reality of its existence: but the character of the reem, given in the scriptures, will not apply to this animal. The reem, it is evident, was equally well known to Moses and the prophets, and the people whom they addressed, as the bullocks and the bulls with which they are mentioned. But the rhinoceros inhabits the southern parts of Africa, and the remotest parts of the East, beyond the Ganges; and by consequence, could be still less known to the people of Israel than the elephant, which is not once mentioned in the sacred volume.

Besides, the reem has large horns; for, says the Psalmist, "My horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of a unicorn;" but the rhinoceros has seldom more than one, and that of a small size, not exalted like the horn of a reem, but turned back towards the forehead. Nor will the use to which the reem applies his horns, correspond with the manners of the rhinoceros: the former pushes with his horns, which must therefore be placed on his forehead; but the horn of the latter, which is placed on his nose, and bent backwards, is not formed for pushing, but for ripping up the trunks or bodies of the more soft and succulent trees, and reducing them into a kind of laths, which constitute a part of the animal's food.

It is the opinion of others, that the reem is a species of wild bull; which they have endeavoured to establish by several plausible arguments. In many places of scripture, say they, the ox and the reem are joined together, as animals of the same family; in others, the latter is represented as a strong and fierce animal, with large and very strong horns, greatly addicted to push, and by consequence, an enemy much to be dreaded. The reem, therefore, cannot be the buffalo, because his horns being turned inward, are unfit for the combat; but either the bison, or the urus. It is rather supposed, however, that the urus is the reem of the Hebrews, because the bison, though a very fierce and obstinate animal, may be subdued by the art of man, and at length entirely domesticated. But as to the urus, Cesar says expressly, that they cannot be tamed and rendered useful to mankind, not even their young ones excepted; they are therefore taken in pits and destroyed. Pliny thus describes the urus: He is of a size little inferior to the elephant; in appearance, colour, and figure, he resembles the bull; his strength and velocity are great; and he neither spares man nor beast that comes in his way.

These arguments have considerable weight; but they are liable to the same objections which these very writers have urged with so much force against the claims of the unicorn and the rhinoceros. It is by no means probable that the sacred writers would make so many allusions to animals, with which the people whom they addressed were utterly unacquainted; would speak so familiarly about them; would borrow their figures and illustrations, from their form, dispositions, and manners; or that Jehovah himself would converse with Job so long about a creature which was unknown to the people of those countries. The urus skulked from the remotest times in the deep recesses of the Hircanian forest; and was quite unknown to the Romans before the time of Cesar. Neither the urus nor the bison, according to Pliny, were to be found in Greece; and the former has been considered by some authors as a native of Germany. It is even admitted by Boetius, who strenuously maintains the claims of the urus, that he can find no writer who says that these wild oxen are produced in Syria and Palestine. Aben Ezra, on the contrary, asserts, in his commentary on the prophecies of Hosea, that no wild bull is to be found in Judea, and the surrounding countries. It is not sufficient to say, that these varieties of the bovine family, may have existed there in the times of Moses and the prophets, for a mere conjecture proves nothing. If they existed once, why do they not exist now, as well as the wild goat, the hart, and the antelope? Why is not a single trace of them to be found in the warmer climates of Greece and Asia? Pliny indeed states, that the Indian forests abounded with wild oxen; but it will not follow, that the urus was known to the Jews, because it was discovered in the forests of India, the regions of Scythia, or the more remote wilds of Africa. But the truth is, we have no proof that he meant to speak of the urus or the bison: he only mentions wild oxen in general; from which no certain argument can be drawn in support of the opinion which Boetius and others maintain.—PACTON.

Bochart, and after him, Rosenmuller and others, regard the reem of the Hebrews as a species of antelope, the rim of the Arabs, and the oryx or leucoryx of the Greeks. The argument of most weight in Bochart's mind, seems to be the fact, that rim, in Arabic, which is equivalent to reem in Hebrew, is thus used for a species of white gazelle or antelope, (Niebuhr, Descr. of Arab. p. xxxviii. Germ. ed.) which would seem to be very probably the leucoryx. But then the other characteristics of these animals by no means correspond to those of the reem, which is everywhere described as a fierce, intractable animal, acting on the offensive, and attacking even men of its own accord. Now, however wild and untamable many species of antelopes may be, they are universally described as a shy and retiring animal, always flying from pursuit, and avoiding even the approach of man. In opposition to this, Bochart and Rosenmuller produce a passage of Martial, where he gives to the oryx the epithet fierce, (sævus oryx, Epigr. xiii. 95.) and another from Oppian, where he says, "There is a beast, with pointed horns, familiar to the woods, the savage oryx, most terrible to other beasts." (Cyneg. ii. 445.) Now all these epithets and descriptions, even allowing nothing for poetical amplification, are perfectly applicable to the stag of our forests and of Asia; they imply no more than that the oryx, when hard pushed, will turn upon its pursuers, and defend himself with fury. Yet no one would hence draw the conclusion, that it was characteristic of the stag to act on the offensive; nor can such a conclusion be drawn with better reason in regard to the oryx.—The oryx of Pliny and other ancient writers, is understood to be the antelope oryx of zoologists; the gazella Indica of Ray, the capra gazello of the Syst. Nat., the Egyptian antelope of Pennant, and the posan of Buffon. It is about the size of a fallow deer, having straight, slender, annulated horns, which taper to a point; the horns are about three feet long, the points sharp, and about fourteen inches asunder; the body and sides are of a reddish ash colour; the face is white, with a black spot at the base of the horns, and another on the middle of the face. It is a native of Asia and Africa.—The leucoryx, which some suppose to be the oryx of Oppian, is in general similar to the animal above described, except that the body is of a milk-white colour. It inhabits the neighbourhood of Bassora, on the Persian gulf.

Most obviously neither of these animals answer the description of the Hebrew reem. The fact that the Arabs apply the word rim to this class of animals, has probably its origin in the same cause, which also leads them to apply to the races of deer and antelopes, in general, the epithet wild oxen. (See Schultens, Comm. in Job xxxix. 3.)

Other writers have supposed the reem of the Hebrews to be the urus, bison, or wild ox, described by Cesar, which is understood to be the same animal as the American buffalo. The characteristics of this animal accord well with those attributed to the reem; but there is no evidence that the bison existed in Palestine, or was known to the Hebrews. A more obvious supposition, therefore, is that of Schultens, De Wette, Gesenius, and others, that under the reem we are to understand the buffalo of the eastern continent, the bos bubalus of Linnæus, which differs from the bison, or American buffalo, chiefly in the shape of the horns and the absence of the dewlap. This animal is indigenous, originally in the hotter parts of Asia and Africa, but also in Persia, Abyssinia, and Egypt; and is now also naturalized in Italy and southern Europe. As, therefore, it existed in the countries all around Palestine, there is every reason to suppose that it was also found in that country, or at least in the regions east of the Jordan, and south of the Dead Sea, as Bashan and Idumea.

The oriental buffalo appears to be so closely allied to our common ox, that without an attentive examination it might be easily mistaken for a variety of that animal. In point of size it is rather superior to the ox; and upon an accurate inspection, it is observed to differ in the shape and magnitude of the head, the latter being larger than in the ox. But it is chiefly by the structure of the horns that the buffalo is distinguished, these being of a shape and curvature altogether different from those of the ox. They are of gigantic size in proportion to the bulk of the animal, and of a compressed form, with a sharp exterior edge; for a considerable length from their base these horns are straight, and then bend slightly upward; the prevailing colour of them is dusky, or nearly black. The buffalo has no dewlap; his tail is small, and destitute of vertebrae near the extremity; his ears are long and pointed. This animal has the appearance of uncommon strength. The bulk of his body, and prodigious muscular limbs, denote his force at the first view. His aspect is ferocious and malignant; at the same time that his physiognomy is strongly marked with features of stupidity. His head is of a ponderous size; his eyes diminutive; and what serves to render his visage still more savage, are the tufts of frizzled hair which hang down from his cheeks and the lower part of his muzzle.

This animal, although originally a native of the hotter parts of India and Africa, is now completely naturalized to the climate of the south of Europe. Mr. Pennant supposes the wild bulls of Aristotle to have been buffaloes, and Gmelin and other distinguished naturalists are of the same opinion. Gmelin also supposes the Bos Indicus of Pliny to have been the same animal. Buffon, however, endeavours to show, that the buffalo of modern times was unknown to the Greeks and Romans, and that it was first transported from its native countries, the warmer regions of Africa and the Indies, to be naturalized in Italy, not earlier than the seventh century.

The buffalo grows in some countries to an extremely large size. The buffaloes of Abyssinia grow to twice the size of our largest oxen, and are called elephant bulls. Mr. Pennant mentions a pair of horns in the British Museum, which are six feet and a half long, and the hollow of which will hold five quarts. Father Lobo affirms that some of the horns of the buffaloes in Abyssinia will hold ten quarts; and Dillon saw some in India that were ten feet long. They are sometimes wrinkled, but generally smooth. The distance between the points of the two horns is usually five feet.

Wild buffaloes occur in many parts of Africa and India, where they live in great troops in the forests, and are regarded as excessively fierce and dangerous animals. In all these particulars they coincide with the buffaloes of America. The hunting of them is a favourite, but very dangerous pursuit; the hunters never venture in any numbers to oppose these ferocious animals face to face; but conceal themselves in the thickets, or in the branches of the trees; whence they attack the buffaloes as they pass along.

In Egypt, as also in Southern Europe, the buffalo has been partially domesticated. In Egypt especially, it is much cultivated, where, according to Scutini, it yields plenty of excellent milk, from which butter and various kinds of cheese are made.

"The buffalo," says Sonnini, "is an acquisition of the modern Egyptians, with which their ancestors were unacquainted. It was brought over from Persia into their country, where the species is at present universally spread, and is very much propagated. It is even more numerous than the common ox, and is there equally domestic, though but recently domesticated; as is easily distinguished by the constantly uniform colour of the hair, and still more by a remnant of ferocity and intractability of disposition, and a wild and lowering aspect, the characters of all half-tamed animals. The buffaloes of Egypt, however, are not near so wild, nor so much to be feared, as those of other countries. They there partake of the gentleness of other domestic animals, and only retain a few sudden and occasional caprices. They are so fond of water, that I have seen them continue in it a whole day. It often happens that the water which is fetched from the Nile, near its banks, has contracted their musky smell."

"These animals multiply more readily than the common ox; they breed in the fourth year, producing young for two years together, and remaining sterile the third; and they commonly cease breeding after their twelfth year. Their term of life is much the same as that of the common ox. They are more robust than the common ox, better capable of bearing fatigue, and, generally speaking, less liable to distempers. They are therefore employed to advantage in different kinds of labour. Buffaloes are made to draw heavy loads, and are commonly guided by means of a ring passed through the nose. In its habits the buffalo is much less cleanly than the ox, and delights to wallow in the mud. His voice is deeper, more uncouth and hideous, than that of the bull. The milk is said by some authors to be not so good as that of the cow, but more plentiful; Eufon, on the contrary, asserts that it is far superior to cow's milk. The skin and horns are of more value than all the rest of the animal; the latter are of a fine grain, strong, and bear a good polish, and are therefore in much esteem with cutlers and other artisans.

Italy is the country where buffaloes are, at present, most common perhaps in a domesticated state. They are used more particularly in the Pontine marshes, and those in the district of Sienna, where the fatal nature of the climate acts unfavourably on common cattle, but affects the buffaloes less. The Spaniards also have paid attention to them; and indeed the cultivation of this useful animal seems to be pretty general in all the countries bordering on the Mediterranean Sea, both in Europe and Africa. Niebuhr remarks, that he saw buffaloes not only in Egypt, but also at Bombay, Surat, on the Euphrates, Tigris, Orontes, at Scanderoon, &c. and indeed in almost all marshy regions, and near large rivers. He does not remember any in Arabia, there being perhaps in that country too little water for this animal. (Descr. of Arabia, p. 165, Gem. edit.)

We have been thus particular in describing the buffalo of Asia, in order to show that it possesses, in its wild state, all the characteristics attributed to the Hebrew reem. All the evidence goes to show that it has been domesticated only at a comparatively recent period; and that the Hebrews therefore were probably acquainted with it only as a wild, savage, ferocious animal, resembling the ox; and it was not improbably often intended by them under the epithet, bulls of Bashan. The appropriateness of the foregoing description to the Hebrew reem will be apparent, on a closer inspection of the passages where this animal is mentioned.

In Dent. xxxiii. 17, and Ps. xcii. 10, the comparison is with his horns; which requires no further illustration after what is said above. In Numb. xxiii. 22, xxiv. 8, it is said, "he hath as it were the strength of a reem;" this is certainly most appropriate, if we adopt here the word strength, as the proper translation. But the Hebrew word here rendered strength, means strictly, rapidity of motion, speed, combined, if you please, with force. In this sense also, it is not less descriptive of the buffalo, which runs with great speed and violence when excited; as is often the case in regard to whole herds, which then rush blindly forwards with tremendous power. (See the account of Major Long's expedition to the Rocky Mountains.) In three other passages, the reem is closely coupled with the common ox, or with the employment of the latter. In Ps. xxix. 6, it is said, "He maketh them also to skip like a calf: Lebanon and Sirion like a young reem;" where the young of the reem stands in parallelism with the calf, so that we should naturally expect a great similarity between them. Isa. xxiv. 7, "And the reemim shall come down with them, and the bullocks with the bulls," &c. Here, in verse 6, it is said that the Lord has a great sacrifice in Bozrah; and the idea in verse 7 is, according to the LXX and Gesenius, that the reemim shall come down, i. e. shall make part of this sacrifice, as also the bullocks, old and young, of the land of Edom, so that their "land shall be soaked with blood," &c. The other passage is Job xxix. 9-12, "Will the reem be willing to serve thee, or abide by the crib? Canst thou bind the reem with his band in the furrow, or wilt he harrow the valleys after thee? Wilt thou trust him because his strength is great, or wilt thou leave thy labour to him? Wilt thou believe him, that he will bring home thy seed, and gather it into thy barn?" Here Job is asked, whether he would dare to intrust to the reem such and such labours as were usually performed by oxen. Nothing can be more appropriate to the wild buffalo than this language; and we have seen above that the Hebrews probably knew it only in a wild state. The only other passage where the reem is mentioned is Ps. xxii. 21, and this requires a more extended notice. The Psalmist in deep distress says in verse 12, "Many bulls ( $\text{בָּקָר}$ ) have compassed me, strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round. They gaped upon me with their mouths, as a ravening and roaring lion. For dogs have compassed me," &c. Here it will be observed that three animals are mentioned as besetting the writer, bulls of Bashan, lions, dogs. The Psalmist proceeds to speak of his deliverance; verse 20, "Deliver my soul [me] from the sword, my darling [me] from the power of the dog. Save me from the lion's mouth; for thou hast heard [and saved] me from the horns of the reemim." Here also it will be seen are three animals, corresponding to the three before mentioned as besetting him, but ranged in an inverted order, viz. the dog, the lion, and the reem, in place of the bulls of Bashan; that is, from the whole structure of the poem, and the fact that these animals and no others are alluded to, the inference is almost irresistible, that the reemim of verse 21 are the parim of verse 12, the bulls of Bashan, as has been already suggested above. At least we may infer that the reem was an animal not so unlike those bulls, but that it might with propriety be interchanged with them in poetic parallelism; a circumstance most appropriately true of the wild buffalo, and of him only.

From all these considerations, and from the fact that the buffalo must have been far better known in western Asia than either the rhinoceros or the oryx, (even if the description of the reem suited these animals in other respects,) we feel justified in assuming the taurus bubalus, or wild buffalo, to be the reem of the Hebrew scriptures, and the unicorn of the English version.

The principal difficulty in the way of this assumption, is the fact that the LXX have usually translated the Hebrew  $\text{רֵעִים}$  by  $\text{μονόκερος}$ , unicorn, one-horn. It must, however, be borne in mind, that these translators lived many centuries after the Hebrew scriptures were written, and not long indeed before the birth of Christ; they lived, too, in Egypt, where it is not impossible that the buffalo had in their age begun to be domesticated. In such circumstances, and being unacquainted with the animal in his fierce and savage state, they may have thought that the allusions to the reem were not fully answered by the half-domesticated animal before them, and they may, therefore, have felt themselves at liberty to insert the name of some animal which seemed to them more appropriate. That they did often take such liberties, is well known. An instance occurs in the very passage of Isaiah above quoted, ch. xxxiv. 7, where the Hebrew is  $\text{בָּקָר יְעִיבִים וְעִיבִים}$ , "and the bullocks with the bulls," i. e. the bulls with the strong ones, or, according to Gesenius, "the bulls both young and old;" this the LXX translates,  $\text{καὶ οἱ κριεὶ καὶ οἱ ταύροις}$ , "and the rams (or wethers) and the bulls,"—certainly a quid pro quo not less striking than that of putting unicorn for buffalo.

That the LXX, in using the word monoceros, (unicorn, one-horn), did not understand by it the rhinoceros, would seem obvious; both because the latter always had its appropriate and peculiar name in Greek, ( $\text{ῥινόκερος}$ , rhinoceros, nose-horn.) taken from the position of its horn upon the snout; and also from the circumstance so much insisted on above in the extracts from Mr. Bruce, that the rhinoceros of that part of Africa adjacent to Egypt actually has two horns. They appear rather to have had in mind the half-fabulous unicorn, described by Pliny, but lost sight of by all subsequent naturalists; although imperfect hints and accounts of a similar animal have been given by travellers in Africa and India, in different centuries, and entirely independent of each other. The interesting nature of the subject renders it proper to exhibit here all the evidence which exists in respect to such an animal; especially as it is nowhere brought together in the English language, or at least in no such form as to render it generally accessible.

The figure of the unicorn, in various attitudes, is depicted, according to Niebuhr, on almost all the stair-cases found among the ruins of Persepolis. One of these figures is given in vol. ii. plate xxiii. of Niebuhr's Travels; and also in vol. i. p. 594, 595, of the Travels of Sir R. K. Porter. The latter traveller supposes it to be the representation of a bull with a single horn. Pliny, in speaking of the wild beasts of India, says with regard to the animal in question: Asperimam autem feram monocerontem, reliquo corpore equo similem, capite cervæ, pedibus elephantis, cauda apro, mugitû gravi, uno cornu nigro media fronte cubitorum dictum eminentem. Hanc feram vivam negant capi. (Hist. Nat. vii. 21.) "The unicorn is an exceeding fierce animal, resembling a horse as to the rest of its body, but having the head like a stag, the feet like an elephant, and the tail like a wild boar; its roaring is loud, and it has a black horn of about two cubits projecting from the middle of its forehead." These seem to be the chief ancient notices of the existence of the animal in question.

In 1530, Ludovico de Bartema, a Roman patrician, travelled to Egypt, Arabia, and India; and having assumed the character of a Mussulman, he was able to visit Mecca with the Hadj, or great caravan of pilgrims. In his account of the curiosities of this city, in Ramusio's Collection of Travels, (Racotta di Viaggi, Venet. 1563, p. 163,) he says: "On the other side of the Caaba is a walled court, in which we saw two unicorns, which were pointed out to us as a rarity; and they are indeed truly remarkable. The larger of the two is built like a three-year-old colt, and has a horn upon the forehead about three ells long. The other unicorn was smaller, like a yearling foal, and has a horn perhaps four spans long.—This animal has the colour of a yellowish brown horse, a head like a stag, a neck not very long, with a thin mane; the legs are small and slender, like those of a hind or roe; the hoofs of the forefeet are divided, and resemble the hoofs of a goat. These two animals were sent to the sultan of Mecca, as a rarity of great value, and very seldom found, by a king of Ethiopia, who wished to secure, by this present, the good will of the sultan of Mecca."

Don Juan Gabriel, a Portuguese colonel, who lived several years in Abyssinia, assures us, that in the region of Agamos, in the Abyssinian province of Damota, he had seen an animal of the form and size of a middle-sized horse, of a dark chestnut-brown colour, and with a whitish horn, about five spans long, upon the forehead; the mane and tail were black, and the legs short and slender. Several other Portuguese, who were placed in confinement upon a high mountain in the district of Namna, by the Abyssinian king, Adamas Saghedo, related that they had seen, at the foot of the mountain, several unicorns feeding. (Ludolf's Hist. Ethiop. lib. i. c. 10. n. 80, seq.) These accounts are confirmed by Father Lobo, who lived for a long time as a missionary in Abyssinia. He adds, that the unicorn is extremely shy, and escapes from closer observation by a speedy flight into the forests; for which reason there is no exact description of him. (Voyage histor. d'Abyssinie, Amst. 1728, vol. i. p. 83, 291.) All these accounts are certainly not applicable to the rhinoceros; although it is singular that Mr. Bruce speaks only of the latter animal as not uncommon in Abyssinia, and makes apparently no allusion to the above accounts.

In more recent times we find further traces of the animal in question in Southern Africa. Dr. Sparrmann, the Swedish naturalist, who visited the Cape of Good Hope and the adjacent regions in the years 1772-1776, gives, in his travels, the following account: Jacob Knock, an observing peasant on Hippopotamus river, who had travelled over the greater part of Southern Africa, found on the face of a perpendicular rock a drawing made by the Hottentots, representing a quadruped with one horn. The Hottentots told him that the animal there represented was very like the horse on which he rode, but had a straight horn upon the forehead. They added, that these one-horned animals, were rare, that they ran with great rapidity, and were also very fierce. They also described the manner of hunting them. "It is not probable," Dr. Sparrmann remarks, "that the savages wholly invented this story, and that too so very circumstantially; still less can we suppose, that they should have received and retained, merely from history or tradition, the remembrance of such an animal. These regions are very seldom visited; and the creature might, therefore, long remain unknown. That an animal so rare should not be better known to the modern world, proves nothing against its existence. The greater part of Africa is still among the terra incognita. Even the giraffe has been again discovered only within comparatively a few years. So also the gnu, which, till recently, was held to be a fable of the ancients."

A somewhat more definite account of a similar animal is contained in the Transactions of the Zealand Academy of Sciences at Flushing. (Pt. xv. Middelb. 1792. Pref. p. lvi.) The account was transmitted to the society in 1791, from the Cape of Good Hope, by Mr. Henry Cloete. It states that a bastard Hottentot, Gerrit Slinger by name, related, that while engaged several years before with a party, in pursuit of the savage Bushmen, they had got sight of nine strange animals, which they followed on horseback, and shot one of them. This animal resembled a horse, and was of a light-gray colour, with white stripes under the lower jaw. It had a single horn, directly in front, as long as one's arm, and at the base about as thick. Towards the middle the horn was somewhat flattened, but had a sharp point; it was not attached to the bone of the forehead, but fixed only in the skin. The head was like that of the horse, and the size also about the same. The hoofs were round, like those of a horse, but divided below like those of oxen. This remarkable animal was shot between the so-called Table Mountain and Hippopotamus river, about sixteen days' journey on horse-back from Cambedo, which would be about a month's journey in ox-wagons from Cape-town. Mr. Cloete mentions, that several different natives and Hottentots testify to the existence of a similar animal with one horn, of which they profess to have seen drawings by hundreds, made by the Bushmen on rocks and stones. He supposes that it would not be difficult to obtain one of these animals, if desired. His letter is dated at the Cape, April 8, 1791. (See thus far Rosenmüller's Altes u. neues Morgenland, ii. p. 269, seq. Leipz. 1818.)

Such appear to have been the latest accounts of the animal in question, when it was again suddenly brought into notice as existing in the elevated regions of central India. The Quarterly Review for Oct. 1820, (vol. xxiv. p. 120,) in a notice of Frazier's tour through the Himalaya Mountains, goes on to remark as follows: "We have no doubt that a little time will bring to light many objects of natural history peculiar to the elevated regions of Central Asia, and hitherto unknown in the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, particularly in the two former. This is an opinion which we have long entertained; but we are led to the expression of it on the present occasion, by having been favoured with the perusal of a most interesting communication from Major Latter, commanding in the rajah of Sikkim's territories, in the hilly country east of Nepal, addressed to Adjutant-general Nicol, and transmitted by him to the Marquis of Hastings. This important paper explicitly states that the unicorn, so long considered as a fabulous animal, actually exists at this moment in the interior of Thibet, where it is well known to the inhabitants. 'This,'—we copy from the Major's letter—"is a very curious fact, and it may be necessary to mention how the circumstance became known to me. In a Thibetian manuscript, containing the names of different animals, which I procured the other day from the hills, the unicorn is classed under the head of those whose hoofs are divided: it is called the one-horned tsu'po. Upon inquiring what kind of animal it was, to our astonishment, the person who brought the manuscript described exactly the unicorn of the ancients; saying, that it was a native of the interior of Thibet, about the size of a lattoo, [a horse from twelve to thirteen hands high,] fierce and extremely wild; seldom, if ever, caught alive, but frequently shot; and that the flesh was used for food.—'The person,' Major Latter adds, 'who gave me this information, has repeatedly seen these animals, and eaten the flesh of them. They go together in herds, like our wild buffaloes, and are very frequently to be met with on the borders of the great desert, about a month's journey from Lassa, in that part of the country inhabited by the wandering Tartars.'

"This communication is accompanied by a drawing made by the messenger from recollection. It bears some resemblance to a horse, but has cloven hoofs, a long curved horn growing out of the forehead, and a boar-shaped tail, like that of the fera monoceros described by Pliny. From its herding together, as the unicorn of the scriptures is said to do, as well as from the rest of the description, it is evident that it cannot be the rhinoceros, which is a solitary animal; besides, Major Latter states, that in the Thibetian manuscript the rhinoceros is described under the name of serro, and classed with the elephant; 'neither,' says he, 'is it the wild horse, (well known in Thibet,) for that has also a different name, and is classed in the manuscript with the animals which have the hoof undivided.—'I have written,' he subjoins, 'to the Sachia Lama, requesting him to procure me a perfect skin of the animal, with the head, horn, and hoofs; but it will be a long time before I can get it down, for they are not to be met with nearer than a month's journey from Lassa.'

As a sequel to this account, we find the following paragraph in the Calcutta Government Gazette, August, 1821: "Major Latter has obtained the horn of a young unicorn, from the Sachia Lama, which is now before us. It is twenty inches in length; at the root it is four inches and a half in circumference, and tapers to a point; it is black, rather flat at the sides, and has fifteen rings, but they are only prominent on one side; it is nearly straight. Major Latter expects to obtain the head of the animal, with the hoofs and the skin, very shortly, which will afford positive proof of the form and character of the tsu'po, or Thibet unicorn."

Such are the latest accounts which have reached us of this animal; and although their credibility cannot well be contested, and the coincidence of the description with that of Pliny is so striking, yet it is singular that in the lapse of more than ten years, (1832,) nothing further should have been heard on a subject so interesting.—But whatever may be the fact as to the existence of this animal, the adoption of it by the LXX, as being the Hebrew reem, cannot well be correct; both for the reasons already adduced above, and also from the circumstance, that the reem was evidently an animal frequent and well known in the countries where the scenes of the Bible are laid; while the unicorn, at all events, is and was an animal of exceeding rarity.—ROBINSON IN CALMET.

Ver. 12. The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree; he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon.

The palm-tree is very common in Judea, and in the surrounding regions. The Hebrews call it (תמר) tamar, and the Greeks φαίεξ, phenix. The finest-palm trees grow about Jericho and Engeddi; they also flourish in great numbers along the banks of Jordan, and towards Scythopolis. Jericho is by way of distinction called "the city of palm-trees." It seems indeed to have been recognised as the common symbol of the Holy Land; for Judea is represented on several coins of Vespasian; by a disconsolate woman sitting under a palm-tree; and in like manner, upon the Greek coin of his son Titus; struck on a similar occasion, we see a shield suspended on a palm-tree, with a victory writing upon it. The same tree is delineated upon a medal of Domitian, as an emblem of Neapolis or Naplosa, the ancient Sichem; and upon a medal of Trajan, it is the symbol of Sepphoris, the metropolis of Galilee. From these facts it may be presumed that the palm-tree was formerly much cultivated in Palestine. Several of them still grow in the neighbourhood of Jericho, which abounds with water, where the climate is warm, and the soil sandy; a situation in which they delight, and where they rise to full maturity. But at Jerusalem, Sichem, and other places to the northward, two or three of them are rarely seen together; and even these, as their fruit seldom or never comes to maturity, are of no further service than, like the palm-tree of Deborah, to shade the dwellings of the parched inhabitants, or to supply them with branches at the solemn festival. The present condition and quality of palm-trees in Canaan, leads us to conclude, that they never at any time were either very numerous or fruitful in that country. The opinion that Phenice is the same with a country of dates-trees, does not appear probable; for if such a valuable plant had ever been cultivated in Palestine with success, it would have been cultivated down to the present times, as in Egypt and in Barbary. In these countries the traveller meets with large plantations of palm-trees on the seacoast, as well as in the interior; although those only which grow in the sandy deserts of Sahara, and the regions of Getulia, and the Jereeda, bring their fruit to perfection. They are propagated chiefly from young shoots taken from the roots of full-grown trees; which, if well transplanted and taken care of, will yield their fruit in the sixth or seventh year; while those which are raised immediately from the kernel, will not bear till about their sixteenth year. This method of raising the poine, or palm, and particularly the circumstance, that when the old trunk dies, young shoots are never wanting to succeed it, may have given occasion to the well-known fable of the phenix, which perishes in a flame of her own kindling; while a young one springs from her ashes, to continue the race.

The palm-tree arrives at its greatest vigour about thirty years after being transplanted, and continues in full strength and beauty for seventy years longer, producing yearly fifteen or twenty clusters of dates, each of them weighing fifteen or twenty pounds. After this period it begins gradually to decline, and usually falls about the latter end of its second century. "Cui placet curas agere seculorum," says Palladius, "depalmis cogitet conserendis." It requires no other culture and attendance than to be well watered once in four or five days, and to have a few of the lower boughs lopped off when they begin to droop or wither. These, whose stumps or pollices, in being thus gradually left upon the trunk, serve, like so many rounds of a ladder, to climb up the tree, either to fecundate or to lop it, or to gather the fruit, are quickly supplied with others, which gradually hang down from the crown or top, contributing both to the regular and uniform growth of this tall, knottless, and beautiful tree, and to its perpetual and delightful verdure.

It is usual with persons of better station, to entertain their guests on days of joyous festivity with the honey of the palm-tree. This they procure by cutting off the head or crown of one of the more vigorous plants, and scooping the top of the trunk into the shape of a basin, where the sap in ascending lodges itself, at the rate of three or four quarts a day, during the first week or fortnight; after which the quantity daily diminishes, and at the end of six weeks or two months the juices are entirely consumed, the tree becomes dry, and serves only for timber or fire-wood. This liquor, which has a more luscious sweetness than honey, is of the consistence of a thin syrup, but quickly grows tart and rosy, acquiring an intoxicating quality, and giving by distillation an agreeable spirit—the Aarak of the natives, and the palm-wine of the natural historian.

The palm is one of the most beautiful trees in the vegetable kingdom; it is upright, lofty, verdant, and embowering. It grows by the brook or well of living water; and resisting every attempt to press or bend it downward, shoots directly towards heaven. For this reason, perhaps, it was regarded by the ancients as peculiarly sacred, and therefore most frequently used in adorning their temples. The chosen symbol of constancy, fruitfulness, patience, and victory; the more it is oppressed, the more it flourishes, the higher it grows, and the stronger and broader the top expands. To this majestic and useful tree the child of God is compared in the holy scriptures, with singular elegance and propriety. Adorned with the beauties of holiness, and rich in the mercies of the covenant, fruitful in good works, and reposing all his thoughts in heaven, precious in the sight of God, and lovely in the view of every rational being capable of forming a just estimate of his character, he may well be said to flourish like the palm-tree, and to grow like a cedar in Lebanon. "Planted in the house of the Lord, he shall flourish in the courts of our God. He shall still bring forth fruit in old age; he shall be fat and flourishing; to show that the Lord is upright; that he is his rock; and there is no unrighteousness in him."—PAXTON.

"The wicked spring as the grass, but good men endure like the palm-tree, and bear much fruit." "A grateful man is like the palm-tree; for small attentions he gives much fruit."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 13. Those that be planted in the house of the LORD shall flourish in the courts of our God.

The being planted in the house of God, or in its courts, may allude to an ancient custom, still used in the East, of planting trees in the courtyard of a house. Plaisard, in his Journal from Busserah to Aleppo, informs us, that the people of Aleppo plant a cypress-tree in the courtyard of their houses. Dr. Fryer, in his new account of the East Indies and Persia, describes a nabob's apartments as encompassing in the middle a verdant quadrangle of trees and plants. It is also observable, that the Jews, though forbidden to plant trees in the temple, planted them in their proscenae, which were, in some sort, houses of God.—BURDEU.

Ver. 14. They shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and flourishing.

The Hebrew, instead of flourishing, has, "GREEN!" Ainsworth, "shall be fat and green." Of a very old man who has retained his strength, the Hindoos say, "he is a GREEN veteran." "See that patche-killavca, (green old man,) how strong he is." "My friend, if you act in this way, you will never be a green old man." A man who has been long noted for roguery is called a patche-kallan, a green rogue; and a well-known utterer of falsehoods, a green liar. "Ah! my lord!" says the relieved mendicant, "in your old age you will be fat and flourishing;" or, "You will be a green old man."—ROBERTS.

PSALM CI.

Ver. 3. I will set no wicked thing before mine eyes: I hate the work of them that turn aside; it shall not cleave to me.

Pleasure or displeasure, approbation or abhorrence, may be known by the look, or the cast of the eye. What we are pleased and delighted with attracts and fixes the eye. What we dislike or hate, we turn away from the sight of; and when the Psalmist resolves that he would not fix his eyes upon any evil thing, he means, he would never give it the least countenance or encouragement, but treat it with displeasure, as what he hated, and was determined to punish. For he adds, "I hate the work of them that turn aside." Mr. Schultens hath shown in his commentary on Prov. vii. 25, that turn hath a much stronger and more significant meaning than that of mere turning aside; and that it is used of an unruly horse, that champs upon the bit through his fiery impatience; and when applied to a bad man, denotes one impatient of all restraint, of unbridled passions, and who is headstrong and ungovernable in the gratification of them, trampling on all the obligations of religion and virtue. Such as these are the deserved objects of the hatred of all good men, whose criminal deviations and presumptuous crimes they detest; none of which shall cleave to them; they will not harbour the love of or inclination to them, nor habitually commit them, nor encourage the practice of them.—CHANDLER.

Ver. 3. For my days are consumed like smoke, and my bones are burned as a hearth.

Ver. 6. I am like an owl of the wilderness; I am like an owl of the desert.

The pelican is another bird of the desert, to which the sacred writers sometimes allude. Its Hebrew name is kaath, literally, the vomiter. So in the Hebrew verb kaath, to omit. The reason assigned for this name by the ancients is, that it discharges the shells it had swallowed, after they have been opened by the heat of its belly, in order to pick out the fish, which form its principal food. This act, says Bochart, is so generally attested by the writers of antiquity, that it cannot be called in question; and then cites a great number of authorities in its support. But with all deference to this learned writer, it may be justly doubted, if this bird really takes the shell-fish on which it feeds into its stomach, in the first instance; it is more probable that it deposits them in the bag or pouch under its lower chap, which serves not only as a net to catch, but also as a repository for its food. In feeding its young ones, (whether this bag is loaded with water or more solid food,) the pelican squeezes the contents of it into their mouths, by strongly compressing it upon its breast with its bill; an action which may well justify the propriety of the name which it received from the ancient Hebrews. To the same habit, it is probable, may be traced the traditionary report, that the pelican, in feeding her young, pierces her own breast, and nourishes them with her blood.

Dr. Shaw contends, that kaath cannot mean the pelican, because the royal Psalmist describes it as a bird of the wilderness, where that fowl must necessarily starve, because its large webbed feet, and capacious pouch, with the manner of catching its food, which can only be in the water, show it to be entirely a water-fowl. But this objection proceeds on the supposition, that the deserts which it frequents contain no water, which is a mistake; for Ptolemy places three lakes in the interior parts of Marmorica, which is extremely desolate; and Moses informs us, that the people of Israel met with the waters of Mara, and the fountains of Elim, in the barren sands of Arabia. Besides, it is well known that a water-fowl often retires to a great distance from her favourite haunts; and this is confirmed by a fact, which Parkhurst states from the writings of Isidore, that the pelican inhabits the solitudes of the Nile. This famed river, as we know from the travels of Mr. Bruce, rolls its flood through an immense and frightful desert, where water-fowls of different kinds undoubtedly find a secure retreat. Mr. Bruce himself sprang a duck in the burning wilderness, at a considerable distance from its banks, which immediately winged her flight towards it; a clear proof of her being familiarly acquainted with its course. From this circumstance we may infer, that the pelican is no stranger to the most desert and inhospitable borders of the Nile. It also appears from Damir, the Arabian naturalist quoted by Bochart, that the pelican, like the duck which Bruce found in the desert of Senaar, does not always remain in the water, but sometimes retires from it to a great distance; and indeed its monstrous pouch, which, according to Edwards, in his natural history of birds, is capable of receiving twice the size of a man's head, seems to be given it for this very reason, that it might not want food for itself and its young ones, when at a distance from the water.

Bochart is of opinion, that kaath, in some passages of scripture, is intended to express the bittern, which differs from the pelican, by his own admission, only in the form of the bill. Thus the holy Psalmist complains, "I am like a pelican (bittern) of the wilderness; I am like an owl of the desert." The clear and consistent exposition of this passage, he contends, requires the word kaath to be rendered bittern; because the sacred writer compares himself to the bittern and the owl, or more properly the ostrich, on account of his groaning. It is therefore natural to conclude, that both these animals have a mournful cry. Many reasons have been advanced, to prove that the chos, rendered in our translation the owl, is in reality the female ostrich; of which this is one, that it has a most hideous voice, resembling, in a very remarkable manner, the lamentations of a human being in deep affliction. That the Psalmist may be consistent with himself, the same thing must be asserted of the kaath, which it would be difficult to admit, if that term signified only the pelican; for natural historians observe a profound silence in relation to the voice of that bird. But if the name kaath is common to the bittern and the pelican, the difficulty vanishes, for the former has a clear voice. All the ancient natural historians agree, that the bittern, by inserting its bill in the mud of the marsh, or plunging it under water, utters a most disagreeable cry, like the roaring of a bull, or the sound of distant thunder.

But the opinion of that celebrated writer, in this instance, rests upon a false, or at least an uncertain foundation. The afflicted Psalmist seems to refer, not so much to the plaintive voice of these birds, as to their lonely situation in the wilderness. One of the first and most common effects of pungent sorrow, is the desire of solitude; and on this occasion the royal Psalmist, oppressed with grief, seems to have become weary of society, and like the pelican, or the female ostrich, to have contracted a relish for deep retirement. Besides, as our author allows, that the pelican and the bittern differ only in the form of the bill, the translation for which he contends is of no real importance; and it is certainly a good rule to admit of no change in a received translation, unless it can be shown, that the new term or phrase expresses the meaning of the original with greater justness, propriety, or elegance.

The bird of night, which, like the ostrich, delights in the desert and solitary place, is distinguished by several names in the sacred writings. In the book of Psalms, it is mentioned under the name kous, which is evidently derived from the verb kashah, to hide; because the owl constantly hides herself in the daytime, and comes abroad in the evening. The Seventy, Theodotion, Aquila, and other interpreters, render it υκροτολας, in English, the horned owl. The learned Bochart suspected that kous might denote the onocrotalus, thus named from its monstrous cap or bag under the lower chap. It must be admitted, that kous might properly enough be given as a name to that bird, from this extraordinary circumstance in its form; but after the most diligent inquiry, the writer has not been able to discover any difference between the pelican of the ancients, and the onocrotalus; and as kaath is mentioned in the same contexts with kous, and rendered in the ancient versions either the pelican or onocrotalus, kous, in his opinion, must have a different meaning. This idea receives no little confirmation from a passage in the hundred and second Psalm, where kous is followed in construction by harroboth, and signifies kous, not of the desert, as we render it, but of the desolate or ruined buildings; which exactly corresponds with the habits of the owl, but does not seem so applicable to the onocrotalus, or pelican. Buffon calls the horned owl the eagle of the night, and the sovereign of that tribe of birds which shun the light of day, and never fly but in the evening, or after it is dark. But, as a description of it is connected with the illustration of no passage of scripture, it falls not within the design of this work. The voice of the horned owl is said to be frightful, and is often heard resounding in the silence of night; which is the season of his activity, when he flies abroad in search of his prey. He inhabits the lonely rocks or deserted towers on the sides of the mountains; he seldom descends into the plain, and never willingly perches upon trees. The dreary and frightful note of the owl sounding along the desert, and alarming or terrifying the birds that are reposing in their nests, represents, in a very striking manner, the deep and lonely afflictions of the royal Psalmist, and the affecting complaints which his distresses wrung from his bosom.

Yansuph is another term which our translators render the owl; it occurs only three times in the sacred volume, and is derived from the verb nashaph, to blow, or from nesheph, the twilight or the dawn. It is supposed to denote a species of owl, which flies about in the twilight; and is the same as the twilight bird. But of this interpretation Parkhurst disapproves, contending, that since the yansuph is clearly mentioned by Moses among the water-fowls, and the Seventy have in two passages rendered it by ibis, it should seem to mean some kind of water-fowl, resembling the bird of that name; and from its derivation, remarkable for its blowing. And of such birds, he says, the most eminent seems to be the bittern, which, in the north of England, is called the mire-drum, from the noise it makes, which may be heard a long way off. But the opinion of Bochart, that it denotes the owl, is more probable; because the owl delights in the silent desert, where little or no water is to be found; while the ibis is an aquatic bird, whose instincts lead it to the lake, or running stream. In the thirty-fourth chapter of Isaiah, the yansuph is mentioned as frequenting the desolated land of Edom, which, according to Dr. Shaw, is remarkably destitute of water, and by consequence, quite improper for the abode of a water-fowl, which feeds on fish. It is admitted that the kaath, or pelican, another water-fowl, is mentioned in the same text with yansuph; that all the larger water-fowls are extremely shy; that they sometimes build their nests in retired places, a long way from the water where they seek their food; and that even the common heron will come at least twelve or fourteen miles, and perhaps much farther, from her usual residence, to the lakes and streams which abound with fish. But no argument can be founded on the arrangements of scripture, in matters of this kind; because the inspired writers do not always observe a strict order, or scientific classification. It ought also to be remembered, that in the passage quoted from Isaiah, the yansuph is connected with the raven, which is not an aquatic bird. The owl and the raven are associated with greater propriety in scenes of desolation, to which they have been assigned by the common suffrage of mankind, and accordingly regarded as inauspicious birds, and objects of fear and aversion:—

Ignavus bubo dirum mortibus omen.*”—Ovid.

The presence of the owl and the raven, two hateful birds, in company with the cormorant and the bittern, greatly heighten the general effect of the picture delineated by the prophet: “But the cormorant and the bittern shall possess it; the owl also and the raven shall dwell in it; and he shall stretch out upon it the line of confusion, and the stones of emptiness.”—PAXTON.

Ver. 7. I watch, and am as a sparrow alone upon the house-top.

Brookes says of this bird, “It usually sits alone on the tops of old buildings and roofs of churches, singing very sweetly, especially in the morning; and is an oriental bird.”—BURDER.

The sparrow has been considered by some interpreters as a solitary moping bird, which loves to dwell on the house-top alone; and so timid, that she endeavours to conceal herself in the darkest corners, and passes the night in sleepless anxiety. Hence they translate the words of the Psalmist: “I watch, and am as a sparrow alone upon the house-top.” But her character and manners by no means agree with their description. She is a pert, loquacious, bustling creature, which, instead of courting the dark and solitary corner, is commonly found chirping and fluttering about in the crowd. The term in this text, therefore, must be understood in its general sense, and probably refers to some variety of the owl. Jerome renders it, I was as a solitary bird on the roof. The Hebrew text contains nothing which can with propriety suggest the sparrow, or any similar bird; and indeed, nothing seems to be more remote from the mind of David; all the circumstances seem to indicate some bird of the night; for the Psalmist, bending under a load of severe affliction, shuns the society of men, and mingles his unceasing groans and lamentations with the mournful hootings of those solitary birds which disturb the lonely desert. “By reason of the voice of my groaning, my bones cleave to my skin; I am like a pelican of the wilderness; I am like an owl of the desert.” He then proceeds with his comparison: “I watch, and am as a bird upon the house-top alone;” I watch, that is, I have spent a sleepless night; or, as it is paraphrased in the Chaldee, I have watched the whole night long, without once closing my eyes. Every part of this description directs our attention to some nocturnal bird, which hates the light, and comes forth from its hiding-place when the shadows of evening fall, to hunt the prey, and from the top of some ruined tower, to tell its joys or its sorrows to a slumbering world. But, with what propriety can the sparrow be called a solitary bird, when it is gregarious, and, so far from loving solitude, builds her nest in the roofs of our dwellings? Natural historians mention two kinds of this bird, one domestic, and the other wild. But the wild sparrow does not repair for shelter, like her relative, mentioned by David, to the human dwelling; she never takes her station on the house-top, but seeks a home in her native woods. If the allusion, therefore, be made to the sparrow, it must be to the domestic, not to the wild species. It is in vain to argue, that the domestic sparrow may be called solitary, when she is deprived of her mate; for she does not, like the turtle, when she loses her spouse, remain in a state of inconsolable widowhood, but accepts, without reluctance, the first companion that solicits her affections. Hence the Psalmist undoubtedly refers to some species of the owl, whose dreary note and solitary dispositions, are celebrated by almost every poet of antiquity.—PAXTON.

Ver. 11. My days are like a shadow that declineth; and I am withered like grass.

“My days are like the declining shadow,” says the old man: “my shadow is fast declining.” siyanthu, siyanthu, declining, declining. “I am withered.” Indran, the king of heaven, said of himself and others, They were withered by the mandates of Sooran. “Alas! his face and heart are withered.” “My heart is withered, I cannot eat my food.” “Sorrow, not age, has withered my face.” “Alas! how soon this blossom has withered.”—ROBERTS.

Ver. 26. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure; yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment; as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed.

It is reckoned in the East, according to Dr. Pococke, a mark of respect often to change their garments, in the time of a visit for a night or two. He expresses himself, however, with obscurity and some uncertainty; but it is made certain by the accounts of other travellers, that it is a matter of state and magnificence. So Thevenot tells us, that when he saw the grand seignior go to the new-mosque, he was clad in a satin doliman of a flesh colour, and a vest of almost the same colour; but when he had said his prayers, then he changed his vest, and put on one of a particular kind of green. At another time he went to the mosque in a vest of crimson velvet, but returned in one of a fired satin. To this frequent change of vestments among the great, possibly the Psalmist alludes, when, speaking of the Lord of all, he says, The heavens, unchangeable as they are, when compared with the productions of the earth, shall perish, while he shall remain; yea, they shall be laid aside, in comparison of his immortality, as soon as a garment grows old; or rather, this change which they shall undergo, shall come on more speedily, with respect to his eternity, than the laying aside of a vestment which kings and princes change often in a day. The changing of clothes is a piece of eastern magnificence: how wonderfully sublime, then, in this view, is this representation of the grandeur of God, “Thou shalt change these heavens as a prince changes his vesture.”—HARMER.

Ver. 2. Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment; who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain.

It is usual in the summer season, and upon all occasions when a large company is to be received, to have the court of the house (which is the middle of an open square) sheltered from the heat of the weather by an umbrella or veil, which, being expanded upon ropes from one side of the parapet-wall to the other, may be folded or unfolded at pleasure. The Psalmist seems to allude to some covering of this kind in that beautiful expression of “stretching out the heavens like a curtain.”—SHAW.

Ver. 17. Where the birds make their nests: as • for the stork, the fir-trees are her house.

This bird has long been celebrated for her amiable and pious disposition, in which she has no rival among the feathered race. Her Hebrew name is chasida, which signifies pious or benign; to the honour of which, her character and habits, as described by the pen of antiquity, prove her to be fully entitled. Her kind, benevolent temper, she discovers in feeding her parents in the time of incubation, when they have not leisure to seek their food, or when they have become old, and unable to provide for themselves. This attention of the stork to her parents is confirmed by the united voice of antiquity; and we find nothing in the scriptures to invalidate the testimony. She was classed by the Jewish lawgiver among the unclean birds, probably because she feeds on serpents, and other venomous animals, and rears her young by means of the same species of food. In the challenge which the Almighty addressed to Job, the wings and feathers of the ostrich are compared with those of the stork: "Gavest thou the goodly wings unto the peacocks, or wings and feathers unto the ostrich;" or, as it is rendered by the learned Bochart, and after him by Dr. Shaw, "the plumage of the stork." Natural historians inform us, that the wings are tipped with black, and a part of the head and thighs are adorned with feathers of the same colour; the rest of the body is white. Albert says, the stork has black wings, the tail and other parts white; while Turner asserts, that the wings are white, spotted with black. From these different accounts, it is evident that the feathers of the stork are black and white, and not always disposed in the same manner. She constructs her nest with admirable skill, of dry twigs from the forest, and coarse grass from the marsh; but wisely yielding to circumstances, she does not confine herself to one situation. At one time she selects for her dwelling the pinnacle of a deserted tower, or the canal of an ancient aqueduct; at another, the roof of a church or dwelling-house. She frequently retires from the noise and bustle of the town, into the circumjacent fields; but she never builds her nest on the ground. She chooses the highest tree of the forest for her dwelling; but always prefers the fir, when it is equally suitable to her purpose. This fact is clearly stated by the Psalmist, in his meditation on the power of God: "As for the stork, the fir-trees are her house." In another passage, the Psalmist calls the nest of the sparrow her house: "Yea, the sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young." But the term house is not used in these passages, merely by a figure of speech; if the description of ancient writers be true, it is in every respect the most proper and expressive that can be selected. The stork chooses the site of her dwelling with much care and intelligence; she combines her materials with great art, and prosecutes her plan with surprising exactness. After the structure is finished, she examines it on all sides, tries its firmness and solidity, supplies any defect she may discover, and with admirable industry, reduces with her bill an unsightly projection, or ill-adjusted twig, till it perfectly corresponds with her instinctive conception of safety, neatness, and comfort.

The inspired writer alludes to this bird, with an air of constant and intimate acquaintance: "As for the stork, the fir-tree is her house." We learn from the narrative of Doublan, that the fields between Cana and Nazareth are covered with numerous flocks of them, each flock containing, according to his computation, more than a thousand. In some parts, the ground is entirely whitened by them; and on the wing they darken the air like a congeries of clouds. At the approach of evening, they retire to roost on the trees. The inhabitants carefully abstain from hurting them, on account of their important services in clearing the country of venomous animals. The annual migration of this bird did not escape the notice of the prophet Jeremiah, who employs it with powerful effect for the purpose of exposing the stupidity of God's ancient people: "Yea, the stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed time, and the turtle, the crane, and the swallow, observe the time of their coming; but my people know not the judgment of the Lord." They know, with unerring precision, the time when it is necessary for them to remove from one place to another, and the region whither they are to bend their flight; but the people of God, that received many special revelations from heaven, and enjoyed the continual instructions of his prophets, had become so depraved, that they neither understood the meaning of mercies nor judgments; they knew not how to accommodate themselves to either, nor to answer the design of heaven in such dispensations; they knew not the signs of their times, nor what they ought to do. The stork, that had neither instructor to guide her, nor reason to reflect, and judgment to determine, what was proper to be done, found no difficulty in discerning the precise time of her departure and return.—PAXTON.

Ver. 18. The high hills are a refuge for the wild goats, and the rocks for the conies.

The wild goat, or ibex, belongs to the same species with the domestic goat, and exhibits nearly the same character and dispositions. His Hebrew name, yoala, from a verb which signifies to ascend, indicates one of the strongest habits implanted in his nature, to scale the loftiest pinnacle of the rock, and the highest ridge of the mountains. He takes his station on the edge of the steep, and seems to delight in gazing on the gulf below, or surveying the immense void before him. Those frightful precipices which are inaccessible to man, and other animals, were the most adventurous hunter dares not follow him, are his favourite haunts. He sleeps on their brow; he sports on their smallest projections, secure from the attack of his enemies. These facts were observed by the shepherds of the East, recorded by the pen of inspiration, and celebrated in the songs of Zion: "The high hills are a refuge for the wild goats." In the expostulation which Jehovah addressed to Job, they are called "the wild goats of the rock;" because it is the place which the Creator has appointed for their proper abode, and to which he has adapted all their dispositions and habits. The dreary and frightful precipices, which frown over the Dead Sea, towards the wilderness of Engedi, the inspired historian of David's life calls emphatically "the rocks of the wild goats," as if accessible only to those animals.

The ibex is distinguished by the size of his horns. No creature, says Gesner, has horns so large as those of the mountain goat, for they reach from his head as far as his buttocks. Long before his time, Pliny remarked, that the ibex is a creature of wonderful swiftness, although its head is loaded with vast horns. According to Scaliger, the horns of an elderly goat are sometimes eighteen pounds weight, and marked by twenty-four circular prominences, the indications of as many years. The horns of the ibex, according to the Chaldee interpreter, are mentioned by the prophet among the valuable commodities which enriched the merchants of Tyre, in the days of her prosperity: "The men of Dedan were thy merchants; many isles were the merchandise of thy hand; they brought thee for a present, horns of ivory and ebony." It is certain that the horns of this animal were greatly esteemed among the ancients, on account of the various useful purposes to which they were converted. The Cretan archers had them manufactured into bows; and the votaries of Bacchus, into large cups, one of which, says Ælian, could easily hold three measures. The conjecture of Bochart is therefore extremely probable, that the ibex of Homer, is the ibex of the Latins; for he calls it a wild goat, says that it was taken among the rocks and had horns of sixteen palms, of which the bow of Pan, dardus was fabricated. We may conclude from the wisdom and goodness of God, which shine conspicuously in all his works, that the enormous horns of the ibex are not a useless encumbrance, but, in some respects, necessary to its safety and comfort. The Arabian writers aver, that when it sees the hunter approach the top of the rock, where it happens to have taken its station, and has no other way of escape, turning on its back, it throws itself down the precipice, at once defended by its long bending horns from the projections of the rock, and saved from being dashed in pieces, or even hurt by the fall. The opinion of Pliny is more worthy of credit, that the horns of the ibex serve as a poise to its body in its perilous excursions among the precipitous rocks, or when it attempts to leap from one crag to another. The feats which it is said to perform among the Alpine summits, are almost incredible; one fact, however, seems to be certain, that in bounding from one height to another, it far surpasses all the other varieties of the species. To hunt the ibex has been justly reckoned a most perilous enterprise, which frequently terminates in the hunter's destruction. These facts place in a very strong light the extreme dangers which at one time compelled David to seek a refuge from the pursuit of his infatuated father-in-law, among the rocks of the wild goats; and, at the same time, the bitter and implacable spirit which prompted Saul to follow him in places so full of peril.

The Hebrew name of the cony is derived from a verb which signifies to hide, and seems to indicate a creature of a timid and harmless disposition. Unable to avoid or encounter the various dangers to which it would be exposed in the plain, it seeks a shelter among the rocks, in the fissures of which it hides itself from the pursuit of its enemies. This circumstance is attested by the sacred writer, in one of the songs of Zion: "The high hills are a refuge for the wild goats, and the rocks for the (צפון) shaphans." The choice which the shaphan makes of the rock for the place of its abode, is mentioned by Solomon as a proof of sagacity: "The shaphans are but a feeble folk, yet make they their houses in the rocks." It is evident from these words also, that the shaphan is a gregarious animal, although they afford us no hint from which the numbers which constitute their little communities may be inferred. To what particular animal the name shaphan really belongs, has been much disputed among the learned. In our version it is rendered by the word cony or rabbit; in which our translators have followed the greater part of modern interpreters. Several circumstances seem to favour this interpretation; it is twice connected in the law of Mo-ses with the hare, as if it were a kindred animal; the noun in the plural is rendered hare by the Seventy, in which they have been followed by many ancient interpreters of great name: the meaning of shaphan seems to correspond with the timidity of the rabbit; and it is certain that the Rabbinical writers formerly interpreted the original word in this manner. Besides, the rabbit is a gregarious animal, of a diminutive size, and found in great numbers in the plain of Jericho. But these facts are not sufficient to establish the point for which they are brought forward; for, instead of seeking a habitation in the fissures of the rocks, the rabbit delights to burrow in the sandy downs. Sometimes, indeed, he digs a receptacle for himself in rocky eminences, where the openings are filled with earth, but he generally prefers a dwelling in the sand, a situation for which he is evidently formed by nature. The words of David clearly show, that the instincts and habits of the shaphan, as naturally and constantly lead him to the rocks for shelter, as those of his associate impel him to rove among the mountains. He does not allude to an occasional residence, but to a fixed and permanent abode; not to the wanderings of a few, but to the habitual choice of a whole species. But the rabbit as uniformly seeks the sandy plain, as the wild goat the summit of the mountain. The shaphan, according to Solomon, discovers great wisdom and sagacity in retiring from the plain country, to the natural fastness which the almighty Creator has provided for its reception; but it is no mark of wisdom in the rabbit, that he forsakes occasionally the sandy plain, which he is naturally formed to occupy, and retires to the rocks, which are so little suited to his habits and manners. This is an act of rashness or folly, not of wisdom. The wise man is also noting the sagacity of a whole species, not of a rambling individual; but the species is to be found on the plain, not among the rocks. Nor is the rabbit a feeble creature; he runs with considerable swiftness; and he is provided with the means of digging his burrow, which he employs with so great energy, particularly when alarmed by the approach of danger, that he buries himself in the sand with surprising rapidity. To exert his strength, according to existing circumstances, is all the sagacity which he discovers; and this, it must be admitted, is not peculiar to him, but common to the hare, the hedgehog, and many other animals. He betrays no foresight, except in preparing his dwelling, and he is never known to supply the want of strength by any contrivance. The shaphan, as described both by David and Solomon, exhibits a very different character, and therefore cannot be the same animal.

But if we apply these characters to the daman Israel, or, as Mr. Bruce calls it, the ashkoko, the identity of this animal with the shaphan of the scriptures will instantly appear: "The daman is a harmless creature, of the same size and quality with the rabbit, and with the like incurvating posture and disposition of the fore-teeth. But it is of a browner colour, with smaller eyes, and a head more pointed, like the marmot's; the forefeet likewise are short, and the hinder are nearly as long in proportion as those of the jerboa. Though this animal is known sometimes to burrow in the ground, yet he is so much attached to the rock, that he is seldom or never seen on the ground, or from among large stones in the mouth of caves, where he fixes his constant residence. He is gregarious, as the wise man intimates, and lives in families; he is a native of Judea, Palestine, and Arabia, and consequently, must have been familiar to Solomon, and other inspired writers. The royal Psalmist, in a passage already quoted, describes him with great propriety, and joins him with other animals, which were perfectly known in that country. Solomon favours us with a more detailed account of his character: "There be four things which are little upon the earth, but they are exceeding wise; the sephanim are a feeble folk, yet make they their houses in the rocks." This exactly corresponds with the character which natural historians give us of the daman Israel, which they represent as equally feeble in body and temper. The toes of his forefeet very much resemble the fingers of the human hand; his feet are perfectly round, very pulpy or fleshy, liable to be excoriated or hurt, and of a soft fleshy substance. They are quite inadequate to dig holes in the ground, much more to force their way into the hard rock. Unable or afraid to stand upright on his feet, he steals along every moment as it were apprehensive of danger, his belly almost close to the ground, advancing a few steps at a time, and then pausing, as if afraid or uncertain whether he should proceed. His whole appearance and behaviour indicate a mild, feeble, and timid disposition; which is confirmed by the ease with which he is tamed. Conscious as it were of his total inability to dig in the ground, or to mingle with the sterner beasts of the field, he builds his house on rocks, more inaccessible than those to which the cony retires, and in which he resides in greater safety, not by exertions of strength, for he has it not, but by his own sagacity and judgment. Solomon has therefore justly characterized him as "a feeble animal, but exceeding wise."

The Arabian writers confound the daman Israel with the jerboa, which seems to be a species of rat. It ruminates, builds its house on the rocks, or digs its abode in the ground, but always in some high and rocky place, where it may be safe from the influx of waters, and the foot of the wild beast. If we may believe the Arabic writer quoted by Bochart, these diminutive animals discover no little sagacity in the conduct of public affairs, particularly in appointing a leader, whose business it is to give them notice of the approach of danger, and who in case of neglect is punished with death, and succeeded by another more attentive to their safety. Mr. Bruce, on the contrary, contends with great earnestness, that the habits of the jerboa are quite different from those which Solomon ascribes to the shaphan; he asserts, that the jerboa always digs his habitation in the smoother places of the desert, especially where the soil is fixed gravel; for in that chiefly he burrows, dividing his hole below into many mansions. He is not gregarious, like the shaphan, nor is he distinguished for his feebleness, which he supplies by his wisdom. Although, therefore, he ruminates in common with some other animals, and abounds in Judea, he cannot be the shaphan of the scripture. Hence, it is probable, that the Arabian writers improperly confounded the daman Israel, or shaphan, and the jerboa; and it may be considered as nearly certain, that the shaphan of Solomon is not the rabbit, but the daman Israel, which, though bearing some resemblance to it, is an animal of a different species.—Paxton.

Ver. 20. Thou makest darkness, and it is night wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth.

Immediately after landing, we hired horses to conduct us to Fanskog, ten miles and a half, where we arrived at so near an inn, and were withal so subdued by want of sleep and fatigue, that we rested for a few hours, writing our journals without candles half an hour after midnight, by a light that could not be called twilight; it was rather the glare of noon, being reflected so strongly from the walls and houses, that it was painful to our eyes, and we began already to perceive, what we never felt before, that darkness is one of those benevolent gifts of Providence, the value of which, as conducive to repose, we only become sensible of, when it ceases altogether to return. There were no shutters to the windows, and the continual blaze which surrounded us, we could gladly have dispensed with, had it been possible. When we closed our eyes, they seemed to be still open; we even bound on them our handkerchiefs; but a remaining impression of brightness, like a shining light, wearied and oppressed them. To this inconvenience we were afterward more exposed, and although use rendered us somewhat less affected by it, it was an evil of which we all complained, and we hailed the returning gloom of autumn as a comfort and a blessing.—CLARKE.

PSALM CV.

Ver. 26. He sent Moses his servant, and Aaron whom he had chosen.

Calmet sends the word servant, among the Hebrews, "generally signifies a slave." and Dr. A. Clarke says, (on Rom. i. 1, "Paul a servant of Jesus Christ,") the word δoulos, which we translate servant, properly means a slave, one who is the entire property of his master, and is used here by the apostle with great propriety. In eastern language the word used as expressive of the relationship of men to their deities is slave. "I am the adami," i.e. SLAVE, "of the supreme Siva." "I am the devoted slave of Vishnoo." Hindoo saints are always called the slaves of the gods. The term servant is applied to one who is at liberty to dispose of himself, in serving different masters: but not so a slave, he is the property of his owner; from him he receives protection and support, and he is not at liberty to serve another master; hence it is that the native Christians, in praying to the true God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ, always speak of themselves as slaves; they are not their own, but "bought with a price."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 30. The land brought forth frogs in abundance, in the chambers of their kings.

IT IS difficult for an Englishman in an eastern wet monsoon, to form a tolerable idea of that plague of Egypt, in which the frogs were in the "houses, bedchambers, beds, and kneading-troughs," of the Egyptians. In the season alluded to, myriads of them send forth their constant croak in every direction, and a man not possessed of overmuch patience, becomes as petulant as was the licentious god, and is ready to exclaim,

"Croak, croak, indeed I shall choke
If you pester and bore my ears any more
With your croak, croak, croak."

A new-comer, on seeing them leap about the rooms, become disgusted, and forthwith begins an attack upon them, but the next evening will bring a return of his active visitors. It may appear almost incredible, but in one evening we killed upwards of forty of these guests in the Jaffa Mission House. They had principally concealed themselves in a small tunnel connected with the bathing-room, and their noise had become almost insupportable. I have been amused when a man has been making a speech which has not given pleasure to his audience, to hear another person ask, "What has that fellow been croaking about, like a frog of the wet monsoon?" The natives also do us the honour of saying, that our singing, in Paris, is very much like the notes of the large and small frogs. The bass singers, say they, resemble the croak of the bull-frogs, and the other parts the notes of the small fry.—ROBERTS.

PSALM CVII.

Ver. 5. Hungry and thirsty, their soul fainted in them.

Many perish, victims of the most horrible thirst. It is then that the value of a cup of water is really felt; he that has a zenzabia of it is the richest of all: in such a case, there is no distinction; if the master has none, the servant will not give it to him; for very few are the instances where a man will voluntarily lose his life to save that of another, particularly in a caravan in the desert, where people are strangers to each other. What a situation for a man, though a rich one, perhaps the owner of all the caravans! He is dying for a cup of water; no one gives it to him; he offers all he possesses; no one hears him; they are all dying, though by walking a few hours farther they might be saved. The camels are lying down, and cannot be made to rise; no one has strength to walk; only he that has a glass of that precious liquid lives to walk a mile farther, and perhaps dies too. If the voyages on seas are dangerous, so are those in the deserts. At sea, the provisions very often fail; in the desert, it is worse. At sea, storms are met with; in the desert there cannot be a greater storm than to find a dry well. At sea, one meets pirates; we escape, we surrender, or die; in the desert they rob the traveller of all his property and water. They let him live, perhaps, but what a life! to die the most barbarous and agonizing death. In short, to be thirsty in a desert, without water, exposed to the burning sun, without shelter, and no hopes of finding either, is the most terrible situation that a man can be placed in, and I believe that it is one of the greatest sufferings that a human being can sustain. The eyes grow inflamed, the tongue and lips swell, a hollow sound is heard in the ears, which brings on deafness, and the brains appear to grow thick and inflamed. All these feelings arise from the want of a little water. In the midst of all this misery, the deceitful mirages appear before the traveller, at no great distance, something like a lake or river of clear fresh water. The deception of this phenomenon is well known, but it does not fail to invite the longing traveller towards that element, and to put him in remembrance of the happiness of being on such a spot. If perchance a traveller is not undeceived, he hastens his pace to reach it sooner: the more he advances towards it, the more it goes from him, till at last it vanishes entirely, and the deluded passenger often asks where is the water he saw at no great distance. He can scarcely believe that he was so deceived; he protests that he saw the waves running before the wind, and the reflection of the high rocks in the water. (Belzoni).—BURDER.

Ver. 16. For he hath broken the gates of brass, and cut the bars of iron in sunder.

See on Acts 12. 10.

PSALM CIX.

Ver. 9. Let his children be fatherless, and his wife a widow. 10. Let his children be continually vagabonds, and beg: let them seek their bread also out of their desolate places.

Listen to two married men who are quarrelling, you will hear the one accost the other, "Thy family will soon come to destruction." "And what will become of thine?" rejoins the other: "I will tell thee; thy wife will soon take off her thali," which means she will be a widow, as the thali is the marriage jewel, which must be taken off on the death of a husband. "Yes, thy children will soon be beggars; I shall see them at my door."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 23. I am gone like the shadow when it declineth: I am tossed up and down as the locust.

See on 2 Chron. 7. 13.

Dr. Shaw, speaking of the swarms of locusts, which he saw near Algiers, in 1724 and 1725, says, "when the wind blew briskly, so that these swarms were crowded by others, we had a lively idea of that comparison of the Psalmist, of being tossed up and down as the locust."—BURDER.

PSALM CX.

Ver. 1. The LORD said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool.

The best always places a distinguished guest on his right hand, because that side is considered more honourable than the other. Hence the rank known by the name of valankinar, right-hand caste, is very superior to the idungkiyar, or left-hand caste.—ROBERTS.

PSALM CXII.

Ver. 10 The wicked shall see it, and be grieved; he shall gnash with his teeth, and melt away; the desire of the wicked shall perish.

An enraged man snaps his teeth together, as if about to bite the object of his anger. Thus, in the book Ramayana, the giant Ravana is described as in his fury gnashing together his "thirty-two teeth!" "Look at the beast, how he gnashes his teeth." "Go near that fellow."—"Not I, indeed, he will only gnash his teeth."—ROBERTS.

PSALM CXIII.

Ver. 9. He maketh the barren woman to keep house, to be a joyful mother of children.

Should a married woman, who has long been considered sterile, become a mother, her joy, and that of her husband and friends, is most extravagant. "They called her Malady," i. e. barren, "but she has given us some good fruit." "My neighbours pointed at me, and said, Malady: but what will they say now?" A man who manifests great delight, is said to be like the barren woman, who has borne a child. Of any thing which is exceedingly valuable, it is said, "This is as precious as the son of the barren woman," i. e. of her who had long been reputed barren.—ROBERTS.

PSALM CXIX.

Ver. 82. Mine eyes fail for thy word, saying, When wilt thou comfort me?

Has a mother promised to visit her son or daughter, and should she not be able to go, the son or daughter will say, "Alas! my mother promised to come to me; how long have I been looking for her? but a speck has grown upon my eye." "I cannot see, my eyes have failed me;" i. e. by looking so intently for her coming.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 83. For I am become like a bottle in the smoke; yet do I not forget thy statutes.

Bottles are made of the skins of goats, sheep, and other animals; and there are several articles preserved in them, in the same way as the English keep hogs' lard in bladders. Some kinds of medicinal oil, assafoetida, honey, a kind of treacle, and other drugs, are kept for a great length of time, by hanging the bottles in the smoke, which soon causes them to become black and shrivelled. The Psalmist was ready to faint for the salvation of the Lord: his eyes had failed in looking for His blessing, and anxiety had made him like unto a skin bottle, shrivelled and blackened in the smoke.—ROBERTS.

Cups and drinking vessels of gold and silver were doubtless used in the courts of princes. (1 Kings x. 21.) But in the Arab tents leathern bottles, as well as pitchers, were used. These of course were smoky habitations. To this latter circumstance, and the contrast between the drinking utensils, the Psalmist alludes: "My appearance in my present state is as different from what it was when I dwelt at court, as the furniture of a palace differs from that of a poor Arab's tent."—HARMER.

The eastern bottle is made of a goat or kid skin, stripped off, without opening the belly; the apertures made by cutting off the tail and legs are sewed up, and when filled, it is tied about the neck. The Arabs and Persians never go a journey without a small leathern bottle of water hanging by their side like a scrip. These skin bottles preserve their water, milk, and other liquids, in a fresher state than any other vessels they can use. The people of the East, indeed, put into them every thing they mean to carry to a distance, whether dry or liquid, and very rarely make use of boxes and pots, unless to preserve such things as are liable to be broken. They enclose these leathern bottles in woollen sacks, because their beasts of carriage often fall down under their load, or cast it down on the sandy desert. This method of transporting the necessaries of life has another advantage; the skin bottles preserve them fresher; defend them against the ants, and other insects, which cannot penetrate the skin; and prevent the dust, of which immense quantities are constantly moving about, in the arid regions of Asia, and so fine, that no coffer is impenetrable to it, from reaching them. It is for these reasons that provisions of every kind are enclosed in vessels made of the skins of these animals. The conjecture, therefore, is highly probable, that not only the balm and the honey, which are somewhat liquid, but also the nuts and almonds, which were sent as a present to Joseph from Canaan, were enclosed in little vessels of kid skin, that they might be preserved fresh; and to defend them against injuries, from the restiveness of the camels or asses, or other accidents, the whole were enclosed in woollen sacks. This custom has descended to the present times; for fruits and provisions of every kind are still commonly packed up in skins, by the inhabitants of Syria.

To those goat-skin vessels the Psalmist refers in this complaint: "I am become as a bottle in the smoke." My appearance in the state of my exile is as different from what it was when I dwelt at court, as are the gold and silver vessels of a palace, from the smoky skin bottle of a poor Arab's tent, where I am now compelled to reside. Not less emphatical is the lamentation of the prophet, that the precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, or to vessels fabricated of that precious metal, were considered as no better than earthen pitchers, the work of the potter. The holy Psalmist compares himself to a bottle in the smoke; which is a convertible phrase with a bottle in the tent of an Arab; because, when fires are lighted in it, the smoke instantly fills every part, and greatly incommodes the tenant. Nor will this appear surprising, when it is considered that an Arabian tent has no aperture but the door, from which the smoke can escape. The inspired writer, therefore, seems to allude both to the meanness of a skin bottle, and to its blackness, from the smoke of the tent in which it is placed. And a most natural image it was for him to use, driven from the vessels of silver and gold in the palace of Saul, to quench his thirst with the wandering Arabs, from a smuted bottle of goat-skin. These bottles are liable to be rent, when old or much used, and at the same time capable of being repaired. In the book of Joshua we are informed, the Gibeonites "took wine bottles, old and rent, and bound up." This is perfectly according to the custom of the East; and the manner in which they mend their old and rent bottles is various. Sometimes they set in a piece; sometimes they gather up the wounded place in the manner of a purse; sometimes they put in a round flat piece of wood, and by that means stop the hole.—PAXTON.

Ver. 103. How sweet are thy words unto my taste! yea, sweeter than honey to my mouth.

An affectionate wife often says, "My husband, your words are sweeter to me than honey; yes, they are sweeter than the sugarcane." "Alas! my husband is gone," says the widow; "how sweet were his words! honey dropped from his mouth; his words were ambrosia."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 136. Rivers of water run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy law.

This figure occurs in the poem called Veerale-vudu-toothe. "Rivers of tears run down the face of that mother bereft of her children," is a saying in common use. "The water of her eyes runs like a river."—ROBERTS.

PSALM CXX.

Ver. 4. Sharp arrows of the mighty, with coals of juniper.

"Coals of juniper;" more properly, like the glowing or coals of broom. The Hebrew word rothorn, here translated juniper, means a shrub of the genista or broom species, the Spartium junceum of Linnæus, which grows in the south of France and in Spain, where it has retained its Arabic name, roterna. It is a moderate shrub, with thin branches, and white flowers that grows in the deserts. Forskal found it frequently in the sandy heaths about Suez. The caravans use it for fuel. When the Psalmist compares the tongue of the slanderer with the glowing of the coals of broom, he doubtless alludes to the severe pain caused by touching those coals, which continue to glow for a very long time.—ROSEN-MULLER.

PSALM CXXI.

Ver. 5. The LORD is thy keeper; the LORD is thy shade upon thy right hand.

An umbrella is a very ancient, as well as honourable defence against the pernicious effects of the scorching beams of the sun, in those sultry countries; may we not then suppose this is that kind of shade the Psalmist refers to in the 121st Psalm? ver. 5, "The Lord is thy keeper; the Lord is thy shade upon thy right hand." "The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night."

Niebuhr, who visited the southern part of Arabia, gives us the following account of a solemn procession of the Iman that resides at Sana, who is a great prince in that part of Arabia, and considered as a holy personage, being descended from Mohammed, their great prophet. "It is well known that the sultan at Constantinople goes every Friday to the mosque, if his health will at all admit of it. The Iman of Sana observes also this religious practice, with vast pomp. We only saw him in his return, because this was represented to us as the most curious part of the solemnity, on account of the long circuit he then takes, and the great number of his attendants, after their having performed their devotions in other mosques. . . . The Iman was preceded by some hundreds of soldiers. He, and each of the princes of his numerous family, caused a mdalla, or large umbrella, to be carried by his side, and it is a privilege which, in this country, is appropriated to princes of the blood, just as the sultan of Constantinople permits none but his vizier to have his kaik, or gondola, covered behind, to keep him from the heat of the sun. They say that in the other provinces of Yemen, the independent lords, such, for example, as the sheiks of Jafa, and those of Haschid u Bekil, the scherif of Abu Arisch, and many others, cause these mdallas, in like manner, to be carried for their use, as a mark of their independence. Besides the princes, the Iman had in his train at least six hundred lords of the most distinguished rank, as well ecclesiastics as seculars, and those of the military line, many of them mounted on superb horses, and a great multitude of people attended him on foot. On each side of the Iman was carried a flag, different from ours, in that each of them was surmounted with a little silver vessel like a censer. It is said that within some charms were put, to which they attributed a power of making the Iman invincible. Many other standards were unfurled with the same censer-like vessels, but without any regularity. In one word, the whole train was numerous, and in some measure magnificent, but no order seemingly was observed."

It appears by the carvings at Persepolis, umbrellas were very anciently used by the eastern princes; charms, we have reason to believe, were at least as ancient: may we not, with some degree of probability, suppose then this 121st Psalm refers to these umbrellas, where the response made, probably, by the ministers of the sanctuary, to the declaration of the king, in the two first verses, reminded him that JEROVAH would be to him all that heathen princes hoped for, as to defence and honour, from their royal umbrellas and their sacred charms, but hoped for in vain, as to them? "The Lord shall be thy shade on thy right hand. The sun shall not smite thee by day nor the moon by night."—HARMER.

Ver. 6. The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night.

A meridian summer's sun in England gives but a faint idea of the power of this luminary in the East; and yet, even in this temperate climate, who has not been inconvenienced when exposed to his rays? But how much greater is his effect in India! Sometimes "a stroke of the sun" smites man and beast with instant death. The moon has also a pernicious effect upon those who sleep in its beams; and fish, having been exposed to them for one night, becomes most injurious to those who eat it: hence our English seamen, when sailing in tropical climes, always take care to place their fish out of "the sight of the moon."—ROBERTS.

The very severe cold of the nights in the East was ascribed by the ancients to the influence of the moon, which they also supposed to be the origin of the dew. Macrobius says "that the nurses used to cover their sucklings against the moon, that they might not, as damp wood which bends in the heat, get crooked limbs from the superabundance of moisture. It is also well known," continues he, "that he who has slept in the moonlight is heavy when he awakes, and as if deprived of his senses, and, as it were, oppressed by the weight of the dampness which is spread over his whole body." The same opinion of the injurious effects of the light of the moon upon the human body, still prevailed in the East Indies in later times. Iwrgen Anderson, in his Description of the East, says, "One must here (in Batavia) take great care not to sleep in the beams of the moon uncovered. I have seen many people whose neck has become crooked, so that they look more to the side than forward. I will not decide whether it is to be ascribed to the moon, as people imagine here." In some of the southern parts of Europe the same opinions are entertained of the pernicious influence of the moonbeams. An English gentleman walking in the evening in the garden of a Portuguese nobleman at Lisbon, was most seriously admonished by the owner to put on his hat, to protect him from the moonbeams. The fishermen in Sicily are said to cover, during the night, the fish which they expose to dry on the sea-shore, alleging that the beams of the moon cause them to putrefy.—ROSEMULLER.

PSALM CXXII.

Ver. 2. Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem.

I think, so far as the SENSE is concerned, it does not matter whether this be read in the past, present, or future tense; for, in my opinion, the arguments on that subject are of little importance. I believe it to be a declaration of affection for Jerusalem, in which the feet, as the instruments of going to the holy place, were in eastern style naturally associated. The devout Hindoo, when absent from the sacred city of Sedambarang, often exclaims, "Ah! Sedambarang, my feet are ever walking in thee." "Ah! Siva-statham, are not my feet in thee?" A man who has long been absent from his favourite temple, says, on his return, "My feet once more tread this holy place."—ROBERTS.

PSALM CXXIII.

Ver. 2. Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress; so our eyes wait upon the LORD our God, until that he have mercy upon us.

THE HAND is looked at as the member by which a superior gives protection or dispenses favours; and if this Psalm be, as some suppose, a complaint of the captives in Babylon, it may refer to the HAND as the instrument of deliverance. A man in trouble says, "I will look at the hand of my friend." "I looked at the hand of my mistress, and have been comforted." A father, on returning from a journey, says, "My children will look to my hands," i. e. for a present. Of a troublesome person it is said, "He is always looking at my hands." A slave of a cruel master says to his god, "Ah! Swamy, why am I appointed to look at his hands?"—ROBERTS.

The Easterns direct their servants very generally by signs—even in matters of consequence. The Cingalese intimate their wish for a person to approach, by bending the finger with the point towards the person wanted, as if to seize him—quite in the opposite direction to the English way of beckoning. To depart is signified by a side nod; and a frown by a front one.—CALLAWAY.

The servants or slaves in the East attend their masters or mistresses with the profoundest respect. Maundrell observes, that the servants in Turkey stand round their master and his guests with the profoundest respect, silence, and order, imaginable. Pococke says, that at a visit in Egypt, every thing is done with the greatest decency, and the most profound silence, the slaves or servants standing at the bottom of the room, with their hands joined before them, watching with the utmost attention every motion of their master, who commands them by signs. De La Motraye says, that the eastern ladies are waited on "even at the least wink of the eye, or motion of the fingers, and that in a manner not perceptible to strangers." The Baron De Tott relates a remarkable instance of the authority attending this mode of commanding, and of the use of significant motions. "The customary ceremonies on these occasions were over, and Racub (the new vizier) continued to discourse familiarly with the ambassador, when the muzar aga (or high provost) coming into the hall, and approaching the pacha, whispered something in his ear, and we observed that all the answer he received from him was a slight horizontal motion with his hand, after which the vizier instantly resuming an agreeable smile, continued the conversation for some time longer: we then left the hall of audience, and came to the foot of the great staircase, where we remounted our horses: here, nine heads, cut off, and placed in a row on the outside of the first gate, completely explained the sign, which the vizier had made use of in our presence." Hence we discover the propriety of the actions performed by the prophets. Ezekiel was a sign to the people in not mourning for the dead, (chap. xxiv.) in his removing into captivity, and digging through the wall, (chap. xii.) Such conduct was perfectly well understood, and was very significant.—BOREAU.

PSALM CXXIV.

Ver. 7. Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers: the snare is broken, and we are escaped.

A man who has narrowly escaped danger says, "My life is like that of the bird which has escaped from the snare." The life of a man is often compared to that of a bird. Thus, of him whose spirit has departed, it is said, "Ah! the bird has left its nest; it has gone away." "As the unhatched bird must first burst from the shell before it can fly, so must this soul burst from its body."—ROBERTS.

PSALM CXXV.

Ver. 2. As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the LORD is round about his people from henceforth, even for ever.

The description which Volney gives of his approach to Jerusalem, furnishes no contemptible illustration of this verse; and as it is pleasant to compel an avowed infidel to illustrate and confirm the religion of Christ, which he detests, I shall subjoin his account. "Two days' journey south of Nablous, following the direction of the mountains, which gradually become more rocky and barren, we arrive at a town, which, like many others already mentioned, presents a striking example of the vicissitude of human affairs: when we behold its walls levelled, its ditches filled up, and all its buildings embarrassed with ruins, we scarcely can believe we view that celebrated metropolis, which formerly baffled the efforts of the most powerful empires, and for a time resisted the efforts of Rome herself; though by a whimsical change of fortune, its ruins now receive her homage and reverence: in a word, we with difficulty recognise Jerusalem. Nor is our astonishment less, to think of its ancient greatness, when we consider its situation amidst a rugged soil, destitute of water, and surrounded by dry channels of torrents and steep heights. Distant from every great road, it seems neither to have been calculated for a considerable mart of commerce, nor the centre of a great consumption. It however overcame every obstacle, and may be adduced as a proof of what popular opinion may effect, in the hands of an able legislator, or when favoured by happy circumstances." The proud unbeliever had found a shorter and easier road to his conclusion, in the volume of inspiration; and particularly in the passages quoted above, from the Psalms of David, who refers the singular prosperity of Jerusalem to the peculiar favour of Heaven. This was the real source of her greatness, and it was this alone, and not the natural strength of her situation, nor the skill and valour of her defenders, which enabled her so long to baffle the designs of her enemies.—PAXTON.

PSALM CXXVI.

Ver. 2. Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing; then said they among the heathen, The LORD hath done great things for them.

"See that happy man; his mouth is always full of laughing, his tongue is always singing; he is ever showing his teeth."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 4. Turn again our captivity, O LORD, as the streams in the south.

This image is taken from the torrents in the deserts to the south of Judea; in Idumæa, Arabia Petræa, &c., a mountainous country. These torrents were constantly dried up in the summer, (Job vi. 17, 18,) and as constantly returned after the rainy season, and filled again their deserted channels. The point of the comparison seems to be the return and renewal of these (not rivers, but) torrents, which yearly leave their beds dry, but fill them again; as the Jews had left their country desolate, but now flowed again into it.—BR. HORNE.

Ver. 5. They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.
6. He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall, doubtless, come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.

See on Ezek. 25. 4.

These figures are taken from agricultural pursuits; the seed, being well watered, will produce a plentiful harvest. The Jews in their captivity had been sowing good seed, had watered it with their tears, and the time was now come for them to reap with joy, and to return with their sheaves rejoicing. It is proverbial to say to a boy who weeps because he must go to school, or because he cannot easily acquire his lesson, "My child, the plants of science require the water of the eyes." "If you sow with tears, the profit will appear in your own hands."—ROBERTS.

The writer of the account of the ruins of Balbec, speaking of the valley in which it stood, observes, that it has very little wood; and adds, "though shade be so essential an article of oriental luxury, yet few plantations of trees are seen in Turkey, the inhabitants being discouraged from labours, which produce such distant and precarious enjoyment, in a country where even the annual fruits of their industry are uncertain. In Palestine we have often seen the husbandman sowing, accompanied by an armed friend, to prevent his being robbed of the seed." The Israelites that returned from Babylon upon the proclamation of Cyrus, were in similar circumstances to husbandmen sowing their corn amidst enemies and robbers. The rebuilding of their towns and their temple resembled a time of sowing; but they had reason to fear that the neighbouring nations would defeat these efforts. (Nehem. iv. 7.) In opposition to this apprehension the Psalmist expresses his hope, perhaps predicts, that there would be a happy issue of these beginnings, to re-people their country.—HARMER.

PSALM CXXVII.

Ver. 4. As arrows are in the hand of a mighty man: so are children of the youth. 5. Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them: they shall not be ashamed, but they shall speak with the enemies in the gate.

The margin has, instead of speak, "subdue the enemies in the gate." In ancient books, and also among the learned, (in common conversation,) sons are spoken of as the arrows of their fathers. To have a numerous male progeny is considered a great advantage; and people are afraid of offending such a family, lest the arrows should be sent at them. "What a fine fellow is the son of Kandan! he is like an arrow in the hand of a hero."—ROBERTS.

The Orientals are accustomed to call brave and valiant sons the "arrows" and "darts" of their parents, because they are able to defend them. "To sharpen arrows," "to make sharp arrows," is among them, to get brave and valiant sons. Merrick mentions a similar Chinese mode of expression. "When a son is born in a family, it is customary hang up bows and arrows before the house, as a sign that the family has acquired a defender."—ROSENMULLER.

PSALM CXXVIII.

Ver. 3. Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thy house: thy children like olive-plants round about thy table.

The people are exceedingly fond of having their houses covered with different kinds of vines; hence may be seen various creepers thus trained, bearing an abundance of fruit. Many interesting figures, therefore, are taken from plants which are thus sustained. A priest in blessing a married couple, often says, "Ah! may you be like the trees Cama-Valley and Cat-Pagga-Tharu!" These are said to grow in the celestial world, and are joined together: the Cama-Valley, being parasitical, cannot live without the other.—ROBERTS.

The natives of those countries are careful to decorate their habitations with the choicest products of the vegetable kingdom. The quadrangular court in front of their houses, is adorned with spreading trees, aromatic shrubs, and fragrant flowers, which are continually refreshed by the crystal waters of a fountain playing in the middle. To increase the beauty of the scene they cover the stairs which lead to the upper apartments with vines, and have often a lattice-work of wood raised against the dead walls, upon which climbs a vine, or other mantling shrub. This pleasing custom justifies Doddridge in supposing the occasion of our Lord's comparing himself to a vine, might be his standing near a window, or in some court by the side of the house, where the sight of a vine creeping upon the staircase or the wall might suggest this beautiful simile. This kind of ornament seems to have been very common in Judea, and may be traced to a very remote antiquity. From the familiar manner in which the Psalmist alludes to it, we may suppose it was one of the decorations about the royal palace: "Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thy house; thy children like olive-plants round about the table. Behold, that thus shall the man be blessed that feareth the Lord." Kimchi, a celebrated Jewish writer, explains the psalm in the same way; and observes, that a wife is compared to a vine, because that alone of all trees can be planted in a house. In confirmation of Kimchi's remark, Dr. Russel says, "It is generally true, if fruit-bearing trees be intended, as the vine is almost the only fruit-tree which is planted in the houses; pomegranates are another."—PAXTON.

PSALM CXXIX.

Ver. 3. The ploughers ploughed upon my back; they made long their furrows.

"The enemies of Israel cut their backs, as the ploughers cut the soil." (Dr. Boothroyd.) When a man is in much trouble through oppressors, he says, "How they plough me and turn me up! All are now ploughing me. Begone! have you not already turned me up?" "Alas! alas! my enemies nay, my children, are now ploughing me."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 6. Let them be as the grass upon the house-tops, which withereth afore it groweth up;
7. Wherewith the mower filleth not his hand, nor he that bindeth sheaves, his bosom.

See on Ruth 2, 4, 5.

The tops of the houses in Judea were flat, and so grass grew upon them, being covered with plaster of terrace. As it was but small and weak, and, being on high, was exposed to the scorching sun, it was soon withered. (Shaw.) Menochius says, that he saw such roofs in the island of Corsica, flat, and having earth upon them, on which grass grew of its own accord; but being burnt up in summer time by the sun, soon withered. But what Olaus Magnus relates is extraordinary. He says, that in the northern Gothic countries they feed their cattle from the tops of houses, especially in a time of siege; that their houses are built of stone, high and large, and covered with rafters of fir and bark of birch: on this is laid grass-earth, cut out of the fields four-square, and sowed with barley or oats, so that their roofs look like green meadows: and that what is sown, and the grass that grows thereon, may not wither before plucked up, they very diligently water it. Maundrell says, that these words allude to the custom of plucking up corn from the roots by handfuls, leaving the most fruitful fields as naked as if nothing had ever grown in them; and that this is done, that they may not lose any of the straw, which is generally very short, and necessary for the sustenance of their cattle, no hay being made in that country.—BURTON.

In the morning the master of the house laid in a stock of earth, which was carried and spread evenly on the top of the house, which is flat. The whole roof is thus formed of mere earth, laid on and rolled hard and flat. On the top of every house is a large stone roller, for the purpose of hardening and flattening this layer of rude soil, so that the rain may not penetrate; but upon this surface, as may be supposed, grass and weeds grow freely. It is to such grass that the Psalmist alludes, as useless and bad.—JOWITT.

The reapers in Palestine and Syria make use of the sickle, in cutting down their crops, and according to the present custom in this country, "fill their hand" with the corn, and those who bind up the sheaves, their "bosom." When the crop is thin and short, which is generally the case in light soils, and with their imperfect cultivation, it is not reaped with the sickle, but plucked up by the root with the hand. By this mode of reaping they leave the most fruitful fields as naked as if nothing had ever grown on them; and as no hay is made in the East, this is done, that they may not lose any of the straw, which is necessary for the sustenance of their cattle. The practice of reaping with the hand is perhaps involved in these words of the Psalmist, to which reference has already been made: "Let them be as the grass upon the house-tops, which withereth afore it groweth up; wherewith the mower filleth not his hand, nor he that bindeth sheaves, his bosom." The tops of the houses in Judea are flat, and being covered with plaster of terrace, are frequently grown over with grass. As it is but small and weak, and from its elevation exposed to the scorching sun, it is soon withered. To prevent this, they pluck it up for the use of their cattle, with the hand. A more beautiful and striking figure, to display the weak and evanescent condition of wicked men, cannot easily be conceived. They are every moment exposed to the judgments of God, like the grass on the house-top, which is tossed by the breeze, and scorched by the sun, and to the grasp of Omnipotence, which, weak and defenceless as they are, they can neither avoid nor resist. The sudden destruction of the wicked is described by the same writer, under another figure not less remarkable for its force and propriety: "I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay-tree. Yet he passed away, and, lo, he was not; yea, I sought him, but he could not be found."—PAXTON.

"Ah! that wretched family shall soon be as withered grass." "Go, vile one, for soon will thou be as parched grass."—ROBERTS.

PSALM CXXXII.

Ver. 9. Let thy priests be clothed with righteousness; and let thy saints shout for joy.

"See that excellent man; he wears the garments of justice and charity."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 17. There will I make the horn of David to bud: I have ordained a lamp for mine anointed.

"Yes, that man will flourish; already his horn has begun to appear—it is growing."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 18. His enemies will I clothe with shame; but upon himself shall his crown flourish.

This idea seems to be taken from the nature of the ancient crowns bestowed upon conquerors. From the earliest periods of history the laurel, olive, and ivy, furnished crowns to adorn the heads of heroes, who had conquered in the field of battle, gained the prize in the race, or performed some other important service to the public. These were the dear-bought rewards of the most heroic exploits of antiquity. This sets the propriety of the phrase in full view. The idea of a crown of gold and jewels flourishing, is at least unnatural: whereas flourishing is natural to laurels and oaks. These were put upon the heads of the victors in full verdure. (Piric.)—BURDER.

PSALM CXXXIII.

Ver. 3. As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion: for there the LORD commanded the blessing, even life for evermore.

See on Ps. 89. 12.

A great difficulty occurs in the comparison which the Psalmist makes to the dew of Hermon, that fell on the hill of Zion; which might easily be interpreted, if it had been observed, that the clouds which lay on Hermon, being brought by the north winds to Jerusalem, caused the dew to fall plentifully on the hill of Zion. But there is a Shihon (שִׁיחון) the tribe of Issachar, (Josh. xix. 19.) which may be the Zion spoken of by Eusebius and Saint Jerome, as near Mount Tabor; and there might be a hill there of that name, on which the dew of the other Hermon might fall, that was to the east of Esdraeton. However, as there is no certainty that Mount Hermon in that part is even mentioned in scripture, so I should rather think it to be spoken of this famous mountain, and that Tabor and Hermon are joined together, as rejoicing in the name of God, not on account of their being near to one another, but because they are two of the highest hills in all Palestine. So that if any one considers this beautiful piece of eloquence of the Psalmist, and that Hermon is elsewhere actually called Zion, (Deut. iv. 48.) he will doubtless be satisfied, that the most natural interpretation of the Psalmist would be to suppose, though the whole might be called both Hermon and Zion, yet that the highest summit of this mountain was in particular called Hermon, and that a lower part of it had the name of Zion; on which supposition, the dew falling from the top of it down to the lower parts, might well be compared in every respect to the precious ointment upon the head that ran down unto the beard, even unto Aaron's beard, and went down to the skirts of his clothing, and that both of them in this sense are very proper emblems of the blessings of unity and friendship, which diffuse themselves throughout the whole society. (Pococke.)—BURDER.

When Maundrell was in the neighbourhood of Mount Hermon, he remarked, "We were instructed by experience, what the Psalmist means by the dew of Hermon, our tents being as wet with it as if it had rained all night." In Arabia, says Dr. Shaw, the dew often wets the traveller who has no covering but the heavens, to the skin; but no sooner is the sun risen, and the atmosphere a little heated, than the mists are quickly dispersed, and the copious moisture which the dews communicated to the sands would be entirely evaporated.—PAXTON.

PSALM CXXXV.

Ver. 7. He causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth: he maketh lightnings for the rain: he bringeth the wind out of his treasures.

In Syria, lightnings are frequent in the autumnal months. Seldom a night passes without a great deal of lightning in the northwest, but without thunder; but when it appears in the west or southwest points, it is a sure sign of approaching rain, and is often attended with thunder. It has been observed already, that a squall of wind and clouds of dust, are the usual forerunners of the first rains. To these natural phenomena, the sacred writers frequently allude; and in the precise order which has been marked in the preceding observations. The royal Psalmist, in a very beautiful strain, ascribes them to the immediate agency of heaven: "He causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth: he maketh lightnings for the rain: he bringeth the wind out of his treasures." The cisterns of the clouds are replenished by exhalations from every part of the globe; and, when they are ready to open and pour out their refreshing showers on the parched ground, the glad tidings are announced by the rapid lightning, and the precious treasure is scattered over the fields by the attendant winds; and that the sweet singer of Israel looked through nature with an accurate, discriminating eye, is confirmed by the concurring testimony of all ages.—PAXTON.

Russel says, that at Aleppo a night seldom passes without lightning in the northwest quarter, but not attended with thunder. When it appears in the west or southwest points, it is a sure sign of the approaching rain; this lightning is often followed by thunder. Thus "God maketh the lightnings for the rain; and when he uttereth his voice, there is a multitude of waters in the heavens;" and as these refreshing showers are preceded by squalls of wind, "he bringeth forth the wind out of his treasure," Jer. li. 16.—HARMER.

PSALM CXXXVII.

Ver. 1. By the rivers of Babylon there we sat down; yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion.

See on Lam. 2. 10.

Ver. 5. If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning.

In the Hindoo book, Scanda-Purāna, it is written, "Singa-Muggam, on seeing that his heart throbb'd, the tears flow'd, and his hands and feet forgot their cunning." "Yes; if I lose thee, if I forget thee, it will be like the losing, like the forgetting of these eyes and arms."—ROBERTS.

The last words mean, may my right hand forget, refuse to perform its service; namely, cease to move, be benumbed. A similar, and, as it appears, proverbial expression, is found in an old Arabian poem, in De Sacy's Chrestom. Arab: "No, never have I done any thing that could displease thee; if this is not true, may my hand be unable to lift my scourge;" that is, may it be lamed.—ROSENUELLER.

PSALM CXXXVIII.

Ver. 6. Though the LORD be high, yet hath he respect unto the lowly: but the proud he knoweth afar off.

This is truly oriental: "Nān avari veggo tooratila ar-rika-rāin, i. e. I know him afar off. Let him be at a great distance; allow him to conduct his plans with the greatest secrecy; yet, I compass his path, I am close to him. You pretend to describe the fello to me: I know him well; there is no need to go near to him, for I can recognise him at the greatest distance. See how he carries his head; look at his gait; who can mistake his proud bearing?" "How does your brother conduct himself?"—"I cannot tell, for he knows me afar off."—ROBERTS.

PSALM CXL.

Ver. 4. Keep me, O LORD, from the hand of the wicked; preserve me from the violent man; who have purposed to overthrow my goings.

See on Ps. 91. 13.

PSALM CXLI.

Ver. 5. Let the righteous smite me; it shall be a kindness: and let him reprove me; it shall be an excellent oil, which shall not break my head: for yet my prayer also shall be in their calamities.

Certain oils are said to have a most salutary effect on the head; hence in fevers, or any other eruptions which affect the head, the medicinal men always recommend oil. I have known people who were deranged, cured in a very short time by nothing more than the application of a peculiar kind of oil to the head. There are, however, other kinds, which are believed (when thus applied) to produce delirium. Thus the reproofs of the righteous were compared to excellent oil, which produced a most salutary effect on the head. So common is this practice of anointing the head, that all who can afford it do it every week. But strange as it may appear, the crown of the head is the place selected for chastisement. Thus owners of slaves, or husbands, or schoolmasters, beat the heads of the offenders with their knuckles. Should an urchin come late to school, or forget his lesson, the pedagogue says to some of the other boys, "Go, beat his head." "Begone, fellow! or I will beat thy head." Should a man be thus chastised by an inferior, he quotes the old proverb—"If my head is to be beaten, let it be done with the fingers that have rings on;" meaning a man of rank. "Yes, yes; let a holy man smite my head; and what of that? it is an excellent oil." "My master has been beating my head, but it has been good oil for me."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 6. When their judges are overthrown in stony places, they shall hear my words; for they are sweet.

Ainsworth, "Their judges are thrown down by the rock sides." In 2 Chronicles xxv. 12, it is recorded that the children of Judah took ten thousand captives, "and brought them unto the top of the rock, and cast them down from the top of the rock, that they were all broken in pieces." It was a custom in all parts of the East thus to despatch criminals, by casting them down a precipice; the Tarpeian rock affords a similar instance. But who were these judges? probably those "men that work iniquity," as mentioned in the 4th verse. In the 5th verse he speaks of the salutary nature of the reproofs of the acutest, but in the 7th he seems to refer to the cruel results of having unmerciful judges; for in consequence of their smittings he says, "Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, as when one cutteth and cleaveth wood;" i. e. their bones were like the fragments and chips scattered on the earth, left by the hewers of wood. Therefore these judges were to be "overthrown in stony places."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 7. Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, as when one cutteth and cleaveth wood upon the earth.

A remarkable expression of the Psalmist David, Psalm cxli. 7, appears to have much poetical heightening in it, which even its author, in all probability, did not mean should be accepted literally; while, nevertheless, it might be susceptible of a literal acceptance, and is sometimes a fact.—The Psalmist says, "Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, as when one cutteth and cleaveth wood upon the earth." This seems to be strong eastern painting, and almost figurative language; but that it may be strictly true, the following extract demonstrates: "At five o'clock we left Garigana, our journey being still to the eastward of north; and at a quarter past six in the evening arrived at the village of that name, whose inhabitants had all perished with hunger the year before; their wretched bones being all unburied, and scattered upon the surface of the ground, where the village formerly stood. We encamped among the bones of the dead; no space could be found free from them; and on the 23d, at six in the morning, full of horror at this miserable spectacle, we set out for Teawa; this was the seventh day from Ras El Peel. After an hour's travelling, we came to a small river, which still had water standing in some considerable pools, although its banks were destitute of any kind of shade." (Bruce.) The reading of this account thrills us with horror; what then must have been the sufferings of the ancient Jews at such a sight!—when to have no burial was reckoned among the greatest calamities; when their land was thought to be polluted, in which the dead (even criminals) were in any manner exposed to view; and to whom the very touch of a dead body, or part of it, or of any thing that had touched a dead body, was esteemed a defilement, and required a ceremonial ablution!—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

PSALM CXLII.

Ver. 7. Bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name; the righteous shall compass me about; for thou shalt deal bountifully with me.

These people speak of afflictions, difficulties, and sorrows, as so many prisons. "Iyo intha marrail eppe tuttu pome?" i. e. "Alas! when will this imprisonment go?" exclaims the man in his difficulties.—ROBERTS.

PSALM CXLIV.

Ver. 12. That our sons may be as plants grown up in their youth; that our daughters may be as corner-stones, polished after the similitude of a palace.

Of a man who has a hopeful and beautiful family, it is said, "His sons are like shoots, (springing up from the parent stock,) and his daughters are like carved work and precious stones."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 13. That our garners may be full, affording all manner of store; that our sheep may bring forth thousands and ten thousands in our streets.

The surprising fecundity of the sheep has been celebrated by writers of every class. It has not escaped the notice of the royal Psalmist, who, in a beautiful ascription of praise to the living and the true God, entreats, that the sheep of his chosen people might "bring forth thousands and ten thousands in their streets." In another song of Zion, he represents, by a very elegant metaphor, the numerous flocks, covering like a garment the face of the field: "The pastures are clothed with flocks; the valleys also are covered over with corn; they shout for joy, they also sing." The bold figure is fully warranted by the prodigious numbers of sheep which whitened the extensive pastures of Syria and Canaan. In that part of Arabia which borders on Judea, the patriarch Job possessed at first seven thousand sheep; and Meshah, the king of Moab, paid the king of Israel "a yearly tribute of a hundred thousand lambs, and an equal number of rams with the wool." In the war which the tribe of Reuben waged with the Hagarites, the former drove away "two hundred and fifty thousand sheep." At the dedication of the temple, Solomon offered in sacrifice "a hundred and twenty thousand sheep." At the feast of the passover, Josiah, the king of Judah, "gave to the people, of the flock, lambs and kids, all for the passover-offerings, for all that were present, to the number of thirty thousand, and three thousand bullocks; these were of the king's substance." The ewe brings forth her young commonly once a year, and in more ungenial climes, seldom more than one lamb at a time. But in the oriental regions, twin lambs are as frequent as they are rare in other places; which accounts in a satisfactory manner for the prodigious numbers which the Syrian shepherd led to the mountains. This uncommon fruitfulness seems to be intimated by Solomon in his address to the spouse: "Thy teeth are like a flock of sheep that are even shorn, which came up from the washing; whereof every one beareth twins, and none is barren among them."—PAXTON.

PSALM CXLVIII.

Ver. 9. Mountains, and all hills; fruitful trees, and all cedars: 10. Beasts, and all cattle; creeping things, and flying fowl: 11. Kings of the earth, and all people; princes, and all judges of the earth: 12. Both young men and maidens; old men and children: 13. Let them praise the name of the Lord: for his name alone is excellent; his glory is above the earth and heaven.

Those who are unacquainted with oriental literature, sometimes affect to smile at the addresses which are made in scripture to animate and inanimate nature. "How ridiculous," say they, "to talk about the mountains skipping like rams, and the little hills like lambs!" but they know not that this is according to the figurative and luxuriant genius of the people of the East. The proprietor of lands, forests, orchards, and gardens, often exclaims, when walking among them in time of drought, "Ah! trees, plants, and flowers, tanks and cattle, birds and fish, and all living creatures, sing praises to the gods, and rain shall be given to you."—ROBERTS.

PSALM CXLIX.

Ver. 5. Let the saints be joyful in glory: let them sing aloud upon their beds.

After the troops were assembled, a public sacrifice was offered upon the national altar, which was succeeded by a martial feast prepared for the whole army; and to confirm their purpose and inflame their courage, a hymn to Jehovah closed the festival. The hundred and forty-ninth psalm, was, in the opinion of Doddridge, composed on such an occasion; it was sung when David's army was marching out to war against the remains of the devoted nations of Canaan, and first went up in solemn procession to the house of God, there, as it were, to consecrate the arms he put into their hands. On that occasion, the devout monarch called on his associates in arms (ver. 5) "to sing aloud upon their beds," that is, the couches upon which they reclined at the banquet attending their sacrifices, which gives a clear and important sense to a very obscure and difficult passage. To these military sacrifices and banquets the people were summoned by the sound of two silver trumpets of a cubit long, according to Josephus, but, like ours, wider at bottom. These were blown by two priests, as the law of Moses required; and they were sounded in a particular manner, that the people might know the meaning of the summons. Then the anointed for the war, going from one battalion to another, exhorted the soldiers in the Hebrew language, no other being allowed on that occasion, to fight valiantly for their country, and for the cities of their God. Officers were appointed to give notice, that those whose business it was should make sufficient provision for the army, before they marched; and every tenth man was appointed for this purpose. This arrangement was made by a resolution of the tribes, recorded in the book of Judges: "And we will take ten men of a hundred throughout all the tribes of Israel, and a hundred of a thousand, and a thousand out of ten thousand, to fetch victual for the people, that they may do, when they come to Gibeath of Benjamin, according to all the folly that they have wrought in Israel." Mr. Harmer contends, that "these men were not intended so much to collect food-for the use of their companions in that expedition, as to dress it, to serve it up, and to wait upon them in eating it." But although the difference is not very material, the supposition that the tenth part of the army was to forage for the rest is more natural, and at the same time more agreeable to the literal meaning of the text, which signifies to hunt the prey.—PAXTON.

PSALM CL.

Ver. 3. Praise him with the sound of the trumpet: praise him with the psaltery and harp.

4. Praise him with the timbrel and dance: praise him with stringed instruments and organs. 5. Praise him with the loud cymbals: praise him upon the high-sounding cymbals.

Instruments of music were used in the worship of the Most High God: and the Hindoos, in singing praises, and performing religious ceremonies to their deities, always have the same accompaniments. Thus the trumpet and the "high-sounding cymbals," the timbrels, (which correspond partly with the tamarine,) the harp, כִּינּוֹר kinnor, (also called kinnora in Tamul,) is a stringed instrument, played with the fingers: and may be heard in all their temples at the time of service. The devotee engaged in making offerings often exclaims, "Praise him, O ye musicians! praise him; praise the Swamy:" and great is their enthusiasm; their eyes, their heads, their tongues, their hands, their legs, are all engaged. At a marriage, or when a great man gives a feast, the guests go to the players on instruments, and say, "Praise the noble host, praise the bride and the groom; praise aloud, O cymbals! give forth the voice, ye trumpets; strike up the harp and the timbrel; praise him in the song, serve him, serve him."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 5. Praise him with the loud cymbals: praise him upon the high-sounding cymbals.

The Hebrew word, which is here translated cymbal, signifies rather, metal plates or basins. In the above passage, a larger and smaller kind are probably meant, both of which are still customary in the East. The latter are metal plates, castanets, such as the oriental female dancers take two on each hand, over one finger and the thumb. For military music, they have large plates of the same form. And these are those which are here called "high-sounding cymbals."—BURDEA.

THE BOOK OF PROVERBS.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1. The proverbs of Solomon, the son of David, king of Israel.

In those periods of remote antiquity, which may with the utmost propriety be styled the infancies of societies and nations, the usual, if not the only mode of instruction, was by detached aphorisms or proverbs. Human wisdom was then indeed in a rude and unfinished state: it was not digested, methodized, or reduced to order and connexion. Those who by genius and reflection, exercised in the school of experience, had accumulated a stock of knowledge, were desirous of reducing it into the most compendious form, and comprised in a few maxims those observations which they apprehended most essential to human happiness. This mode of instruction was, in truth, more likely than any other to prove efficacious with men in a rude stage of society; for it professed not to dispute, but to command; not to persuade, but to compel: it conducted them, not by a circuit of argument, but led immediately to the approbation and practice of integrity and virtue. That it might not, however, be altogether destitute of allurements, and lest it should disgust by an appearance of roughness and severity, some degree of ornament became necessary; and the instructors of mankind added to their precepts the graces of harmony, and illuminated them with metaphors, comparisons, allusions, and the other embellishments of style. This manner, which with other nations prevailed only during the first periods of civilization, with the Hebrews continued to be a favourite style to the latest ages of their literature.—LOWTH.

Ver. 6. To understand a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark sayings.

The people of the East look upon the acquirements of antiquity as being every way superior to those of modern times: thus their noblest works of art and their sciences are indebted to antiquity for their invention and perfection. Instead, therefore, of their minds being enlightened and excited by the splendid productions of modern genius, they are ever reverting to the wisdom of their forefathers, and sighing over the loss of many of their occult sciences. We, on the other hand, by contemplating the imposing achievements of the present age, are in danger of looking with contempt on antiquity, and of pursuing with thoughtless avidity the novelties and speculations of modern inventions.

Solomon could repeat "three thousand proverbs, and his songs were a thousand and five;" and many of the philosophers of the present age in the East have scarcely any other wisdom. Listen to two men engaged in argument: should he who is on the point of being foiled, quote an opposite proverb against his antagonist, an advantage is considered as having been gained, which scarcely any thing can counteract. See a man who is pondering over some difficulty: his reason cannot decide as to the course he ought to pursue, when, perhaps, some one repeats a palan-nulle, i. e. an old saying: the whole of his doubts are at once removed, and he starts with vigour in the prescribed course.

"Young man, talk not to me with INFANT wisdom, what are the sayings of the ancients! you ought to obey your parents. Listen! 'The father and the mother are the first deities a child has to acknowledge.' Is it not said, 'Children who obey willingly are as ambrosia to the gods?'" "Were you my friend, you would not act thus; because, as the proverb says, 'True friends have but one soul in two bodies.'" "I am told you have been trying to ruin me; 'but will the moon be injured by the barking of a dog?'" "You have become proud, and conduct you: self like the upstart who must 'carry his silk umbrella to keep off the sun at midnight!'" "You talk about your hopes of some coming good; what say the ancients? 'EXPECTATION is the midday dream of life.'" "Cease to be indolent, for, as our fathers said, 'Idleness is the rust of the mind.'" "That you have been guilty of many crimes I cannot doubt, as the proverb says, 'Will there be smoke without fire?' Your wife has, I fear, led you astray, but she will be your ruin: what said the men of antiquity? 'As is the affection of a file for the iron, of a parasitical plant for the tree which supports it; so is the affection of a violent woman for her husband: she is like Yama, (the deity of death,) who eats and destroys without appearing to do so.'" With these specimens, the English reader may form a tolerable idea of the importance which is attached to proverbs.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 19. So are the ways of every one that is greedy of gain; which taketh away the life of the owners thereof.

The words rendered "greedy of gain," denote one who cuts or clips off every scrap of money he possibly can. In the times of Abraham and Moses, and long after, they used to weigh their silver, and, no doubt, to cut and clip off pieces of it, to make weight in their dealings with each other, as is practised by some nations, particularly the Chinese, to this day.—BURDER.

Ver. 26. I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh; 27. When your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish cometh upon you.

According to Savary, the south wind, which blows in Egypt from February to May, fills the atmosphere with a subtle dust, which impedes respiration, and brings with it pernicious vapours. Sometimes it appears only in the shape of an impetuous whirlwind, which passes rapidly, and is fatal to the traveller, surprised in the middle of the deserts. Torrents of burning sand roll before it, the firmament is enveloped in a thick veil, and the sun appears of the colour of blood. It is therefore with strict propriety that the sacred writers distinguish from all others the whirlwinds of the south, and with peculiar force and beauty, compare the sudden approach of calamity to their impetuous and destructive career. "I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh: when your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish cometh upon you." Whole caravans have been overwhelmed in a moment, by the immense quantity of sand which it puts in motion. The Arab who conducted Mr. Bruce through the frightful deserts of Senaar, pointed out to him a spot among some sandy hillocks, where the ground seemed to be more elevated than the rest, where one of the largest caravans which ever came out of Egypt was covered with sand, to the number of several thousand camels. This awful phenomenon Addison has well described in the following lines, which he puts into the mouth of Syphax, a Numidian prince:—

"So where our wide Numidian states extend,
Sudden the impetuous hurricanes descend,
Wheel through the air, in circling eddies play,
Tear up the sands, and sweep whole plains away.
The helpless traveller, with wild surprise,
Sees the dry desert all around him rise,
And, smothered in the dusty whirlwind, dies."—PASTOR.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 8. It shall be health to thy navel, and marrow to thy bones.

The navel of an infant is often very clumsily managed in the East: hence it is no uncommon thing to see that part greatly enlarged, and diseased. The fear of the Lord, therefore, would be as medicine and health to the navel, causing it to grow and prosper. Strange as it may appear, the navel is often spoken of as a criterion of prosperity; and Solomon appears to have had the same idea, for he mentions this health of the navel as being the result of trusting in the Lord, and of acknowledging Him in all our ways. He says in the next verse, "Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the first-fruits of all thine increase: so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine." And this reference to the navel, as being connected with earthly prosperity, is common at this day. Has a person arisen from poverty to affluence, it is said, "His navel has grown much larger." Should he insult the man from whom he has derived his prosperity, the latter will ask, "Who made your navel to grow?"—ROBERTS.

Medicines in the East are chiefly applied externally, and in particular to the stomach and belly. This comparison, Chardin says, is drawn from the plasters, ointments, oils, and frictions, which are made use of in the East upon the belly and stomach in most maladies; they being ignorant in the villages, of the art of making decoctions and potions, and the proper doses of such things.—HARMER.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 13. Take fast hold of instruction; let her not go: keep her; for she is thy life.

It is said of the fixed will or purpose of those who take fast hold of learning or any other thing, "Ah! they are like the hand of the monkey in the shell of the cocoa-nut; it will not let go the rice."

"On the banks of a broad river there was once a very large herd of monkeys, which greatly injured the fields and gardens of the inhabitants. Several consultations were held as to the best way of getting rid of those troublesome marauders: to take their lives was altogether contrary to the religious prejudices of the people; and to take them in traps was almost impossible, as the monkeys never approached any place without well examining the ground. At last it was determined to procure a sufficient number of cocoa-nuts; to make in each a small hole, and fill them with rice. These were strewed on the ground, and the people retired to watch the success of their plan. The offenders soon went to the place, and seeing the rice (their favourite food) in the nuts, they began to eat the few grains scattered about on the ground: but these only exciting their appetite, they each thrust a hand through the small hole into the nut, which was soon clasped full of rice. The hand now became so enlarged that it could not be withdrawn without losing its booty: to leave such a dainty was more than the monkey could consent to: the people therefore came forward, and soon seized their foes, as the cocoa-nut attached to the hand prevented them from getting quickly out of the way. They were, therefore, all made prisoners, and ferried across the river, and left to seek their food in the wilderness." "Take fast hold of instruction; let her not go; keep her; for she is thy life."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 18. Let thy fountain be blessed; and rejoice with the wife of thy youth. 19. Let her be as the loving hind and pleasant roe; let her breasts satisfy thee at all times, and be thou ravished always with her love.

The hind is celebrated for affection to her mate; hence a man, in speaking of his wife, often calls her by that name. "My hind, my hind! where is my hind?" "Alas! my hind has fallen; the arrow has pierced her life."—ROBERTS.

The hind of loves, and the roe of grace, in the language of the ancient Hebrews, mean, the amiable hind and the lovely roe. These creatures, it is generally admitted, in the whole form of their bodies, and in all their dispositions and manners, are wonderfully pleasing. The ancients were particularly delighted with them; they kept them in their houses; they fed them at their tables with the greatest care; they washed, and combed, and adorned them with garlands of flowers, and chains of gold or silver. The hind seems to have been admitted to all those privileges, except that of reposing with her master on the same couch, which must have been rendered inconvenient by the largeness of her size. If these things are only considered, the charge of the wise man will not appear so singular; to the ear of an Oriental it was quite intelligible, and perfectly proper. Let a man tenderly love his spouse; relax in her company from the severer duties of life; take pleasure in her innocent and amiable conversation; and in fine, treat her with all the kindness, and admit her to all the familiarity, which the beauty of her form, the excellence of her dispositions, and the nearness of her relation, entitle her to expect.—PAXTON.

The Orientals still compare a beautiful woman to a hind, or the gazelle, which resembles the roe. "When the Arabs wish to describe the beauty of a woman, they say, that she has the eyes of a gazelle. All their songs, in which they celebrate their mistresses, speak of nothing but gazelle eyes, and they need only compare them to this animal, to describe, in one word, a perfect beauty. The gazelle is in fact a very pretty animal; it has something innocently timid about it, not unlike the modesty and bashfulness of a young girl." (D'Arvieux.) Sparrmann says of the Cape or African gazelle, which is very nearly related to that of Palestine, "This animal is, perhaps, the most beautiful of all gazelles, and is particularly distinguished, as the gazelle in general, for its fiery and beautiful eyes: hence, in some parts of the East, it is properly considered as the greatest praise which can be bestowed on the beauty of a woman, to say, Thy eyes are like the eyes of a gazelle."—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 19. Let her be as the loving hind and pleasant roe; let her breasts satisfy thee at all times, and be thou ravished always with her love.

See on 2 Sam. 2. 18.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1. My son, if thou be surety for thy friend, if thou hast stricken thy hand with a stranger, 2. Thou art snared with the words of thy mouth.

It was at first reckoned sufficient if the covenant was made in the presence of all the people; but in process of time, the ceremony of striking hands was introduced at the conclusion of a bargain, which has maintained its ground among the customs of civilized nations down to the present time. To strike hands with another was the emblem of agreement among the Greeks under the walls of Troy; for Nestor complains, in a public assembly of the chiefs, that the Trojans had violated the engagements which they had sanctioned by libations of wine, and giving their right hands. And in another passage, Agamemnon protests that the agreement which the Trojans had ratified by the blood of lambs, libations of wine, and their right hands, could not in any way be set aside. The Roman faith was pledged in the same way; for in Virgil, when Dido marked from her watch-towers the Trojan fleet setting forward with balanced sails, she exclaimed, Is this the honour, the faith? "En dextra fidesque?" The wise man alludes often to this mode of ratifying a bargain, which shows it was in general practice among the people: "My son, if thou be surety for thy friend, if thou hast stricken thy hand with a stranger, thou art snared with the words of thy mouth." Traces of this custom may be discovered in ages long anterior to that in which Solomon flourished; for Job, in his solemn appeal to God from the tribunal of men, thus expresses himself: "Lay down now, put me in surety with thee; who is he that will strike hands with me?"—PAXTON.

Ver. 5. Deliver thyself as a roe from the hand of the hunter, and as a bird from the hand of the fowler.

Does a man complain of his numerous enemies, it will be said, "Leap away, friend, as the deer from the snare." "Fly off, fly off, as the bird from the fowler." "Go slyly to the place; and then, should you see the snare, fly away like a bird."—ROBERTS.

Before dogs were so generally employed, the hunters were obliged to make use of nets and snares, to entangle the game. When the antelope finds itself enclosed in the toils, terror lends it additional strength and activity; it strains every nerve, with vigorous and incessant exertion, to break the snare, and escape before the pursuer arrives. And such is the conduct which the wise man recommends to him who has rashly engaged to be surety for his neighbour: "Deliver thyself as (an antelope) from the hand of the hunter, and as a bird from the hand of the fowler." The snare is spread, the adversary is at hand, instantly exert all thy powers to obtain a discharge of the obligation; a moment's hesitation may involve thee and thy family in irretrievable ruin.—PAXTON.

Ver. 6. Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise.

The name of this minute insect in Hebrew is (חַמְלָה) chamla, from a root which signifies to cut down; perhaps because the God of nature has taught it to divide or cut off the top of the grain, which it lays up in its subterraneous cells for the winter, to prevent their germination. This operation is attested by numerous ancient writers, among whom we observe the celebrated names of Pliny and Plutarch. It is at least certain, that the ant cuts off the tops of growing corn, that it may seize upon the grain; which may perhaps be the true reason of its Hebrew name. The allusions to this little animal in the sacred writings, although not numerous, are by no means unimportant. The wisest of men refers us to the bright example of its foresight and activity: "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise: which having no guide, overseer, or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest." Their uniform care and promptitude in improving every moment as it passes; the admirable order in which they proceed to the scene of action; the perfect harmony which reigns in their bands; the eagerness which they discover in running to the assistance of the weak or the fatigued; the readiness with which those that have no burden yield the way to their fellows that bend under their loads, or when the grain happens to be too heavy, cut it in two, and take the half upon their own shoulders; furnish a striking example of industry, benevolence, and concord, to the human family. Nor should the skill and vigour which they display in digging under ground, in building their houses, and in constructing their cells, in filling their granaries with corn for the winter, in forming channels for carrying off the rain, in bringing forth their hidden stores which are in danger of spoiling by the moisture, and exposing them to the sun and air, be passed over in silence. These, and many other operations, clearly show how instructive a teacher is the ant, even to men of understanding; and how much reason Solomon had to hold up its shining example to their imitation.

We find another allusion to the ant near the close of the same book: "The ants are a people not strong, yet they prepare their meat in the summer." It is, according to the royal preacher, one of those things which are little upon the earth, but exceeding wise. The superior wisdom of the ant was been recognised by many writers. Horace, in the passage from which the preceding quotation is taken, praises its sagacity; Virgil celebrates its foresight, in providing for the wants and infirmities of old age, while it is young and vigorous:

— "atque inopi metuens formica senectæ."

And we learn from Hesiod, that among the earliest Greeks it was called Idris; that is, wise, because it foresaw the coming storm, and the inauspicious day, and collected her store. Aristotle observes, that some of those animals which have no blood, possess more intelligence and sagacity than some that have blood; among which are the bees and the ants. Cicero believed that the ant is not only furnished with senses, but also with mind, reason, and memory: "In formica non modo sensus sed etiam mens, ratio, memoria." Some authors go so far as to prefer the ant to man himself, on account of the vigorous intelligence and sagacity which they display in all their operations. Although this opinion is justly chargeable with extravagance, yet it must be admitted, that the union of so many noble qualities in so small a corpuscle, is one of the most remarkable phenomena in the works of nature. This is admitted by Solomon himself: "The ants are a people not strong, yet they prepare their meat in the summer." He calls them a people, because they are gregarious; living in a state of society, though without any king or leader to maintain order and superintend their affairs. The term people is frequently applied to them by ancient writers. Ælian says, in a passage already quoted, that the ants which ascend the stalks of growing corn, throw down the spikes which they have bit off, τὰ ἔθνη, τὸ κατὰ, to the people, that is, the ants below. Apuleius, describing the manner in which the ants convoke an assembly of the nations, says, that when the signal is given, Ruunt aliæ superque aliæ sedum populorum undæ. The wise man adds, they are not strong; that is, they are feeble insects; nor is it possible that great strength can reside in so minute a creature. Hence the Arabians say contemptuously of a man that has become weak and infirm, "he is feebler than the ant."—PAXTON.

Ver. 13. He winketh with his eyes, he speaketh with his feet, he teacheth with his fingers

See on Matt. 6. 3.

It should be remembered, that when people are in their houses, they do not wear sandals; consequently their feet and toes are exposed. When guests wish to speak with each other, so as not to be observed by the host, they convey their meaning by the feet and toes. Does a person wish to leave a room in company with another, he lifts up one of his feet; and should the other refuse, he also lifts up a foot, and then suddenly puts it down on the ground.

"He teacheth with his fingers." When merchants wish to make a bargain in the presence of others, without making known their terms, they sit on the ground, have a piece of cloth thrown over the lap, and then put each a hand under, and thus speak with the fingers! When the Bramins convey religious mysteries to their disciples, they teach with their fingers, having the hands concealed in the folds of their robes.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 27. Can a man take fire in his bosom, and his clothes not be burnt?

When an individual denies a crime of which he has been accused, it will be asked, "Will you put fire in your bosom?" "I am innocent, I am innocent; in proof of which I will put fire in my bosom." Does a man boast he will do that which is impossible, another will say, "He is going to put fire in his bosom without being burned."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 34. For jealousy is the rage of a man; therefore he will not spare in the day of vengeance.

Jealousy is very common and powerful among the people of the East; and is frequently carried to an extent, of which we have no example in European countries. "Whoever, in Persia, has the misfortune to see, or the impudence to look at, the wife of a man of rank, were it but as she travels on the road, and at ever so great a distance, is sure to be severely beaten by her eunuchs, and, perhaps, put to death; and to meet any of the king's concubines is such a capital crime, that, on a certain occasion, when the favourite queen happened, during the chase, to be overtaken by a storm, and under the necessity of taking refuge in a hamlet, not one of the people would let her majesty in, that they might not have the misfortune of seeing her." (Michaelis).—BURDER.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 10. And, behold, there met him a woman, with the attire of a harlot, and subtle of heart.

Females of that class are generally dressed in scarlet; have their robes wound tightly round their bodies; their eyelids and finger nails are painted or stained; and they wear numerous ornaments. (2 Kings ix. 30.) See on Isa. iii. 16, and following verses.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 11. She is loud and stubborn; her feet abide not in her house.

In ancient Greece, the women were strictly confined within their lodgings, especially virgins and widows; of whom the former, as having less experience in the world, were more closely watched. Their apartment was commonly well guarded with locks and bolts; and sometimes they were so straitly confined, that they could not pass from one part to another without permission. New-married women were almost under as strict a confinement as virgins; but when once they had brought forth a child, they commonly enjoyed greater liberty. This indulgence, however, was entirely owing to the kindness of their husbands; for those who were jealous or morose, kept their wives in perpetual imprisonment. But how gentle and kind soever husbands might be, it was considered as very indecent for women to go abroad. A Jewess was not so much confined; but still it was deemed improper for her to appear much in public; for in Hebrew she is called (אלמא) almah, from a verb which signifies to hide or conceal, because she was seldom or never permitted to mingle in promiscuous company. The married women, though less restrained, were still expected to keep at home, and occupy their time in the management of their household. In the book of Proverbs, the wise man states it as a mark of a dissolute woman, that "her feet abide not in her house:" while "every wise woman," by her industrious and prudent conduct, "buildeth her house." "She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness."—PAXTON.

Ver. 16. I have decked my bed with coverings of tapestry, with carved works, with fine linen of Egypt.

We are not to suppose that all beds were alike; no doubt, when King David wanted warmth, his attendants would put both mattresses below, and coverlets above, to procure it for him. Neither are we to understand, when a bed is the subject of boasting, that it consisted merely of the krabaton, or orsak. In Pro. vii. 16, the harlot vaunts of her bed, as highly ornamented—"with tapestry-work— with brocade I have brocaded—bedecked—my orsak," the covering to my duan (rather the makass) is fine linen of Egypt, embossed with embroidery." This description may be much illustrated by the account which Baron De Tott gives of a bed, in which he was expected to sleep, and in which he might have slept, had not European habit incapacitated him from that enjoyment: "The time for taking our repose was now come, and we were conducted into another large room, in the middle of which was a kind of bed, without bedstead or curtains. Though the coverlet and pillows exceeded in magnificence the richness of the sofa, which likewise ornamented the apartment, I foresaw that I could expect but little rest on this bed, and had the curiosity to examine its make in a more particular manner. Fifteen mattresses of quilted cotton, about three inches thick, placed one upon another, formed the ground-work, and were covered by a sheet of Indian linen, sewed on the last mattress. A coverlet of green satin, adorned with gold, embroidered in embossed work, was, in like manner, fastened to the sheets, the ends of which, turned in, were sewed down alternately. Two large pillows of crimson satin, covered with the like embroidery, in which there was no want of gold or sponges, rested on two cushions of the sofa, brought near to serve for a back, and intended to support our heads. The taking of the pillows entirely away would have been a good resource, if we had had any bolster; and the expedient of turning the other side upward having only served to show they were embroidered in the same manner on the bottom, we at last determined to lay our handkerchiefs over them, which, however, did not prevent our being very sensible of the embossed ornaments underneath."

Here we have (1.) many mattresses of quilted cotton: (2.) a sheet of Indian linen; (query, muslin, or the fine linen of Egypt?) (3.) a coverlet of green satin, embossed: (4.) two large pillows, embossed also: (5.) two cushions from the sofa, to form a back. So that we see an eastern bed may be an article of furniture sufficiently complicated.

This description, compared with a note of De La Motraye, (p. 172.) leads to the supposition, that somewhat like what we inform us is called MAKASS, i. e. a brocaded covering for show, is what the harlot boasts of, as being the upper covering to her minder, or orsak. "On a rich sofa," says he, "was a false covering of plain green silk, for the same reason as that in the hall; but I lifted it up, while the two eunuchs who were with us had their backs turned, and I found that the MAKASS of the minders was a very rich brocade, with a gold ground, and flowered with silk of several colours, and the cushions of green velvet also, gilded with gold, and flowered like them." Note. "The minders have two covers, one of which is called MAKASS, for ornament: and the other to preserve that, especially when they are rich, as these were." This was in the seraglio at Constantinople.

It is perfectly in character for the harlot, who (P. ix. 14) "sits on a kind of throne at her door," and who in this passage boasts of all her showy embellishments, to mention whatever is gaudy, even to the tinsel bedeckings of her room, her furniture, and her makasses, assuming nothing less than regal dignity in words and description: though her apartment be the way to hell; and the alcove containing her bed be the very lurking chamber of death.—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

Ver. 27. Her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death.

See on Is. 22. 16.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1. Wisdom hath built her house, she hath hewn out her seven pillars: 2. She hath killed her beasts; she hath mingled her wine; she hath also furnished her table: 3. She hath sent forth her maidens: she crieth upon the highest places of the city, 4. Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither: as for him that wanteth understanding, she saith to him, 5. Come, eat of my bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled.

Hasselquist takes notice of what appears to us an old custom in Egypt, which he supposes is very ancient, though he does not apply it to the illustration of any passage of scripture; it seems, however, to be referred to by Solomon in the book of Proverbs. He saw, he says, a number of women, who went about inviting people to a banquet, in a singular, and, without doubt, very ancient manner. They were about ten or twelve, covered with black veils, as is customary in that country. They were preceded by four eunuchs: after them, and on the side, were Moors with their usual walking staves. As they were walking, they all joined in making a noise, which he was told signified their joy, but which he could not find resembled a joyful or pleasing song. The sound was so singular, as that he found himself at a loss to give an idea of it to those that never heard it. It was shrill, but had a particular quavering, which they learnt by long practice. The passage in Proverbs, which seems to allude to this practice, is the beginning of the ninth chapter: "Wisdom hath killed her beasts; she hath mingled her wine; she hath also furnished her table; she hath sent forth her maidens: she crieth upon the highest places of the city, Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither: as for him that wanteth understanding, she saith to him, Come, eat of my bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled."

Here the reader observes, that the invitation is supposed to be made by more than one person; that they were of the female sex that were employed in the service; and that the invitation is supposed not to have been, as among us, a private message, but open to the notice of all. Whether it was with a singing tone of voice, as now in Egypt, does not, determinately at least, appear by the word here made use of, and which is translated crieth: She crieth, by her maidens, upon the highest places of the city. It may not be improper to add, that though the eastern people now eat out of the dishes oftentimes, which are brought in singly, and follow one another with great rapidity, not out of plates, yet many lesser appendages are placed round about the table by way of preparation, which seems to be what is meant by the expression, she also hath furnished her table, in one word, all things were then ready, and the more distant kinds of preparation had been followed by the nearer, till every thing was ready, so as that the repast might immediately begin. The cattle were killed, the jars of wine emptied into drinking vessels, and the little attendants on the great dishes placed on the table.—HARMER.

Ver. 14. For she sitteth at the door of her house, on a seat in the high places of the city.

The custom of sitting at their doors, in the most alluring pomp that comes within their reach, is still an eastern practice. "These women," says Pitts, speaking of the ladies of pleasure at Grand Cairo, "used to sit at the door, or walk in the streets unveiled. They are commonly very rich in their clothes, some having their shifts and drawers of silk, &c. These courtesans, or ladies of pleasure, as well as other women, have broad velvet caps on their heads, beautified with abundance of pearls, and other costly and gaudy ornaments, &c. These madams go along the streets smoking their pipes of four or five feet long; and when they sit at their doors, a man can scarce pass by but they will endeavour to decoy him in."—BURDER.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 11. The mouth of a righteous man is a well of life: but violence covereth the mouth of the wicked.

"The language of a holy man is like a well with good springs; thousands may be refreshed there." "The words of a bad man are like the springs of the sea; though very strong, they are not sweet." "Violence covereth the mouth of the wicked." To cover the mouth is the sign of sorrow; thus, they who act violently will sooner or later reap the fruits thereof. They will have to cover their mouth in token of sorrow for the past, and in anticipation of the future.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1. A false balance is abomination to the Lord: but a just weight is his delight.

Great severity has been frequently exercised in the punishment of those who were detected in the kind of fraud here referred to. "A police-officer observing one morning a female, not a native, carrying a large piece of cheese, inquired where she had purchased it; being ignorant of the vender's name, she conducted him to his shop, and the magistrate, suspecting the quantity to be deficient in weight, placed it in the scales, and found his suspicion verified: whereupon he straightway ordered his attendants to cut from the most fleshy part of the delinquent's person what would be equivalent to the just measure: the order was instantly executed, and the sufferer bled to death." (Joliffe.)—BURDER.

Ver. 21. Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished: but the seed of the righteous shall be delivered.

See on 2 Kings 10. 15

To join hands was anciently, and still continues in the East, a solemn method of taking an oath, and making an engagement. This circumstance is probably alluded to in these words of Solomon; its present existence is clearly ascertained by what Mr. Bruce (Trav. vol. i. p. 199) relates: "I was so enraged at the traitorous part which Hassan had acted, that, at parting, I could not help saying to Ibrahim—Now, shekh, I have done every thing you have desired, without ever expecting fee or reward; the only thing I now ask you, and it is probably the last, is, that you avenge me upon this Hassan, who is every day in your power. Upon this he gave me his hand, saying, he shall not die in his bed, or I shall never see old age."—BURDER.

The expression, though hand join in hand, may bear a slight correction, conformable both to the original Hebrew, and also to the custom actually prevailing in Syria. The original simply signifies, hand to hand. And this is the custom of persons in the East, when they greet each other, or strike hands, in token of friendship and agreement. They touch their right hands respectively; and then raise them up to their lips and forehead. This is the universal eastern courtesy; the English version, and the device grounded upon it, give the idea of hand clasped in hand, which is European, rather than oriental. The sense, therefore, is, Though hand meet hand—intimating that heart assents to heart in the perpetration of wickedness—yet shall not the wicked go unpunished.—JOWETT.

There is a remarkable passage (Proverbs xi. 21) thus rendered by our translators: "Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished; but the seed of the righteous shall be delivered." i. e. though they make many associations, and oaths, and join hands among themselves, (as formed part of the ceremony of swearing among these shepherds of Suakem,) yet they shall not be punished." But Michaelis proposes another sense of these words, "hand in hand"—my hand in your hand, i. e. as a token of swearing, "the wicked shall not go unpunished."—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

Ver. 22. As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman which is without discretion.

Nearly all the females of the East wear a jewel of gold in their nostrils, or in the septum of the nose; and some of them are exceedingly beautiful, and of great value. The oriental lady looks with as much pleasure on the gem which adorns her nose, as any of her sex in England do upon those which deck their ears. But as is that splendid jewel in the snout of a swine, so is beauty in a woman without discretion. She may have the ornament, her mien may be graceful, and her person attractive; but without the matchless jewel of virtue, she is like the swine with a gem in her nose, wallowing in the mire. "The most beautiful ornament of a woman is virtue," Tamul proverb.—ROBERTS.

This proverb is manifestly an allusion to the custom of wearing nose-jewels, or rings set with jewels, hanging from the nostrils, as ear-rings from the ears, by holes bored to receive them. This fashion, however strange it may appear to us, was formerly, and is still, common in many parts of the East, among women of all ranks. Paul Lucas, speaking of a village, or clan of wandering people, a little on this side of the Euphrates, says, "The women almost all of them travel on foot; I saw none handsome among them. They have almost all of them the nose bored, and wear in it a great ring, which makes them still more deformed." But in regard to this custom, better authority cannot be produced than that of Pietro della Valle, in the account which he gives of Signora Maani Gioerida, his own wife. The description of her dress, as to the ornamental parts of it, with which he introduces the mention of this particular, will give us some notion of the taste of the eastern ladies for finery. "The ornaments of gold, and of jewels, for the head, for the neck, for the arms, for the legs, and for the feet, (for they wear rings even on their toes,) are indeed, unlike those of the Turks, carried to great excess, but not of great value: as turquoises, small rubies, emeralds, carbuncles, garnets, pearls, and the like. My spouse dresses herself with all of them, according to their fashion, with exception however of certain ugly rings, of very large size, set with jewels, which, in truth very absurdly, it is the custom to wear fastened to one of their nostrils, like buffaloes; an ancient custom however in the East, which, as we find in the holy scriptures, prevailed among the Hebrew ladies, even in the time of Solomon. These nose-rings, in compliance to me, she has left off; but I have not yet been able to prevail with her cousin and her sisters to do the same. So fond are they of an old custom, be it ever so absurd, who have been long habituated to it." To this account may be subjoined the observation made by Chardin, as cited in Harmer: "It is the custom in almost all the East for the women to wear rings in their noses, in the left nostril, which is bored low down in the middle. These rings are of gold, and have commonly two pearls and one ruby between, placed in the ring. I never saw a girl or young woman in Arabia, or in all Persia, who did not wear a ring after this manner in her nostril."—BURDER.

Ver. 26. He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him: but blessing shall be upon the head of him that selleth it.

Mirza Ahady, in conjunction with the prince's mother was believed to have monopolized all the corn of the country; and he had no sooner reached Shiraz than he raised its price, which, of course, produced a correspondent advance in that of bread. Ventre affamé n'a point d'oreilles,—the people became outrageous in their misery. As is usual in all public calamities in the East, they commenced by shutting their shops in the bazar. They then resorted to the house of the sheikh-el-islam, the head of the law, requiring him to issue a fatwah, which might make it lawful to kill Mirza Ahady, and one or two more, whom they knew to be his coadjutors in oppressing them. They then appeared in a body before the gate of the prince's palace, where they expressed their grievances in a tumultuous way, and demanded that Mirza Ahady should be delivered up to them. Mohammed Zeky Khan, our former mehmandar, was sent out by the prince to appease them, accompanied by Mirza Bawker, the chief baker of the city, who was one of those whose life had been denounced. As soon as the latter appeared, he was overwhelmed with insults and reproaches: but he managed to pacify them, by saying, "What crime have I committed? Mirza Ahady is the man to abuse; if he sells corn at extravagant prices, bread must rise in consequence. In the meantime, Mirza Ahady had secreted himself from the fury of the mob; but being countenanced by the prince's mother, and, consequently, by the prince himself, he let the storm rage, and soled himself by making fresh plans for raising more money. The price of bread was lowered for a few days, until the commotion should cease; and, as it was necessary that some satisfaction should be given to the people, all the bakers of the town were collected together, and publicly bastinadoed on the soles of their feet." (Moricr.) "We are told of the fate of one person in whose house an immense quantity of grain was found: a stake was fixed in the centre of his granary, to which he was bound, and left to perish from hunger amidst that abundance which he had refused to share with his fellow-citizens." (Malcolm.)—BURDEA.

Ver. 29. He that troubleth his own house shall inherit the wind: and the fool shall be servant to the wise of heart.

This form of expression is still used in India. "I understand Kandan will give a large dowry with his daughter; she will, therefore, be a good bargain for your son."—"You are correct, my friend; she is to inherit the wind." "I once had extensive lands for my portion; but now I inherit the wind." "I know you would like to have hold of my property; but you may take the wind."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 10. A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast: but the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel.

"During my stay at Surat, I rode out most evenings with our worthy chief, and, among other uncommon sights to a stranger, I took notice that many trees had jars hanging to several of the boughs; on inquiring, I was told that they were filled with water every evening, by men hired on purpose by the Gentoos, in order to supply the birds with drink. This account excited a desire of visiting the banyan hospital, as I had heard much of their benevolence to all kinds of animals that were either sick, lame, or infirm, through age or accident. On my arrival, there were presented to my view many horses, cows, and oxen, in one apartment; in another, dogs, sheep, goats, and monkeys, with clean straw for them to repose on. Above-stairs were depositories for seeds of many sorts, and flat broad dishes for water, for the use of those birds and insects which might chance to come into the apartment through the windows, which were latticed, with apertures large enough to admit small birds to enter. I was told by the attendants, that each apartment was cleaned every morning, the beasts fed and littered once a day, the seeds above-stairs winnowed, the dishes washed, and clean water put in them daily." (Parson's Travels in Asia.) Thevenot describes a banyan hospital, where he saw a number of sick oxen, camels, and horses, and many invalids of the feathered race. "Animals deemed incurable," he says, "were maintained there for life; those that recovered were sold to Hindoos exclusively."—BURDEA.

Ver. 27. The slothful man roasteth not that which he took in hunting; but the substance of a diligent man is precious.

There is something particular in the word (רִיר) charak, used in this passage of Solomon; it is not the word that is commonly used for roasting, but it signifies rather singing, as appears from Dan. iii. 27. No author, I think, gives us an account what this should mean, understood in this sense. Besides wild-boars, antelopes, and hares, which are particularly mentioned by D'Arvieux, when he speaks of the Arabs as diverting themselves with hunting in the Holy Land, Dr. Shaw tells us, all kinds of game are found in great plenty in that country: but I do not remember an account of any thing being prepared for food by singing, that is taken either in hunting or hawking, except hares, which I have indeed somewhere read of as dressed, in the East, after this manner: a hole being dug in the ground, and the earth scooped out of it laid all round its edge, the brushwood with which it is filled is set on fire, the hare is thrown unskinned into the hole, and afterward covered with heated earth that was laid round about it, where it continues till it is thought to be done enough, and then being brought to table, sprinkled with salt, is found to be very agreeable food.—HAMER.

CHAPTER XV.

Ver. 17. Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox, and hatred therewith.

This passage is rendered by the Septuagint, as if they understood it of the forced accommodation of travellers, which Arabs and conquered people were obliged to submit to. It was not unusual for travellers to eat at the expense of those who were not pleased with entertaining them; and to use a kind of force, which produced hatred. Dr. Shaw notices this circumstance. Speaking of Barbary, he says, "In this country, the Arabs and other inhabitants are obliged, either by long custom, by the particular tenure of their lands, or from fear and compulsion, to give the Spahes, and their company, the Moquanah, as they call it, which is such a sufficient quantity of provisions, for ourselves, together with straw and barley for our mules and horses. Besides a bowl of milk, and a basket of figs, raisins, or dates, which, upon our arrival, were presented to us, to stay our appetites, the master of the tent where we lodged fetched us from his flock, according to the number of our company, a kid or a goat, a lamb or a sheep, half of which was immediately seethed by his wife, and served up with cuscasoo; the rest was made Kab-ab, i. e. cut into pieces, and roasted, which we reserved for our breakfast or dinner the next day." In the next page he says, "when we were entertained in a courteous manner, (for the Arabs will sometimes supply us with nothing till it is extorted by force,) the author used to give the master of the tent a knife, a couple of flints, or a small quantity of English gunpowder," &c. To prevent such parties from living at free charges upon them, the Arabs take care to pitch in woods, valleys, or places the least conspicuous, and that in consequence they found it difficult often to discover them.—BURDEA.

Ver. 19. The way of the slothful man is as a hedge of thorns: but the way of the righteous is made plain.

The oriental gardens were either open plantations, or enclosures defended by walls or hedges. Rawwolf found, about Tripoli, many gardens and vineyards enclosed: it is the most part with hedges, and separated by shady wa.zs. Some fences in the Holy Land, in later times, are not less beautiful than our living fences of white thorn, and perfectly answer the description of ancient Jewish prophets, who inform us, that the hedges in their times consisted of thorns, and that the spikes of these thorny plants were exceedingly sharp. Doublian found a very fruitful vineyard, full of olive-fig-trees, and vines, about eight miles southwest from Bethlehem, enclosed with a hedge; and that part of it adjoining to the road, strongly formed of thorns and rose-bushes, intermingled with pomegranate-trees: surpassing beauty and fragrance. A hedge composed of rose-bushes and wild pomegranate-shrubs, then in full flower, mingled with other thorny plants, adorned in the varied livery of spring, must have made at once a strong and beautiful fence. The wild pomegranate-tree, the species probably used in fencing, is much more prickly than the other variety; and when mingled with other thorny bushes, of which they have several kinds in Palestine, some whose prickles are very long and sharp, must form a hedge very difficult to penetrate. These facts illustrate the beauty and force of several passages in the sacred volume; thus, in the Proverbs of Solomon, "The way of the slothful man is as a hedge of thorns;" it is obstructed with difficulties, which the sloth and indolence of his temper represent as galling or insuperable; but which a moderate share of resolution and perseverance would easily remove or surmount.—PAXTON.

Hasselquist says, that he saw the plantain-tree, the vine, the peach, and the mulberry-tree, all four made use of in Egypt to hedge about a garden; now these are all unarmed plants. This consideration throws a great energy into the words of Solomon: The way of the slothful man is a hedge of thorns. It appears as difficult to him, not only as breaking through a hedge, but even through a thorn fence; and also into that threatening of God to Israel: Behold, I will hedge up the way with thorns, Hosea ii. 6.—BURDER.

CHAPTER XVI.

Ver. 11. A just weight and balance are the LORD'S; all the weights of the bag are his work.

The Jews were required to be exact in their weights and measures, that the poor might not be defrauded. Hesi-chius remarks upon this point, as a reason for such great care, that what the possession of a field or house is to a wealthy man, that the measure of corn, or wine, or the weight of bread, is to the poor, who have daily need of such things for the support of life. "The Jewish doctors assert, that it was a constitution of their wise men, for the preventing of all frauds in these matters, that no weights, balances, or measures, should be made of any metal, as of iron, lead, tin, (which were liable to rust, or might be bent, or easily impaired,) but of marble, stone, or glass, which were less subject to be abused: and therefore the scripture, speaking of the justice of God's judgments, observes, (according to the Vulgate,) that they are weighed with all the stones in the bag." (Lewis.)—BURDER.

Ver. 14. The wrath of a king is as messengers of death; but a wise man will pacify it.

Executions in the East are often very prompt and arbitrary. In many cases the suspicion is no sooner entertained, or the cause of offence given, than the fatal order is issued; the messenger of death hurries to the unsuspecting victim, shows his warrant, and executes his orders that instant in silence and solitude. Instances of this kind are continually occurring in the Turkish and Persian histories. "When the enemies of a great man among the Turks have gained influence enough over the prince to procure a warrant for his death, a capidgi (the name of the officer who executes these orders) is sent to him, who shows him the order he has received to carry back his head; the other takes the warrant of the grand seignior, kisses it, puts it on his head in token of respect, and then having performed his ablutions, and said his prayers, freely resigns his life. The capidgi having strangled him, cuts off his head, and brings it to Constantinople. The grand seignior's order is implicitly obeyed; the servants of the victim never attempt to hinder the executioner, although these capidgis come very often with few or no attendants." It appears from the writings of Chardin, that the nobility and grandees of Persia are put to death in a manner equally silent, hasty, and unobstructed. Such executions were not uncommon among the Jews under the government of their kings. Solomon sent Benaiah as his capidgi, or executioner, to put Adonijah, a prince of his own family, to death; and Joab, the commander-in-chief of the forces in the reign of his father. A capidgi likewise beheaded John the Baptist in the prison, and carried his head to the court of Herod. To such silent and hasty executions the royal preacher seems to refer in that proverb, "The wrath of a king is as messengers of death; but a wise man will pacify it;" his displeasure exposes the unhappy offender to immediate death, and may fill the unsuspecting bosom with terror and dismay, like the appearance of a capidgi; but by wise and prudent conduct, a man may sometimes escape the danger.

From the dreadful promptitude with which Benaiah executed the commands of Solomon on Adonijah and Joab, it may be concluded that the executioner of the court was as little ceremonious, and the ancient Jews nearly as passive, as the Turks or Persians. The prophet Elisha is the only person on the inspired record, who ventured to resist the bloody mandate of the sovereign; the incident is recorded in these terms: "But Elisha sat in his house, and the elders sat with him; and the king sent a man from before him; but ere the messenger came to him, he said to the elders, See how this son of a murderer has sent to take away my head? Look when the messenger cometh; shut the door, and hold him fast at the door—is not the sound of his master's feet behind him?" But if such mandates had not been too common among the Jews, and in general submitted to without resistance, Jehoram had scarcely ventured to despatch a single messenger to take away the life of so eminent a person as Elisha.—PAXTON.

Ver. 15. In the light of the king's countenance is life; and his favour is as a cloud of the latter rain.

Poets often speak of the generosity of the great, as the clouds full of rain, but the uncharitable are like the clouds without rain. "O the benevolent man! he is like the fruitful rain; ever giving, but never receiving."—ROBERTS.

The former and latter rains is a phrase quite familiar to every reader of the scriptures. The distinction which it announces is founded in nature, and is of great importance in those parts of the world. At Aleppo, the drought of summer commonly terminates in September, by some heavy showers, which occasionally continue some days; after which, there is an interval of fine weather, of between twenty and thirty days, when the showers return, which are called the second rains. The first rains fall between the twenty-sixth of September and the sixth of October; but it is later in Judea; the former rain, descending in Palestine about the beginning of November. The seasons in the East are exceedingly regular, yet it is not to be supposed that they admit of no variation; the descent of the first and second rain occasionally varies a whole month. But the first and second rains of Syria, mentioned by Russel, do not seem to correspond with the former and latter rains of the holy scriptures. This is the opinion of Jerome, who lived long in Palestine; nor do the natural historians of those countries take any notice of the first and second rains in autumn; but uniformly speak of the former and latter rains. It is therefore of some importance to inquire, what are the times of the year when these rains descend. Here it may be proper to observe, that rain in the vernal season, is represented by oriental writers as of great advantage. The more wet the spring, the later the harvest, and the more plentiful the crop. In Barbary, the vernal rains are indispensably requisite to secure the hopes of the husbandman. If the latter rains fall as usual in the middle of April, he reckons his crop secure; but extremely doubtful if they happen to fail. This accounts well for the great value which Solomon sets upon them: "In the light of the king's countenance is life, and his favour is as a cloud of the latter rain." To this may be added, that the words translated the former and latter rains, are not expressive of first and second; and by consequence, do not refer to the rains mentioned by Russel, but mark a distinction of much greater importance. They must therefore be the same as the vernal rains, which are universally allowed to be of the utmost consequence in those regions.

The time of the first rains is differently stated by modern travellers. According to Dr. Shaw, the first autumnal rains usually fall about the eleventh of November; from a manuscript journal of travels in those countries, Mr. Harmer found that the rain fell in the Holy Land on the second of November; and he was assured by the historian of the revolt of Ali Bey, who lived some years in Palestine that the rains begin to fall there about the eighteenth day of September; at first they descend in slight showers, but as the season advances, they become very copious and heavy, though never continual.

Dr. Shaw seems to suppose, that the Arabs of Barbary do not begin to break up their grounds till the first rains of autumn fall; while the author of the history of Ali Bey's revolt supposes that they sometimes plough their land before the descent of the rain, because the soil is then light, and easily worked. This statement contains nothing incredible; grain will remain long in the earth unhurt, and vegetate as soon as the descending showers communicate sufficient moisture. The oriental husbandman may cultivate his field, as is often done in other countries, in expectation of rain; a circumstance to which Solomon seems to refer: "He that observeth the wind shall not sow, and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap." If they never sowed in the East but when the soil was moistened with rain, they could have no reason to observe whether the wind threatened rain or promised fair weather; but if the seed was cast into the ground previous to the descent of the rain, they might naturally enough be induced to wait till they observed the signs of its approach. The rainy season in the beginning of winter, by the concurring testimony of travellers, is commonly introduced by a gale of wind from the northeast. In Syria, the winds are variable in November, and the two succeeding months; seldom strong, but more inclined to the north and east, than any of the other quarters. They continue to blow nearly in the same direction, till about the end of February, when they begin to blow hard westerly. The weather in April is in general fair and clear; seldom dark or cloudy, except when it rains, which it does in hard thundershowers, as in the last month, but not so often. When light northerly or easterly breezes happen to blow, they have commonly a few close, hazy days; but the westerly winds are generally fresh.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 12. Let a bear, robbed of her whelps, meet a man, rather than a fool in his folly.

The furious passions of the female bear never mount so high, nor burn so fiercely, as when she happens to be deprived of her young. When she returns to her den, and misses the objects of her love and care, she becomes almost frantic with rage. Disregarding every consideration of danger to herself, she attacks, with intense ferocity, every animal that comes in her way, "and in the bitterness of her heart, will dare to attack even a band of armed men." The Russians of Kamschatka never venture to fire on a young bear when the mother is near; for if the cub drop, she becomes enraged to a degree little short of madness; and if she get sight of the enemy, will only quit her revenge with her life. "A more desperate attempt, therefore, can scarcely be performed, than to carry off her young in her absence. The moment she returns, and misses them, her passions are inflamed; her scent enables her to track the plunderer; and unless he has reached some place of safety before the infuriated animal overtake him, his only safety is in dropping one of the cubs, and continuing to flee; for the mother, attentive to its safety, carries it home to her den, before she renews the pursuit."

These statements furnish an admirable illustration of a passage in the counsel of Hushai to Absalom, in which he represents the danger of attacking David and his followers with so small a force as twelve thousand chosen men, when their tried courage was inflamed, and their spirits were embittered by the variety and severity of their sufferings, and when their caution, matured by long and extensive experience in the art of war, and sharpened by the novelty and peril of their circumstances, would certainly lead them to anticipate, and take measures to defeat the attempt. "Hushai said unto Absalom, The counsel that Ahithophel hath given, is not good at this time; for (said Hushai) thou knowest thy father and his men, that they be mighty men, and they be chafed in their minds as a bear robbed of her whelps in the field." The frantic rage of the female bear, when she has lost her young, gives wonderful energy to the proverb of Solomon: "Let a bear, robbed of her whelps, meet a man, rather than a fool in his folly." Dreadful as it is to meet a bear in such circumstances, it is yet more dangerous to meet a "fool in his folly," a furious and revengeful man, under the influence of his impetuous passions, and his heart determined on their immediate gratification. Naturally stubborn and cruel as the bear, and equally devoted to his lusts as she is to her young, he pursues them with equal fury and eagerness. It is possible to escape the vengeance of a bereaved bear, by surrendering part of the litter, and diverting part of her pursuit; but no consideration of interest or duty, no partial gratifications, can arrest his furious career, or divert his attention. Reason, degraded and enslaved, lends all her remaining wisdom and energy to passion, and renders the fool more cruel and mischievous than the bear, in proportion as she is superior to instinct.—PAXTON.

Ver. 18. A man void of understanding striketh hands, and becometh surety in the presence of his friend.

See on ch. 6. 1.

The Hindoo proverbs say, "Munidār muneruka-kadūār," i. e. "He who stands before may have to pay." This, therefore, is the idea of a surety; he stands before the debtor, and covenants with the creditor for the payment of the money: he, therefore, who stands before, is literally betwixt the contending parties. In this respect "was Jesus made a surety" for us; he stood before, and became our peccator, or Mediator.

The melancholy instances of ruin, in consequence of becoming surety for others, are exceedingly numerous in the East. Against this they have many proverbs, and fearful examples; but nothing seems to give them wisdom. Nearly all the government monopolies, both among native and European rulers, are let to the highest bidders: thus, the privilege of searching for precious stones in certain districts, of taking up the chiar root, salt rents, fishing for chanks, or pearls, is confined to those who pay a fixed sum to government. As the whole of the money cannot be advanced till a part of the produce shall be sold, sureties have to be accountable for the amount. But as such speculations are generally entered into, in order to better a reduced fortune, an extravagant price is often paid, and ruin is the consequence, both to the principal and his surety. This practice of suretyship, however, is also common in the most trifling affairs of life: "Parrellutha-venum, i. e. Sign your name," is asked for every petty agreement. In every legal court or magistrate's office may be seen, now and then, a trio entering, thus to become responsible for the engagements of another. The cause of all this suretyship is probably the bad faith which so commonly prevails among the heathen.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 19. He that exalteth his gate seeketh destruction.

The general style of buildings in the East, seems to have continued from the remotest ages down to the present times, without alteration or any attempt at improvement. Large doors, spacious chambers, marble pavements, cloistered courts, with fountains sometimes playing in the midst, are certainly conveniences well adapted to the circumstances of these hotter climates. All the windows of their dwellings, if we except a small latticed window or balcony which sometimes looks into the street, open into their respective courts or quadrangles; an arrangement probably dictated by the jealousy which unceasingly disturbs the repose of an oriental householder. It is only during the celebration of some public festival, that these houses, and their latticed windows, or balconies, are left open. The streets of an oriental city, the better to shade the inhabitants from the sun, are commonly narrow, with sometimes a range of shops on each side. People of the same trade occupy the same street. Both in Persia and in Turkey the trades are carried on in separate bazars, in which their shops are extended adjacent to each other on both sides of the building. The remark equally applies to Damascus and other cities in the Lesser Asia. The entrance from the streets into one of the principal houses, is through a porch or gateway, with benches on each side, where the master of the family receives visits, and despatches business; few persons, not even the nearest relations, having further admission, except upon extraordinary occasions. The door of the porch by which a person enters the court, is very small; sometimes not above three feet high. The design of such low and inconvenient doors is, to prevent the Arabs from rai-

into the houses to plunder them; for these freebooters, who are almost centaurs, seldom think of dismounting in their excursions; and therefore the peaceable inhabitants find such small entrances the easiest and most effectual way of preventing their violence. To this singular practice the royal preacher may be supposed to refer: "He that exalteth his gate, seeketh destruction." It can hardly be supposed that Solomon mentioned the loftiness of the gate, rather than other circumstances of magnificence in a building, as the wideness of the house, the airiness of the rooms, the cedar ceilings, and the vermilion paintings, which the prophet Jeremiah specifies as pieces of grandeur, without some particular meaning. But if bands of Arabs had taken the advantage of large doors to enter into houses in his territories, or in the surrounding kingdoms, the apothegm possesses a singular propriety and force. We have the more reason to believe that Solomon had his eye on the insolence of the Arabs in riding into the houses of those they meant to plunder, because the practice seems not to have been unusual in other countries; and is not now peculiar to those plunderers. The Armenian merchants at Julfa, the suburb of Ispahan, in which they reside, find it necessary to make the front door of their houses in general small, partly to hinder the Persians, who treat them with great rigour and insolence, from entering them on horseback, and partly to prevent them from observing the magnificent furniture within. But the habitation of a man in power is known by his gate, which is generally elevated in proportion to the vanity of its owner. A lofty gate is one of the insignia of royalty; and it must have been the same in ancient times. The gates of Jerusalem, of Zion, and other places, are often mentioned in the scripture with the same notions of grandeur annexed to them: thus the Psalmist addresses the gates of Zion: "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; even lift them up, ye everlasting doors: and the king of glory shall come in."—PAXTON.

The Arabs are accustomed to ride into the houses of those they design to harass. To prevent this, Thevenot tells us that the door of the house in which the French merchants lived at Rama was not three feet high, and that all the doors of that town are equally low. Agreeably to this account, the Abbé Mariti, speaking of his admission into a monastery near Jerusalem, says, "the passage is so low that it will scarcely admit a horse; and it is shut by a gate of iron, strongly secured in the inside. As soon as we entered, it was again made fast with various bolts and bars of iron: a precaution extremely necessary in a desert place, exposed to the incursions and insolent attacks of the Arabs." To exalt the gate, would consequently be to court destruction.—BURDER.

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 10. The name of the LORD is a strong tower; the righteous runneth into it, and is safe.

Men of wealth are called towers. Thus, when such a person dies, it is said, "The pellata-koburam, i. e. strong tower, has fallen." "I am going to my koburam," says the man who is going to his powerful friend.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 16. A man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men.

See on 1 Sam. 9. 7.

Ver. 18. The lot causeth contentions to cease and parteth between the mighty.

In nearly all cases where reason cannot decide, or where the right of several claimants to one article has to be settled, recourse is had to the lot, which "causeth contentions to cease." Though an Englishman might not like to have a wife assigned to him in such a way, yet many a one in the East has no other guide in that important acquisition.

Perhaps a young man is either so accomplished, or so respectable, or so rich, that many fathers aspire to the honour of calling him son-in-law. Their daughters are said to be beautiful, wealthy, and of a good family: what is he to do? The name of each young lady is written on a separate piece of olah; and then all are mixed together. The youth an? his friends then go to the front of the temple; and being seated, a person who is passing by at the time is called, and requested to take one of the pieces of olah, on which a lady's name is inscribed, and place it near the anxious candidate. This being done, it is opened, and she whose name is written there, becomes his wife!

Are two men inclined to marry two sisters, a dispute often arises as to whom the YOUNGEST shall be given. To cause the "contentions to cease," recourse is again had to the lot. The names of the sisters and the disputants are written on separate pieces of olah, and taken to a sacred place: those of the men being put on one side, and the females on the other. A person then, who is unacquainted with the matter, takes a piece of olah from each side, and the couple whose names are thus joined together become man and wife. But sometimes a wealthy father cannot decide betwixt two young men who are candidates for the hand of his daughter: "what can he do? he must settle his doubts by lot." Not long ago, the son of a medical man, and another youth, applied for the daughter of Sedambara-Suppiyan, the rich merchant. The old gentleman caused two "holy writings" to be drawn up, the names of the lovers were inscribed thereon: the son of Kandan, the doctor, was drawn forth, and the young lady became his wife. Three Bramins, also, who were brothers, each ardently desired the hand of one female; and, after many disputes, it was settled by lot, which "causeth contentions to cease;" and the youngest of the three gained the prize.

But medical men are also sometimes selected in the same way. One person tells the afflicted individual such a doctor has far more skill than the rest: another says, "He! what is he but a cow-doctor? how many has he killed! Send for such a person, he will soon cure you." A third says, "I know the man for you; he had his knowledge from the gods; send for him." The poor patient at last says, "Select me one by lot;" and as is the name, so is the doctor. But another thing has to be settled; the medical gentleman intimates that there are two kinds of medicine which appear to him to be equally good, and therefore the lot is again to decide which is best. "The lot causeth contentions to cease."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 19. A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city; and their contentions are like the bars of a castle.

See on Acts 12. 10.

CHAPTER XIX.

Ver. 12. The king's wrath is as the roaring of a lion: but his favour is as dew upon the grass.

"The favour of my friend is as the refreshing dew." "The favours of that good man are continually dropping upon us." "He bathes me with his favours."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 13. The contentions of a wife are a continual dropping.

See on ch. 21. 9.

The allusion in this passage is generally thought to be to an old and decayed house, through which the rain continually drops, rendering it highly disagreeable to inhabit. Durell supposes that the allusion is to the "dropping of the eaves of a house, or any continued great falling of water, than which nothing is more apt to be tiresome and distracting." Mr. Harmer thinks that it refers to the arbours made of the boughs of trees upon the house-tops, in which the inhabitants of those sultry regions were accustomed to sleep in summer. "Egmont and Heyman tell us that at Caipha, at the foot of Mount Carmel, the houses are small and flat-roofed, where, during the summer, the inhabitants sleep in arbours made of the boughs of trees." Again, "Dr. Pococke tells us, in like manner, that when he was at Tiberias, in Galilee, he was entertained by the sheik's steward, and that they supped upon the top of the house for coolness, according to their custom, and lodged there likewise in a sort of closet, about eight feet square, of a wicker-work, plastered round towards the bottom, but without any door." "However pleasant," says Mr. Harmer, "these arbours and these wicker-work closets may be in the dry part of the year, they must be very disagreeable in the wet and they that should then lodge in them would be exposed to a continual dropping. To such circumstances probably it is that Solomon alludes, when he says, 'It is better to dwell in the corner of the house-top, than with a brawling woman in a wide house.' A corner covered with boughs or rushes, and made into a little arbour, in which they used to sleep in summer, but which must have been a very inaccommodious place to have made an entire dwelling. To the same allusion belong those other expressions that speak of the contentions of a wife being like a continual dropping. Put together they amount to this, that it is better to have no other habitation than an arbour on the house-top, and be there exposed to the wet of winter, which is oftentimes of several days' continuance, than to dwell in a wide house with a brawling woman, for her contentions are a continual dropping, and, wide as the house may be, you will not be able to avoid them or get out of their reach.—BUSB.

Ver. 24. A slothful man hideth his hand in his bosom, and will not so much as bring it to his mouth again.

Many of the Arabs, and other eastern people, use no spoon in eating their victuals; they dip their hands into the milk, which is placed before them in a wooden bowl, and lift it to their mouth in their palm. Le Bruin observed five or six Arabs eating milk together, on the side of the Nile, as he was going up that river to Cairo; and D'Arvieux says they eat their pottage in the same way. Is it not reasonable to suppose, says Harmer, that the same usage obtained anciently among the Jews; and that Solomon refers to it when he says, "A slothful man hides his hand in the dish, and will not so much as bring it to his mouth again?" Our translators render it the bosom; but the word every where signifies a pot or dish. The meaning, therefore, according to Harmer, is, "the slothful man having lifted up his hand full of milk or pottage to his mouth, will not do it a second time; no, though it be actually dipped into the milk or pottage, he will not submit to the fatigue of lifting it again from thence to his mouth." But as it is rather a caricature to represent the sluggard as so excessively indolent or lazy, that he will rather let his hand lie in the dish among the milk or pottage, than lift it to his mouth a second time, the explanation of Dr. Russel is to be preferred: "The Arabs, in eating, do not thrust their whole hand into the dish, but only their thumb and two first fingers, with which they take up the morsel, and that in a moderate quantity at a time. I take, therefore, the sense to be, that the slothful man, instead of taking up a moderate mouthful, thrusts his hand into the pillow, or such like, and takes a handful at a time, in order to avoid the trouble of returning frequently to the dish." According to this view, the slothful man endeavours by one effort to save himself the trouble of continued exertion. It seems to have been adopted by the Arabs, as much for the sake of despatch as from necessity; for D'Arvieux says, a man would eat upon very unequal terms with a spoon, among those that, instead of them, use the palms of their hands. This mode of drinking was used by three hundred men of Gideon's army; "And the number of them that lapped, putting their hands to their mouth, were three hundred men; but all the rest of the people bowed down upon their knees to drink water." Three hundred men, immediately on their coming to the water, drank of it in the quickest manner they could, by lifting it in their palms, and lepping it like a dog, that they might be ready, without delay, to follow their leader to the battle: the rest took up water in pitchers, or some kind of vessel, and bending down upon their heels and knees, or with their knees placed upright before them, either of which might be called bowing their knees to drink, they banded these drinking-vessels slowly from one to another, as at an ordinary meal; an act which procured their dismissal. The Hotient manner of drinking water from a pool, or stream, seems exactly to coincide with the mode adopted by the three hundred, and gives a very clear idea of it: They throw it up with their right hand into their mouth, seldom bringing the hand nearer than the distance of a foot from the mouth, and so quickly, that however thirsty, they are soon satisfied. Mr. Campbell, who had an opportunity of seeing this operation, when travelling among that people, frequently tried to imitate it, but without success.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 4. The sluggard will not plough by reason of the cold; therefore shall he beg in harvest, and have nothing.

Margin, winter. "They begin to plough about the latter end of September, and sow their earliest wheat about the middle of October. The frosts are never severe enough to prevent their ploughing all the winter."—BONDA.

Ver. 10. Divers weights, and divers measures, both of them are alike abomination to the Lord.

Here we have a true view of the way in which nearly all travelling merchants deal with their customers. See that Mohammedan pedler with his BAGS over his shoulder: the one contains his merchandise, the other his DECEITFUL WEIGHTS. He comes to your door, throws his bags on the ground, and is willing either to buy or to sell. Have you any old silver, gold, jewels, precious stones, iron, or lead, he is ready to be your customer; but he only buys with his own weights, which are much heavier than the standard. Should you, however, require to purchase any articles, then he has other weights by which he SELLS; and you may often see him fumbling for a considerable time in the BAG before he can find those which are less in weight than the regular standard.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 20. The glory of young men is their strength, and the beauty of old men is the gray head.

Should a youth despise the advice of a gray-headed man, the latter will point to his hairs. When young men presume to give advice to the aged, they say, "Look at our gray hairs." Do old people commit things unworthy of their years, the young ask, "Why have you these gray hairs?" intimating they ought to be the emblem of wisdom.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver. 1. The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water; he turneth it whithersoever he will.

See on Ps. 1. 3.

Ver. 4. A high look, and a proud heart, and the ploughing of the wicked, is sin.

The margin has, instead of ploughing, light: "The light of the wicked." The Tamul translation has, the lamp of the wicked. In eastern language, as well as in the scriptures, the word lamp is often used to denote the life of man: but in this passage it means the prosperity of the wicked. "Look at Valen, how brightly does his lamp burn in these days!"—"Yes, his lamp has now a thousand faces." Thus the haughty eyes, the proud hearts, and the prosperity of the wicked, were alike sinful before God. The lamp (i. e. prosperity) of the wicked is sin.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 8. The way of man is froward and strange: but as for the pure, his work is right.

This passage, according to the common interpretation, is very obscure. The original Hebrew words are used to signify a man laden with guilt and crimes, and that his way is (not froward and strange, as in our translation, but) unsteady, or continually varying; in which expression there is a most beautiful allusion to a beast which is so overburdened that he cannot keep in the straight road, but is continually tottering and staggering, first to the right hand, and then to the left.—PARKINSON.

Ver. 9. It is better to dwell in a corner of the house-top, than with a brawling woman in a wide house.

See on ch. 19. 13.

How pleasant soever the arbour, or wicker-closet, upon the roof, may be during the burning heats of summer, it must be very disagreeable in the rainy season. They who lodge in either at that time, must be exposed continually to the storm beating in upon them from every quarter. In allusion, perhaps, to this uncomfortable situation, Solomon observes: "It is better to dwell in a corner of the house-top, than in a corner with a brawling woman in a wide house;" in a corner formed with boughs or rushes into a little arbour, which, although cool and pleasant in the dry and sultry months of summer, is a cold and cheerless lodge when the earth is drenched with rain, or covered with snow. The royal preacher, in another proverb, compares the contentions of a wife to the continual dropping of an arbour, placed upon the house-top, in the rainy season, than which it is not easy to conceive any thing more disagreeable: "The contentions of a wife are a continual dropping;" an incessant and unavoidable cause of uneasiness or vexation. Instructed probably by his own feelings, harassed and goaded, as was meet, by the daily quarrels of his seraglio, he returns in a succeeding apothegm to the subject: "A continual dropping in a very rainy day, and a contentious woman, are alike." It appears from these proverbs, that the booths were generally constructed in the corner, where two walls met, for greater safety; for, on the middle of the roof, they had been too much exposed to the storm. This is confirmed by Dr. Russel, who remarks, in a manuscript note, that these booths in Syria are often placed near the walls; so minutely correct are even the most incidental observations of the inspired writers.—PAXTON.

The termagants of the East are certainly not inferior to those of their own sex in any part of the world: in some respects, the females are perhaps more timid and retired than those of Europe; but let them once go beyond the prescribed bounds, and let their powers be brought fairly into action, and they are complete furies. Has any one caused a woman's child to cry, does a neighbour intimate that she is not what she ought to be, or that some of her friends are no better than they should be, the whoop is immediately sounded, and the brawl begins. She commences her abuse in her best and highest tone of voice: vociferates all the scandal she can think of, and all she can invent. Sometimes she runs up to her antagonist, as if about to knock her down: again she retires, apparently to go home; but, no! she thinks of something more which ought not to be lost, and again returns to the contest. At intervals (merely to vary the scene) she throws up dust in the air, and curses her opponent, her husband, and her children. Should the poor woman not have been blessed with a progeny, that will not be overlooked, and a thousand highly provoking and indecent allusions will be made. See her fiery eyes, her dishevelled hair, her uplifted hand, and she is more like a fury from another region, than a human being.

An eastern sage says, "Should one woman scold, the whole earth will shake; should two commence, the sign Pisces will fall; if three join in the brawl, the sea will dry up; but if four try their powers, what will become of the world?" In the Scanda Purana it is said, "It is better for any one to fall into hell, than to perform the duties of a householder with a woman who will not respect her husband's word. Is there any other disease, any other Yamâ, than spending life with such a woman?"

One of their philosophers describes some of the defects in young females which ought to deter any man from marrying them. "Those who love to be at the house of other people, who are great sleepers, who love dancing and other sports, who are wounded by the arrows of Cama, (Cupid,) who love before their fathers betroth them, who have voices like thunder, who have tender, or rolling, or cat eyes, who have coarse hair, who are older than yourself, who are full of smiles, who are very athletic, who are caught in the hell of useless and strange religions, who despise the gooroo, and call the gods' statues; have nothing to do with them." Solomon says, in another place, "The contentions of a wife are a continual dropping;" and the Tamil proverb has it, "She is like the thunder of the rain, and is ever dropping."

—ROBERTS.

This expression the LXX render ἐν οἴκῳ κοινῷ, The Vulgate, "in domo communi," in a common house; that is, in a house common or shared out to several families. Dr. Shaw says, that "the general method of building, both in Barbary and the Levant, seems to have continued the same from the earliest ages down to this time, without the least alteration or improvement; large doors, spacious chambers, &c. The court is for the most part surrounded with a cloister, over which, when the house has one or more stories, there is a gallery erected. From the cloisters or galleries we are conducted into large spacious chambers of the same length with the court, but seldom or never communicating with one another. One of them frequently serves a whole family; particularly when a father indulges his married children to live with him; or when several persons join in the rent of the same house."—BURGER.

CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 13. The slothful man saith, There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets.

The sluggard is fond of sleep; and, to excuse his slothfulness, he makes use of the pretence, when he is to go out of his house in the morning dawn, and to follow his business, that he might fall a prey to one of the wild beasts which prowls about during the night. When it becomes dark, the people of the East shut themselves up in their houses for fear of the wild beasts. Thus Alvarez, in his account of Ethiopia, says, that "in Abyssinia, as soon as night sets in, nobody is to be seen abroad for fear of wild beasts, of which the country is full."—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 14. The mouth of strange women is a deep pit: he that is abhorred of the Lord shall fall therein.

Maudrell, describing the passage out of the jurisdiction of the Bashaw of Aleppo into that of him of Tripoli, tells us, the road was rocky and uneven, but attended with variety. "Sometimes it led us under the cool shade of thick trees: sometimes through narrow valleys, watered with fresh murmuring torrents: and then for a good while together upon the brink of a precipice. And in all places it treated us with the prospect of plants and flowers of divers kinds; as myrtles, oleanders, cyclamens, &c. Having spent about two hours in this manner, we descended into a low valley; at the bottom of which is a fissure into the earth, of a great depth; but withal so narrow, that it is not discernible to the eye till you arrive just upon it, though to the ear a notice of it is given at a great distance, by reason of the noise of a stream running down into it from the hills. We could not guess it to be less than thirty yards deep. But it is so narrow, that a small arch, not four yards over, lands you on its other side. They call it the sheik's wife; a name given to it from a woman of that quality, who fell into it, and, I need not add, perished." May not Solomon refer to some such dangerous place as this, when he says, "The mouth of a strange woman is a deep pit: he that is abhorred of the Lord shall fall therein," Prov. xvii. 14; and, "A whore is a deep ditch; and a strange woman is a narrow pit," Prov. xxiii. 27. The flowery pleasures of the place, where this fatal pit was, make the allusion still more striking. How agreeable to sense the path that led to this chamber of death!—HARMER.

Ver. 26. Be not thou one of them that strike hands, or of them that are sureties for debts.

See on ch. 6. 1.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Ver. 3. Be not desirous of his dainties; for they are deceitful meat.

See on Gen. 27. 4.

Ver. 5. Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not? for riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away, as an eagle towards heaven.

A husband who complains of the extravagance of his family, says, "How is it that wings grow on all my property? not many days ago I purchased a large quantity of pad-dy, but it has taken the wing and flown away. The next time I buy any thing, I will look well after the wings." "You ask me to give you money, and I would, if I possessed any."—"Possessed any! why! have wings grown on your silver and gold?" "Alas! alas! I no sooner get things into the house, than wings grow on hem, and they fly away. Last week I began to clip wings; but they have soon grown again."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 6. Eat thou not the bread of him that hath an evil eye, neither desire thou his dainty meats: 7. For as he thinketh in his heart, so is he: Eat and drink, saith he to thee; but his heart is not with thee. 8. The morsel which thou hast eaten shalt thou vomit up, and lose thy sweet words.

Whether the same ideas are to be attached to the expression "evil eye," as used by Solomon, and as understood by the Egyptians, may not be easily ascertained, though perhaps worthy of consideration. Pococke says of the Egyptians, that "they have a great notion of the magic art, have books about it, and think there is much virtue in talismans and charms; but particularly are strongly possessed with an opinion of the evil eye. When a child is commended, except you give it some blessing, if they are not very well assured of your good will, they use charms against the evil eye; and particularly when they think any ill success attends them on account of an evil eye, they throw salt into the fire."—BUENA.

Many references are made in the scriptures to an evil eye. Sometimes they mean anger or envy; but in the passage cited an allusion appears to be made to the malignant influence of an evil eye: "The morsel which thou hast eaten shalt thou vomit up." The kan-nuru, evil-eye, of some people is believed to have a most baneful effect upon whatsoever it shall be fixed. Those who are reputed to have such eyes are always avoided, and none but near relations will invite them to a feast. "Your cattle, your wives, your children, your orchards, your fields, are all in danger from that fellow's eyes. The other day he passed my garden, cast his eye upon my lime-tree, and the fruit has since fallen to the ground. Ay, and worse than that, he caught a look at my child's face, and a large abscess has since appeared."

To prevent such eyes from doing any injury to their children, many parents (both Mohammedan and Hindoo) adorn them with numerous jewels and jackets of varied colours, to attract the eye from the person to the ornaments.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 20. Be not among wine-bibbers; among riotous eaters of flesh.

The Arabs are described by Shaw, as very abstemious. They rarely diminish their flocks by using them for food, but live chiefly upon bread, milk, butter, dates, or what they receive in exchange for their wool. Their frugality is in many instances the effect of narrow circumstances; and shows with what propriety Solomon describes an expensive way of living by their frequent eating of flesh.—BURDER.

Ver. 27. For a whore is a deep ditch; and a strange woman is a narrow pit.

See on ch. 22. 14.

Ver. 30. They that tarry long at the wine, they that go to seek mixed wine.

Dandini informs us that it was the practice of tipplers not merely to tarry long over the bottle, but over the wine cask. "The goodness of the wine of Candia renders the Candiots great drinkers, and it often happens, that two or three great drinkers will sit down together at the foot of a cask, from whence they will not depart till they have emptied it." See also Isaiah v. 11.—BURDER.

Ver. 31. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup, when it moveth it elf aright.

Red wines were most esteemed in the East. So much was the red colour admired, that when it was too white they gave it a deeper tinge by mixing it with saffron or Brazil wood. By extracting the colouring matter of such ingredients, the wine may be said to make itself redder; a circumstance which, in Mr. Harmer's opinion, Solomon means to express in that proverb, "Look not on the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright." The verb is in the Hebrew Middle Voice, or Hithpael conjugation, which denotes an action that turns upon the agent itself, and in this instance imparts great energy to the warning.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Ver. 11. If thou forbear to deliver them that are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain.

It was allowed among the Jews, that if any person could offer any thing in favour of a prisoner after sentence was passed, he might be heard before execution was done: and therefore it was usual, as the Mishna shows, that when a man was led to execution, a crier went before him and proclaimed, "This man is now going to be executed for such a crime, and such and such are witnesses against him; whoever knows him to be innocent, let him come forth, and make it appear."—DODDIDGE.

Ver. 26. Every man shall kiss his lips that giveth a right answer.

The rescripts of authority used to be kissed whether they were believed to be just or not; and the letters of people of figure were treated in this manner; but it is possible these words may refer to another custom, which D'Arvieux gives an account of in his description of the Arabs of Mount Carmel, who, when they present any petition to their emir for a favour, offer their billets to him with their right hands, after having first kissed the papers. The Hebrew manner of expression is short; every lip shall kiss, one maketh to return a right answer, that is, every one shall be ready to present the state of his case, kissing it as he delivers it, when there is a judge whose decisions are celebrated for being equitable.—HARMER.

Ver. 31. And lo, it was all grown over with thorns; and nettles had covered the face thereof, and the stone wall thereof was broken down.

Stone walls were frequently used for the preservation of vineyards, as well as living fences. Van Egmont and Heyman, describing the country about Saphet, a celebrated city of Galilee, tell us, "the country round it is finely improved, the declivity being covered with vines supported by low walls."—HARMER.

CHAPTER XXV.

Ver. 7. For better it is that it be said unto thee, Come up hither, than that thou shouldst be put lower in the presence of the prince whom thine eyes have seen.

In an eastern feast or ceremony, nothing can exceed the particularity which is observed in reference to the rank and consequent precedence of the guests. Excepting where kings or members of the royal family are present, the floor and seats are always of an equal height; but the upper part of a room is most respectable, and there the most dignified individual will be placed. Should, however, an inferior presume to occupy that situation, he will soon be told to go to a lower station. There are also rooms assigned to different guests, in reference to their rank or caste, and none but their peers can remain in the place. I was once present at the marriage feast of a person of high caste; the ceremonies were finished, and the festivities had commenced; but just before the supper was announced, it was discovered that one of the guests was not quite equal in rank to those in the same apartment. A hint was therefore given to him, but he refused to leave the place: the host was then called; but, as the guest was scarcely a grade lower than the rest, he felt unwilling to put him out. The remainder, therefore, consisting of the first men in the town, immediately arose and left the house.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 11. A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver.

Some suppose this alludes to fruit served up in filigree-work: but I believe it does not refer to real fruit, but to representations and ornaments in solid gold. The Vulgate has, instead of pictures, "in lectis argenteis," "in silver beds." The Tamil translation has, in place of pictures of silver, velle-tattam, i. e. salvers or trays of silver. The Rev. T. H. Horne, "Apples of gold in net-work of silver." In the 6th and 7th verses, directions are given as to the way a person ought to conduct himself in the presence of a king: and words fitly spoken are compared, in their effect on the mind, to apples of gold, in salvers of silver, when presented as tributes or presents to the mighty. When eastern princes visit each other, or when men of rank have to go into their presence, they often send silver trays, on which are gold ornaments, as presents to the king, to propitiate him in their favour. Thus, when the governor-general, and the native sovereigns, visit each other, it is said, they distributed so many TRAYS of jewels, or other articles of great value. Golden ornaments, whether in the shape of fruit or any other thing, when placed on highly-polished silver salvers, or in net-work of the same metal, have a very beautiful appearance to the eye, and are highly acceptable and gratifying to him who receives them. As, then, apples or jewels of gold are in "salvers," or "beds," or "net-work" of silver, to the feelings of the receiver, so are words fitly spoken, when addressed to the mind of him who is prepared to receive them. To confirm this explanation, the next verse is very apposite: "As an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, so is a wise reproof upon an obedient ear." The effect, then, of a wise reproof on an obedient ear, is equal to that produced by the presents of ear-rings of gold, or ornaments of fine gold.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 13. As the cold of snow in the time of harvest, so is a faithful messenger to them that send him; for he refresheth the soul of his masters.

The custom of cooling wines with snow, was usual among the eastern nations, and was derived from the Asiatics and Greeks to the Romans. The snow of Lebanon was celebrated, in the time of D'Vitriaco, for its refrigerating power in tempering their wine: "All summer, and especially in the sultry dog-days, and the month of August, snow of an extreme cold nature, is carried from Mount Libanus, two or three days' journey, that, being mixed with wine, it may make it cold as ice. The snow is kept from melting by the heat of the sun, or the warmth of the air, by being covered up with straw." To this custom, the wise man seems to allude in that proverb: "As the cold of snow in the time of harvest; so is a faithful servant to them that send him, for he refreshes the soul of his masters." The royal preacher could not speak of a fall of snow in the time of harvest, as pleasant and refreshing; it must, on the contrary, have been very incommode, as we actually find it in this country; he must therefore be understood to mean liquids cooled by snow. The sense then will be: As the mixing of snow with wine, in the sultry time of harvest, is pleasing and refreshing; so a successful messenger revives the spirit of his master who sent him, and who was greatly depressed from an apprehension of his failure.—PALTON.

Ver. 14. Whoso boasteth himself of a false gift, is like clouds and wind without rain.

See on 2 Kings 3. 16, 17.

Ver. 17. Withdraw thy foot from thy neighbour's house, lest he be weary of thee, and so hate thee.

"The premises are in grief through him who so often visits them."—TAMUL Proverb. "The man, who though lost in the dark, and yet refuses to go to the house of him who will not treat him with respect, is worth ten millions of pieces of gold."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 19. Confidence in an unfaithful man in time of trouble, is like a broken tooth, and a foot out of joint.

The eastern saying, "To put confidence in an unfaithful man, is like trying to cross a river on a horse made of clay," is quoted for the same purpose.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 23. The north wind driveth away rain; so doth an angry countenance a backbiting tongue.

Our translators were at a loss how to render Prov. xxv. 23: they could not tell whether Solomon spoke of the north wind as driving away rain, or bringing it forth, and therefore put one sense in the text, and the other in the margin. I have observed nothing decisive as to this point in the books of travels which I have perused, and indeed very little more relating to the winds, excepting the violent heat they sometimes bring with them in these countries. At Aleppo, "the coldest winds in the winter are those that blow from between the northwest and the east, and the nearer they approach to the last-mentioned point, the colder they are during the winter, and part of the spring. But from the beginning of May to the end of September, the winds blowing from the very same points, bring with them a degree and kind of heat which one would imagine came out of an oven, and which, when it blows hard, will affect metals within the houses, such as locks of room-doors, nearly as much as if they had been exposed to the rays of the sun; yet it is remarkable that water kept in jars is much cooler at this time than when a cool westerly wind blows. In these seasons, the only remedy is to shut all the doors and windows, for though these winds do not kill as the sammuel, which are much of the same nature, do in the desert, yet they are extremely troublesome, causing a languor and difficulty of respiration to most people," &c.—HARMER.

Ver. 27. It is not good to eat much honey; so for men to search their own glory is not glory.

Delicious as honey is to an eastern palate, it has been thought sometimes to have produced terrible effects. So Sanutus tells us, that the English that attended Edward I. into the Holy Land, died in great numbers, as they marched, in June, to demolish a place, which he ascribes to the excessive heat, and their intemperate eating of fruits and honey. This, perhaps, may give us the thought of Solomon when he says, "It is not good to eat much honey." He had before, in the same chapter, mentioned that an excess in eating honey occasioned sickness and vomiting; but, if it was thought sometimes to produce deadly effects, there is a greater energy in the instruction.—HARMER.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Ver. 3. A whip for the horse, a bridle for the ass, and a rod for the fool's back.

According to our notions, we should rather say, "A bridle for the horse, and a whip for the ass." But it should be remembered that the eastern asses, particularly those of the Arabian breed, are much larger, more beautiful, and better goers, than those in our cold northerly countries. "In Arabia," says Nicholson, "we meet with two kinds of asses. The small and sluggish kind are so little esteemed in the East as in Europe. But there are some of a species large and spirited, which appeared to me more convenient for travelling than the horses, and which are very dear." Such, no doubt, there are evidently in Palestine, and as the modern Arabs take pains in training them to a pleasant pace, there is the highest probability that something of the kind was practised among the ancient Israelites; since from numerous passages of the Old Testament it appears that asses were the beasts on which that people, and even their great men, usually rode. Their asses, therefore, being active and well broke, would need only a bridle to guide them; whereas their horses, being scarce, and probably often caught wild, and badly broke, would be much less manageable, and frequently require the correction of the whip.—PARKHURST.

In the East, the horse was taught only two motions, to walk in state, or to push forward in full career; a bridle was therefore unnecessary, and seldom used, except for more ornament; the voice, or the hand of his master, was sufficient to direct his way, or to stop his course. While the ass reluctantly submits to the control of the bridle, he presents his back with stupid insensibility to the rod. This instrument of correction is, therefore, reserved for the fool, and is necessary to subdue the vicious propensities of his heart, and turn him from the error of his way. The ancient Israelites preferred the young ass for the saddle. It is on this account the sacred writers so frequently mention riding on young asses and on ass colts. They must have found them, from experience, like the young of all animals, more tractable, lively, and active, than their parents, and, by consequence, better adapted to this employment. Buffon remarked particularly of the young ass, that it is a gay, nimble, and gentle animal, "and therefore to be preferred for riding to the same animal when become lazy and stubborn through age." "Ludeed, the Hebrew name of the young ass, ay," from a root which signifies to rouse or excite, "is expressive of its character for sprightliness and activity." On public and solemn occasions, they adorned the asses which they rode, with rich and splendid trappings. "In this manner," says an excellent writer of Essays on Sacred Zoology, "the magistrates, in the time of the Judges, appear to have rode in state. They proceeded to the gate of their city, where they sat to hear causes, in slow procession, mounted on asses superbly caparisoned with white cloth, which covered the greater part of the animal's body. It is thus that we must interpret the words of Deborah: 'Speak, ye that ride on white asses,' on asses caparisoned with coverings made of white woollen cloth, 'ye that sit in judgment, and walk, or march in state, by the way.' The colour is not that of the animal, but of his hiran, or covering, for the ass is commonly dun, and not white."

No doubt can be entertained in relation to the existence of the custom alluded to in this quotation. It prevails among the Arabs to the present day; but it appears rather unnatural to ascribe the colour of a covering to the creature that wears it. We do not call a man white or black, because he happens to be dressed in vestments of white or black cloth; neither did the Hebrews. The expression naturally suggests the colour of the animal itself, not of its trappings; and the only point to be ascertained is, whether the ass is found of a white colour. Buffon informs us, that the colour of the ass is not dun, but flaxen, and the belly of a silvery white. In many instances, the silvery white predominates; for Cartwright, who travelled into the East, affirms, that he beheld, on the banks of the Euphrates, great droves of wild beasts, among which were many wild asses, all white. Oppian describes the wild ass, as having a coat of silvery white; and the one which Professor Gmelin brought from Tartary, was of the same colour. White asses, according to Morier, come from Arabia; their scarcity makes them valuable, and gives them consequence. The men of the law count it a dignity, and suited to their character, to ride on asses of this colour. As the Hebrews always appeared in white garments at their public festivals, and on days of rejoicing, or when the courts of justice were held; so they naturally preferred white asses, because the colour suited the occasion, and because asses of this colour being more rare and costly, were more covered by the great and the wealthy. The same view is taken of this question by Lewis, who says, the asses in Judea "were commonly of a red colour; and therefore white asses were highly valued, and used by persons of superior note and quality." In this passage he clearly speaks of the colour of the animals themselves, not of their coverings.—PAXTON.

Ver. 11. As a dog returneth to his vomit; so a fool returneth to his folly.

"See the fellow," it is said, "he has repeatedly suffered for his folly; how often has he been corrected! and yet, like the dog, he eats up the food he has vomited." "Yes, he is ever washing his legs, and ever running into the mud." "You fool; because you fell nine times, must you fall again?"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 14. As the door turneth upon his hinges, so doth the slothful upon his bed.

The doors of the ancients did not turn on hinges, but on pivots thus constructed: the upright of the moveable door next the wall had, at each extremity, a copper case sunk into it, with a projecting point on the inside, to take the better hold of the wood-work. This case was generally of a cylindrical form; but there have been found some square ones, from which there sprang on each side iron straps, serving to bind together and strengthen the boards with which the door was constructed hollow. (Winckelman's Herculaneum).—BURGER.

Ver. 17. He that passeth by, and meddleth with strife belonging not to him, is like one that taketh a dog by the ears.

"Why meddle with that matter?" "Will a rat seize a cat by the ears?" "I will break thy bones, thou low caste."—"No doubt about that; I suppose in the same way as the rat which seized my cat last night: begone, or I will give thee a bite."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 25. When he speaketh fair, believe him not: for there are seven abominations in his heart.

The number seven is often used to denote MANY. "If we have rain, we shall have a crop of seven years." "My friend, I came to see you seven times, but the servants always said ten-tingarar," i. e. he is eating. "I will never speak to that fellow again; he has treated me with contempt these seven times." "You stupid ass, I have told you seven times." "The wind is fair, and the chony is ready for sea."—"I cannot believe you; I have already been on board seven times."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Ver. 6. Faithful are the wounds of a friend; but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful.

"Begone! wretch: you cannot deceive me. I am more afraid of your smiles, than the reproaches of my friend. I know the serpent—get out of my way." "Ah! says the stranger, 'the trees of my own village are better to me than the friends of this place.'"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 9. Ointment and perfume rejoice the heart: so doth the sweetness of a man's friend by hearty counsel.

At the close of a visit in the East, it is common to sprinkle rose, or some other sweet-scented water, on the guests, and to perfume them with aloe-wood, which is brought last, and serves for a sign that it is time for a stranger to take leave. It is thus described by M. Savary: "Towards the conclusion of a visit among persons of distinction in Egypt, a slave, holding in his hand a silver plate, on which are burning precious essences, approaches the face of the visitors, each of whom in his turn perfumes his beard. They then pour rose-water on his head and hands. This is the last ceremony, after which it is usual to withdraw." As to the method of using the aloe-wood, Maundrell says, they have for this purpose a small silver chafingdish, covered with a lid full of holes, and fixed upon a handsome plate. In this they put some fresh coals, and upon them a piece of lignum aloes, and then shutting it up, the smoke immediately ascends with a grateful odour through the cover. Probably to such a custom, so calculated to refresh and exhilarate, the words of Solomon have an allusion.—BURGER.

Great numbers of authors take notice of this part of Eastern complaisance, but some are much more particular and distinct than others. Maundrell, for instance, who gives a most entertaining account of the ceremony of burning odours under the chin, does not mention any thing of the sprinkling sweet-scented waters; however, many other writers do, and Dr. Pococke has given us the figure of the vessel they make use of upon this occasion, in his first volume. They are both then used in the East, but if one is spoken of more than the other, it is, I think, the perfuming persons with odoriferous smoke. The scriptures, in like manner, speak of perfumes as used anciently for civil purposes, as well as sacred, though they do not mention particulars. "Ointment and perfume rejoice the heart," Prov. xxvii. 9. Perhaps this word, perfume, comprehends in its meaning, the waters distilled from roses, and odoriferous flowers, whose scents in the East, at least in Egypt, if Mailet may be admitted to be a judge, are much higher and more exquisitely grateful, than with us; but if those distillations should be thought not to have been known so early, the burning fragrant things, and the making a sweet smoke with them, we are sure, they were acquainted with, and to that way of perfuming, Solomon at least refers. But a passage in Daniel makes it requisite to enter more minutely into this affair, and as at the same time it mentions some other eastern forms of doing honour, which I have already taken notice of, but to all which in this case objections have been made, I will make my remarks upon it in a distinct article, which I will place immediately after this, and show how easy that little collection of oriental compliments may be accounted for, as well as explain more at large this particular affair of burning odours merely as a civil expression of respect.—HARRER.

Ver. 15. A continual dropping in a very rainy day, and a contentious woman, are alike.

See on ch. 21. 9.

Ver. 19. As in water, face answereth to face; so the heart of man to man.

The Hindoos do not appear to have had mirrors made of silvered glass, until they became acquainted with Europeans; but they had them of burnished metal and other articles. Many even at this day pour water into a vessel which they use for the same purpose. "His friendship for me is like my body and its shadow in the sun, which never separate."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 22. Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him.

Pounding in a mortar is a punishment still used among the Turks. The ulemats, or body of lawyers, in Turkey, are by law secured in two important privileges—they cannot lose their goods by confiscation, nor can they be put to death except by the pestle and mortar. The guards of the tower, who suffered Prince Corseskie to escape from prison, were, some of them, empaled, and others pounded or beaten to pieces in great mortars of iron, by order of the Turkish government. This dreadful punishment appears to have been occasionally imposed by the Jewish rulers, for Solomon clearly alludes to it in one of his Proverbs: "Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him."—PAXTON.

Dr. Boothroyd says, "that is, no correction, however severe, will cure him." Large mortars are used in the East for the purpose of separating the rice from the husk. When a considerable quantity has to be prepared, the mortar is placed outside the door, and two women, with each a pestle of five feet long, begin the work. They strike in rotation, and blacksmiths do on the anvil.

Cruel as it is, this is a punishment of the state; the poor victim is thrust into the mortar, and beaten with the pestle. The late king of Kandy compelled one of the wives of his rebellious chiefs thus to beat her own infant to death. Hence the saying, "Though you beat that loose woman in a mortar, she will not leave her ways;" which means, though you chastise her ever so much, she will never improve.—ROBERTS.

There is a remarkable passage, Prov. xxvii. 22, "Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him." The mode of punishment referred to in this passage, has been made a subject of inquiry, by a correspondent of the Gentleman's Magazine, who signs R. W., [conjectured to be Richard Winter, a very respectable minister among the dissenters.] In answer to his inquiries, another correspondent assured him there were no traces of any such custom in the East. But, besides what probability arises in the affirmative, from the proverbial manner of speech adopted by Solomon, the allusion may be strengthened, and the existence of such a punishment may be proved by positive testimony. None who are well informed, can willingly allow that any mode of expression in scripture is beyond elucidation, or can consent that the full import of a simile, adopted by an inspired writer, should be contracted or diminished.

"Fanaticism has enacted, in Turkey, in favour of the ulemats, [or body of lawyers,] that their goods shall never be confiscated, nor themselves put to death, but by being bruised in a mortar. The honour of being treated in so distinguished a manner, may not, perhaps, be sensibly felt by every one; examples are rare;—yet the insolence of the Mufi irritated Sultan Osman to such a degree, that he ordered the mortars to be replaced, which, having been long neglected, had been thrown down, and almost covered with earth. This order alone produced a surprising effect; the body of ulemats, justly terrified, submitted." (Baron De Tott.)

"The Mohammedans consider this office as so important, and entitled to such reverence, that the person of a pacha, who acquits himself well in it, becomes inviolable, even by the sultan; it is no longer permitted to shed his blood. But the divan has invented a method of satisfying its vengeance on those who are protected by this privilege, without departing from the literal expression of the law, by ordering them to be pounded in a mortar, of which there have been various instances." (Volney.)—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

I have a drawing by a Cingalese, of the treatment received by the family of Elypol, one of Raja Singha's ministers, in 1814, and which led to his dethronement. In the first part of the picture the king is represented sitting in his palace, with one of his queens having her face in the opposite direction. Elypol is prostrate before him, with his wife and five children behind, guarded by a sentinel. In the second division, one executioner is ripping open one of the children, and another holding up the reeking head of the next, just cut off, and ready to drop it into a mortar. Next, the unhappy mother appears with the pestle lifted in her hands, to bray the head of her infant. It appears from the published accounts of this inhuman business, that the poor woman let fall the pestle once, and fainted away. Lastly, three children appear on a precipice with bonnet hands, and fastened to a large stone, intended to sink them in the pond, into which an executioner behind is about to precipitate them.—CALLOWAY.

Ver. 25. The hay appeareth, and the tender grass showeth itself, and herbs of the mountains are gathered.

There is a gross impropriety in our version of Proverbs xxvii. 25, "The hay appeareth, and the tender grass showeth itself, and herbs of the mountains are gathered." Now, certainly, if the tender grass is but just beginning to show itself, the hay, which is grass cut and dried, after it has arrived at maturity, ought by no means to be associated with it, still less to precede it. And this leads us to notice, that none of the dictionaries, &c. which we have seen, give what seems to be the accurate import of this word, which we apprehend means, the first shoots, the rising—just budding—spires of grass. So in the present passage (ἡ γαλή χαίρη) the tender risings of the grass are in mdion; and the buddings of grass (grass in its early state, as is the peculiar import of ἡ δέση) appear; and the tufts of grass, proceeding from the same root, collect themselves together, and, by their union, begin to clothe the mountain tops with a pleasing verdure." Surely, the beautiful progress of vegetation, as described in this passage, must appear to every man of taste too poetical to be lost; but what must it be to an eastern beholder! to one whose imagination is exalted by a poetic spirit; one who has lately witnessed all-surrounding sterility, a grassless waste!—TAYLOR IN CALMET.

Ver. 27. And thou shalt have goats' milk enough for thy food, for the food of thy household, and for the maintenance of thy maidens.

Milk is a great part of the diet of the eastern people. Their goats furnish them with some part of it, and Russel tells us are chiefly kept for that purpose; that they yield it in no inconsiderable quantity; and that it is sweet, and well-tasted. This at Aleppo is, however, chiefly from the beginning of April to September; they being generally supplied the other part of the year with cows' milk, such as it is: for the cows being commonly kept at the gardens, and fed with the refuse, the milk generally tastes so strong of garlic or cabbage-leaves, as to be very disagreeable. This circumstance sufficiently points out how far preferable the milk of goats must have been.—HARMER.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Ver. 3. A poor man that oppresseth the poor is like a sweeping rain, which leaveth no food.

To feel the force of this passage a person should see the rains which sometimes fall in the East. For many months together we are occasionally without a single drop of rain, and then it comes down as if the heavens were breaking up, and the earth were about to be dissolved. The ground, which had become cracked by the drought, suddenly swells; the foundations of houses sink, or partially remove from their places; men and beasts flee for shelter; vegetables, trees, blossoms, fruits, are destroyed; and when the waters go off, there is scarcely any thing left for the food of man or beast. The torrents which fell on the continent of India and North Ceylon, in May, 1827, were a fearful illustration of the "sweeping rain which leaveth no food."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 15. As a roaring lion, and a ranging bear; so is a wicked ruler over the poor people.

The bear is occasionally found in company with the lion, in the writings of the Old Testament; and if the savage ferocity of his disposition be duly considered, certainly forms a proper associate for that destroyer. "There came a lion and a bear," said the son of Jesse, "and took a lamb out of the flock;" and Solomon unites them, to constitute the symbol of a wicked magistrate: "As a roaring lion, and a ranging bear, so is a wicked ruler over the poor people." The savage, which in these texts is associated with the lion, is the brown or red bear. Natural historians mention two other species, the white and black, the dispositions and habits of which are entirely different. The white bear differs in shape from the others, is an inhabitant of the polar regions, and feeds "on the bodies of seals, whales, and other monsters of the deep." It is properly a sea bear, and must have been totally unknown to the inspired writers, who lived so far remote from those dreary and desolate shores which it frequents. The black and the brown bears are considered by many as only varieties of the same species; but their temper and manners are so different, that Buffon, and other respectable writers, contend, that they ought to be regarded as specifically different. The brown or red bear is both a larger animal than the black, and a beast of prey that in strength and ferocity scarcely yields to the lion himself; while the black bear chiefly subsists on roots, fruits, and vegetables, and is never known to prey upon other animals. This species uniformly flies from the presence of men, and never attacks them but in self-defence; but the red bear is a bold, and extremely mischievous animal, which will attack a man with equal indifference as a lamb or a fawn. The black bear also confines himself to the more temperate northern latitudes, never ascending to the arctic circle, nor descending lower than the Alps, where it is sometimes found; but the brown bear accommodates himself to every clime, and is to be found in every desert, or uncultivated country, on the face of our globe. He ranges the Scythian wilds as far as the shores of the frozen ocean; he infests the boundless forests of America; he traverses the burning wastes of Lybia and Numidia, countries of Africa, which supplied the ancient Romans with bears to be exhibited at their public spectacles; he prowls on the glowing sands of Arabia; he lounges on the banks of the Nile, and on the shores of the Red Sea; he inhabits the wilderness adjoining to the Holy Land. Hence, the black bear must have been unknown to the inhabitants of Canaan; while the red bear infested their country, prowled around their flocks, and watched near their dwellings, affording them but too many opportunities of studying his character, and too much reason to remember his manners.

A particular description of this animal is to be found in every work on natural history; our concern is only with those traits in his character, which serve to illustrate the sacred writings. His external appearance is unusually rugged and savage; his limbs are strong and thick; his forefeet somewhat resemble the human hand; his hair is shaggy and coarse, and his whole aspect dull and heavy. His motions are as awkward as his shape is clumsy; but under this forbidding exterior he conceals a considerable degree of alertness and cunning. If hunger compel him to attack a man, or one of the larger animals, he watches the moment when his adversary is off his guard. In pursuit of his prey, he swims with ease the broad and rapid stream, and climbs the highest tree in the forest. Many beasts of prey surpass him in running; yet his speed is so great, that a man on foot can seldom escape. Hence, the danger to which a person is exposed from his pursuit, is extreme; he can scarcely hope to save himself by flight; the interposing river can give him no security; and the loftiest tree in the forest is commonly the chosen dwelling of his pursuer, which, so far from affording a safe retreat, only ensures his destruction. The danger of the victim, which the bear has marked for destruction, is increased by his natural sagacity, the keenness of his eye, and the excellence of his other senses, particularly his sense of smelling, which Buffon conjectures, from the peculiar structure of the organ, to be perhaps more exquisite than that of any other animal. Nor can any hope be rationally entertained from the forbearance or generosity of his temper; to these, or any other amiable quality, his rugged and savage heart is an entire stranger. His anger, which is easily excited, is at once capricious and intense. A dark and sullen scowl, which on his forbidding countenance never relaxes into a look of satisfaction, indicates the settled moroseness of his disposition; and his voice, which is a deep murmur, or rather growl, often accompanied with a grinding of the teeth, betrays the discontent which reigns within. It is therefore with justice that the inspired writers uniformly number him among the most ferocious and dangerous tenants of the forest, and associate his name and manner with the sorest judgments which afflict mankind.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XXX.

Ver. 4. Who hath ascended up into heaven, or descended? who hath gathered the wind in his fists? who hath bound the waters in a garment? who hath established all the ends of the earth? what is his name, and what is his son's name, if thou canst tell?

"Yes, you are full of confidence, you are quite sure, you know all about it: have you just returned from the heavens?" "Truly, he has just finished his journey from above: listen, listen, to this divine messenger." "Our friend is about to do wonderful things, he has already caught the wind; he has seized it with his hand."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 19. Accuse not a servant unto his master, lest he curse thee, and thou be found guilty.

Whatever crimes your servants commit, no one will tell you of them, except those who wish to gain your favour. But let them once fall, then people in every direction come to expose their villany.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 15. The horse-leech hath two daughters, crying, Give, give.

This creature is only once mentioned in the holy scriptures. It was known to the ancient Hebrews under the name (אֲלֻקָּה) alukah, from the verb alak, which, in Arabic, signifies to adhere, stick close, or hang fast. The reason of the Hebrew name is evident; the leech sticks fast to the skin: and in several languages, its pertinacious adhesion is become proverbial. Horace celebrates it in this line—

"Non missura cutem, nisi plena cruoris hirudo."

An ancient author calls it the black reptile of the marsh, because it is commonly found in marshy places. Its cruelty and thirst of blood, are noted by many writers, and, indeed, are too prominent qualities in this creature to be overlooked.

"— iam ego me verum in hircinien Atque eorum exsugebo sanguinem."—Plaut. in Epidico, Act ii.

Long before the time of that ancient Roman, the royal preacher introduced it in one of his Proverbs, to illustrate the cruel and insatiable cupidity of worldly men: "The horse-leech hath two daughters, crying, Give, give." Several questions have been proposed in relation to this text; whether, for example, it is to be literally understood; and what the royal preacher means by its two daughters. Bochart contends, that it cannot be literally understood, first, because its introduction into that proverb would be quite improper; second, because the horse-leech has no daughters, being generated of putrid matter in the bottom of the marsh. In answer to these reasons, it may be observed, that if it be connected with the preceding verse, the introduction is quite proper, and highly emphatical; indeed, we can scarcely conceive any thing more forcible and beautiful than the comparison. To the second objection, it is sufficient to reply, that Bochart has merely asserted the formation of the horse-leech from putrid mire; but the absurdity of equivocal generation has already been considered. Mercer supposes, that the two daughters of the horse-leech are the forks of her tongue, by which she inflicts the wound; but this exposition is inadmissible, because she is destitute of that member, and acts merely by suction. Bochart, supposing that the clause where it is introduced, cannot with propriety be connected with any part of the context, considers it, of course, as independent; and admitting the derivation of aluka from alak, to hang or be appended, interprets the term as denoting the termination of human life, appended as it were to the purpose of God, limiting the term of our mortal existence; and by consequence, that her two daughters are death and the grave, or, should these be thought nearly synonymous, the grave, where the body returns to its dust, and the world of spirits, where the soul takes up its abode. But with all deference to such high authority, this interpretation appears very forced and unnatural. The common interpretation seems, in every respect, entitled to the preference. Solomon, having in the preceding verses mentioned those that devoured the property of the poor, as the worst of all the generations he had specified, proceeds in the fifteenth verse to state and illustrate the insatiable cupidity with which they prosecuted their schemes of rapine and plunder.—As the horse-leech hath two daughters, cruelty and thirst of blood, which cannot be satisfied; so, the oppressor of the poor has two dispositions, cruelty and avarice, which never say they have enough, but continually demand additional gratifications.—PAXTON.

Ver. 17. The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it.

In the East, in consequence of the superstitions of heathenism, numerous human bodies are exposed to become the prey of birds and wild beasts; and it is worthy of being recorded, that the eye is the first part selected by the former, as their favourite portion. It is, however, considered to be a great misfortune to be left without sepulchral rites; and it is no uncommon imprecation to hear, "Ah! the crows shall one day pick out thy eyes." "Yes, the lizards shall lay their eggs in thy sockets."—ROBERTS.

Solomon appears to give a distinct character to some of the ravens in Palestine, when he says, "The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it." The wise man, in this passage, may allude to a species of raven, which prefers the valley for her habitation to the clefts of the rock; or he may perhaps refer to some sequestered valley in the Land of Promise, much frequented by these birds, which derived its name from that circumstance; or, as the rocky precipice where the raven loves to build her nest, often overhangs the torrent, (which the original word, nahal, also signifies,) and the lofty tree, which is equally acceptable, rises on its banks, the royal preacher might, by that phrase, merely intend the ravens which prefer such situations. Bochart conjectures, that the valley alluded to was Tophet, in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, which the prophet Jeremiah calls the valley of the dead bodies; because the dead bodies of criminals were cast into it, where they remained without burial, till they were devoured by flocks of ravens, which collected for that purpose from the circumjacent country. If this conjecture be right, the meaning of Solomon will be this: He who is guilty of so great a crime, shall be subjected to an infamous punishment; and shall be cast into the valley of dead bodies, and shall find no grave, but the devouring maw of the impure and voracious raven. It was a common punishment in the East, (and one which the Orientals dreaded above all others,) to expose in the open fields the bodies of evil-doers that had suffered by the laws of their offended country, to be devoured by the beasts of the field, and the fowls of heaven. Hence, in Aristophanes, an old man deprecates the punishment of being exposed to the ridicule of women, or given as a banquet to the ravens; and Horace, in his sixteenth epistle to Quintius, represents it as the last degree of degradation, to be devoured by these hateful birds.

The wise man insinuates, that the raven makes his first and keenest attack on the eye; which perfectly corresponds with his habits, for he always begins his banquet with that part of the body. Isidore says of him, "Primo in cadaveribus oculum petit;" and Epictetus, "Οι μὲν κορυμῆς τὸν νεκροῦ τρώουσι τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς ἀνασφραγιστοὺς: τὰ ράβδους δὲ τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς τῶν νεκρῶν." the ravens devour the eyes of the dead. Many other testimonies might be adduced; but these are sufficient to justify the allusion in the proverb.—PAXTON.

Ver. 33. Surely the churning of milk bringeth forth butter, and the wringing of the nose bringeth forth blood; so the forcing of wrath bringeth forth strife.

The ancient way of making butter in Arabia and Palestine, was probably nearly the same as is still practised by the Bedouin Arabs and Moors in Barbary, and which is thus described by Dr. Shaw: "Their method of making butter is by putting the milk or cream in a goat's-skin turned inside out, which they suspend from one side of the tent to the other, and then pressing it to and fro in one uniform direction, they quickly occasion the separation of the unctuous and whey parts." So "the butter of the Moors in the empire of Morocco, which is bad, is made of all the milk as it comes from the cow, by putting it into a skin and shaking it till the butter separates from it." (Stewart's Journey to Mequinez.) And what is more to the purpose, as relating to what is still practised in Palestine, Hasselquist, speaking of an encampment of the Arabs, which he found not far from Tiberias, at the foot of the mountain or hill where Christ preached his sermon, says, "they make butter in a leathern bag hung on three poles, erected for the purpose, in the form of a cone, and drawn to and fro by two women."—BURTON.

The following is a description given by Thevenot of the manner of making butter at Damascus, which he, however, expressly assures us, is the same all over the East. "They tie a stick with both ends to the hind-feet of a goat's-skin, which serves instead of a leathern bag, that is, each end of the stick to one foot, and the same with the forefeet, that these sticks may serve as handles; they then put the milk into this bag, close it carefully, shake it about, holding by the two sticks; after a time, add some water, and then shake it as before, till butter comes."—ROSENMCLELLER.

Ver. 18. She perceiveth that her merchandise is good: her candle goeth not out by night.

To give a modern instance of a similar kind—Monsieur De Guys, in his Sentimental Journey through Greece, says, "embroidery is the constant employment of the Greek women. Those who follow it for a living are employed in it from morning to night, as are also their daughters and slaves. This is a picture of the industrious wife, painted after nature by Virgil, in the eighth book of his Æneid:—

'Night was now sliding in her middle course ;
The first repose was finish'd ; when the dame,
Who by her distaff's slender art subsists,
Wakes the spread embers and the sleeping fire,
Night adding to her work : and calls her maids
To their long tasks, by lighted tapers urg'd'

Ver. 24. She maketh fine linen, and selleth it ; and delivereth girdles unto the merchant.

Herodotus, it seems, thought the Egyptian women's carrying on commerce was a curiosity that deserved to be inserted in his history ; it can hardly then be thought an impropriety to take notice of this circumstance in a collection of papers tending to illustrate the scriptures, and especially in a country where the women indeed spin, but the men not only buy and sell, but weave, and do almost every thing else relating to manufactures. The commerce mentioned by Herodotus is lost, according to Maillet, from among the women of Egypt in general, being only retained by the Arabs of that country who live in the mountains. The Arabian historians say, that the women used to deal in buying and selling of things woven of silk, gold, and silver, of pure silk, of cotton, of cotton and thread, or simple linen cloth, whether made in the country or imported ; the men in wheat, barley, rice, and other productions of the earth. Maillet, in giving an account of the alteration in this respect in Egypt, affirms that this usage still continues among the Arabs to this day, who live in the mountains ; and consequently he must be understood to affirm, that the things that are woven among the Arabs and sold, are sold by the women, who are indeed the persons that weave the men's hykes in Barbary, according to Dr. Shaw, and doubtless weave in Egypt.—HARNER.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 4. I made me great works ; I built me houses ; I planted me vineyards ; 5. I made me gardens and orchards, and I planted trees in them of all kind of fruits ; 6. I made me pools of water, to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees.

The following account of these reservoirs will evince at what an immense expense and labour they were constructed. Solomon's cisterns "are seated in a valley, and are three in number, each occupying a different level, and placed in a right line with each other, so that the waters of the one may descend into the next below it. Their figures are quadrangular : the first, or southern one, being about three hundred feet long ; the second, four hundred ; and the third, five hundred ; the breadth of each being about two hundred feet. They are all lined with masonry, and descended to by narrow flights of steps, at one of the corners ; the whole depth, when empty, not exceeding twenty or thirty feet. They were, at the present moment, all dry ; but though they may be considered useful works in so barren and destitute a country as Judea, yet they are hardly to be reckoned among the splendid monuments of a luxurious sovereign's wealth or power, since there are many of the Hebrew tanks in Bombay, the works of private individuals, in a mere commercial settlement, which are much more elegant in their design, and more expensive in their construction, than any of these. Near these reservoirs there are two small fountains, of whose waters we drank, and thought them good. These are said to have originally supplied the cisterns through subterranean aqueducts ; but they are now fallen into decay from neglect, and merely serve as a watering-place for cattle, and a washing-stream for the females of the neighbouring country." (Buckingham.)

"After a slight repast, we took leave of our hosts, and set out in a southern direction to examine the Piscine, said to have been constructed by Solomon. The royal preacher has been imagined to allude to these, among other instances of his splendour and magnificence, in the passage where he is arguing for the insufficiency of worldly pursuits to procure happiness, Eccl. ii. 6. They are three in number, placed nearly in a direct line above each other, like the locks of a canal. By this arrangement, the surplus of the first flows into the second, which is again discharged into the third : from thence a constant supply of living water is carried along the sides of the hill to Bethlehem and Jerusalem. The figure of these cisterns is rectangular, and they are all nearly of the same width, but of considerable difference in length, the third being almost half as large again as the first. They are still in a certain state of preservation, and with a slight expense might be perfectly restored. The source from whence they are supplied is about a furlong distant ; the spring rises several feet below the surface, the aperture of which is secured by a door, so contrived, that it may be impenetrably closed on any sudden danger of the water being contaminated." (Jolliffe's Letters.)—BURDER.

At about an hour's distance to the south of Bethlehem, are the pools of Solomon. They are three in number, of an oblong figure, and are supported by abutments. The antiquity of their appearance entitles them, Dr. Richardson thinks, to be considered as the work of the Jewish monarch : "like every thing Jewish," he says, "they are more remarkable for strength than for beauty." They are situated at the south end of a small valley, and are so disposed on the sloping ground, that the waters of the uppermost may descend into the second, and those of the second into the third. That on the west is nearest the source of the spring, and is about 480 feet long ; the second is about 600 feet in length, and the third about 660 ; the breadth of all three being nearly the same, about 270 feet. They are lined with a thick coat of plaster, and are capable of containing a great quantity of water, which they discharge into a small aqueduct that conveys it to Jerusalem. This aqueduct is built on a foundation of stone : the water runs through round earthen pipes, about ten inches in diameter, which are cased with two stones, hewn out so as to fit them, and they are covered over with rough stones, well cemented together. The whole is so much sunk into the ground on the side of the hills round which it is carried, that in many places nothing is to be seen of it. In time of war, however, this aqueduct could be of no service to Jerusalem, as the communication could be easily cut off. The fountain which supplies these pools is at about the distance of 140 paces from them. "This," says Maundrell, "the friars will have to be that scaled fountain to which the holy spouse is compared, Cant. iv. 12." And he represents it to have been by no means difficult to seal up these springs, as they rise under ground, and have no other avenue than a little hole, "like to the mouth of a narrow well." "Through this hole you descend directly down, but not without some J. J. culty, for about four yards; and then arrive in a vaulted room fifteen paces long and eight broad. Joining to this is a lother room of the same fashion, but somewhat less. Both these rooms are covered with handsome stone arches, very ancient, and perhaps the work of Solomon himself. You find here four places at which the water rises. From these separate sources it is conveyed by little rivulets into a kind of basin, and from thence is carried by a large subterraneous passage down into the pools. In the way, before it arrives at the pools, there is an aqueduct of brick pipes, which receives part of the stream, and carries it by many turnings and windings to Jerusalem. Below the pools, here runs down a narrow rocky valley, enclosed on both sides with high mountains. This the friars will have to be 'the enclosed garden' alluded to in the same place of the Canticles. As to the pools, it is probable enough they may be the same with Solomon's; there not being the like store of excellent spring-water to be met with anywhere else throughout Palestine. But, for the gardens, one may safely affirm, that if Solomon made them in the rocky ground which is now assigned for them, he demonstrated greater power and wealth in finishing his design, than wisdom in choosing the place for it."—MODERN TRAVELLER.

It were very desirable to convey some idea, though imperfect, of the nature and arrangement of the gardens annexed to royal palaces, in the East; for which this would be a proper place. But to bring the subject within a moderate compass is not easy; and every situation has peculiarities, which do not admit of illustration by comparison, or of application to our present purpose. The gardens of the seraglio at Constantinople command an extensive sea view, and are constructed accordingly. Dr. E. D. Clarke and M. Pouqueville agree that they are far from magnificent, as Europeans estimate magnificence; and may rather be thought wildernesses than gardens. They abound in fruit-trees, in treillages, in fountains, and in kiosques. Their other ornaments are but meager; and their flowers, which should constitute the chief distinction of a garden, especially of an imperial garden, are but ordinary. In fact, those gentlemen rather apologize to their readers for anticipated disappointment. "I promise," says Dr. Clarke, "to conduct my readers, not only within the retirement of the seraglio, but into the harem itself, and the most secluded haunts of the Turkish sovereign. Would only I could also promise a degree of satisfaction, in this respect adequate to their desire of information."

Chardin has given plates of several Persian gardens; and from what he says—which is confirmed by Mr. Morier—coolness and shade beneath wide-spreading trees, water, and verdure, are the governing powers of a Persian paradise. It might be so, anciently, at Jerusalem; nevertheless, we are still left in uncertainty as to what might characterize the ancient city of David, his palace, and his gardens. We may safely infer that they were extensive, since his demesne occupied the whole area of Mount Zion; they afforded a variety of heights, since the mount was far from level: it rose, also, much above Mount Moriah, on which stood the city of Jerusalem, and consequently commanded distinct views of that city and its environs. The various heights afforded situations for buildings of different descriptions; private kiosques adorned with the utmost magnificence and skill, (under Solomon,) dwellings for the inmates, the guards, the attendants, the harem, and for foreign curiosities also; for specimens of natural history, birds, beasts, &c. Nor was the extent of Mount Zion a rock; for Dr. Clarke states expressly, "If this be indeed Mount Zion, the prophecy concerning it, (Micah iii. 12.) that the plough should pass over it, has been fulfilled to the letter; for such labours were actually going on when we arrived." Here was therefore a space (or spaces) of arable land; and this, after so many revolutions of the surface, and so great intermixture of unproductive ruins, derived from the buildings and fortifications upon it, and around it. In its original state, we need not doubt, but that it would admit, not only of the growth of shrubs, but of trees; "the thick gloom of cypresses and domes," which, as Dr. Clarke observes, of Constantinople, distinguish the most beautiful part of that city. How greatly such combinations must have contributed to the general aspect of the Hebrew metropolis, surrounded by barren mountains, we can be at no loss to conceive; and with these royal embellishments we may connect those which were "planted in the house of the Lord," Psalm xciii. 13. Mr. Rich says, very justly, "We should form a very incorrect notion of the residence of an eastern monarch, if we imagined it was one building which in its decay would leave a single mound, or mass of ruins. Such establishments always consist of a fortified enclosure, the area of which is occupied by many buildings of various kinds, without symmetry or general design, and with large vacant spaces between them."—TAYLOR IN CABNET.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 5. A time to cast away stones, and a time to gather stones together; a time to embrace, and a time to refrain from embracing.

See on 2 Kings 3. 19.

Ver. 7. A time to rend, and a time to sew; a time to keep silence, and a time to speak.

New clothes were thought very necessary for the solemnization of a stated eastern festival. Commentators have taken notice, that the rending mentioned by Solomon, Eccles. iii. 7, refers to the oriental modes of expressing sorrow; but they seem to think, that the sewing signifies nothing more than the terminating, perhaps nothing more than the abating, of affliction. Maimonides is quoted on this occasion, as saying, He that mourns for a father, &c., let him stitch up the rent of his garment at the end of thirty days, but never let him sow it up well. As the other cases, however, are as directly opposite as possible, is it not more probable, that a season of joy is here meant, in contrast to a time of bitter grief, than merely of some abatement of distress? And that by a time of sewing, is meant a time of making up new vestments, rather than a slight tacking together the places of their clothes, which were worn in the paroxysm of their grief?

Thus, when Jacob supposed he had lost his son Joseph, he rent his clothes for grief, Gen. xxxvii. 34; while the time of preparing for the circumcision of the son of Ishmael, the bashaw of Egypt, when Maillet lived there, must have been a time of great sewing; for the rejoicing on that occasion lasted, it seems, "ten days, and on the first day of the ceremony the whole household of the bashaw appeared in new clothes, and were very richly dressed. Two vests of different-coloured satin had been given to every one of his domestics, one of English cloth, with breeches of the same, and a lining of fur of a Moscovite fox. The meanest slave was dressed after this sort with a turban, of which the cap was of velvet, or English cloth, and the other part adorned with gold. The pages had large breeches of green velvet, and short vests of gold brocade. Those of higher rank were more richly dressed; and there was not one of them but changed his dress two or three times during the solemnity. Ibrahim, the young lord that was to be circumcised, appeared on the morning of the first day, clothed in a half vest of white cloth, lined with a rich fur, over a doliman of Venetian cloth of gold, and over this half vest he wore a robe of fire-coloured camlet, lined with a green tabby. This vest, or quiriqui, was embroidered with pearls of a large size, and fastened before with a clasp of large diamonds. Through all the time the solemnity lasted, Ibrahim changed his dress three or four times a day, and never wore the same thing twice, excepting the quiriqui, with its pearls, which he put on three or four times." I need not go on with Maillet's account; it is sufficiently evident that the time of preparing for this rejoicing was a time of sewing.—HARMER.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 11. Again, if two lie together, then they have heat: but how can one be warm alone?

In the oriental regions the oppressive heat requires the members of the same family, in general, to occupy each a separate bed. This, according to Maillet, is the custom in Egypt; where, not only the master and the mistress of the family sleep in different beds in the same apartment, but also their female slaves, though several lodge in the same chamber, have each a separate mattress. Yet Solomon seems to intimate that a different custom prevailed in Canaan, and one which the extreme heat of the climate seems positively to forbid: "If two lie together, then they have heat, but how can one be warm alone?" Mr. Harmer endeavours to solve the difficulty, by supposing that two might sometimes occupy one bed for medicinal purposes. It is certain that, in the case of David, it was thought a very efficacious method of recalling the vital warmth when it was almost extinguished. But it is probable that the royal preacher alluded rather to the nipping cold of a Syrian winter, when the earth is bound with frost and covered with snow, than to the chilling rigours of extreme old age. The cold winter is very severe during the night in that country. Even in the daytime it is so keen, that Jehoiakim, the king of Judah, had a fire burning before him on the hearth, when he cut the scroll in which the prophecies of Jeremiah were written, and committed it to the flames. This accounts, in the most satisfactory manner, for the remark of Solomon; for nothing surely can be more natural than for two to sleep under the same canopy during the severe cold of a wintry night. The same desire of comfort, one would think, which induces them to separate in the summer, will incline them, at least occasionally, to cherish the vital heat by a nearer approximation than sleeping in the same room. It is usual, through the East, for a whole family to sleep in the same apartment, especially in the lower ranks of life, laying their beds on the ground. To this custom our Lord alludes in the parable: "He from within shall answer and say, Trouble me not; the door is now shut, and my children are now with me in bed;" that is, "my whole family are now a-bed in the same room with me: I cannot arise to give thee."—PAXTON.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 6. Suffer not thy mouth to cause thy flesh to sin; neither say thou before the angel, that it was an error: wherefore should God be angry at thy voice, and destroy the work of thy hands?

"Let not thy mouth weakly excuse thee to no purpose; and do not say before the messenger, (who may be sent to inquire of thee what thou hast vowed,) it was a mistake." As the priests took a servant to levy their share out of the offerings of the people, (1 Sam. ii. 13—16,) and as they were greatly concerned in seeing the vows punctually paid, it is probable that they kept messengers to go and summon those whom they knew to have vowed any thing, for the purpose of enforcing the payment of it. An employment which we find in aftertimes in the synagogues, without knowing when it began, might be the same, for the most part, with that which is here alluded to. The Jews, who scrupled to touch money on the sabbath-day, used to bind themselves on that day to an officer, sent by the rulers of the synagogue, to give such sum for alms; and that officer received it from them the next day. This conjecture is the more probable, as that officer, who was the chagan or minister of the synagogue, is sometimes styled the messenger of the synagogue. (DESVŒUX.)—BURDER.

Ver. 12. The sleep of a labouring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much: but the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep.

In many parts of the East there are not any banks, or public offices, in which the affluent can deposit their riches; consequently the property has to be kept in the house, or concealed in some secret place. Under these circumstances, it is no wonder that a man having great wealth should live in constant dread of having it stolen. There are those who have large treasures concealed in their houses, or gardens, or fields, and the fact being known they are closely watched, whenever they pay special attention to any particular object, or place. The late king of Kandy, after he was taken prisoner, and on his voyage to Madras, was much concerned about some of his concealed treasures, and yet he would not tell where they were. So great is the anxiety of some, arising from the jewels and gold they keep in their frail houses, that they literally watch a great part of the night, and sleep in the day, that their golden deity may not be taken from them.

I knew a man who had nearly all his wealth in gold pagodas, which he kept in a large chest in his bedroom: neither in body nor in mind did he ever wander far from the precious treasure; his abundance hindered him from sleeping; and for a time it seemed as if it would hinder him from dying; for when that fatal moment came, he several times, when apparently gone, again opened his eyes, and again gave ANOTHER look at the chest; and one of the LAST officers of his hands was to make an attempt to feel for the key under his pillow!—ROBERTS.

Ver. 7. All the labour of man is for his mouth, and yet the appetite is not filled.

"My friend," says the sage, to the diligent and successful merchant, "why are you so anxious to have riches? Know you not that all this exertion is for the support of one single span of the belly?" "Tamby, you and your people work very hard; why do you do so?" The man will look at you for a moment, and then putting his fingers on his navel, say, "It is all for the belly."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 6. For as the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of the fool. This also is vanity.

Cow-dung dried was the fuel commonly used for firing, but this was remarkably slow in burning. On this account the Arabs would frequently threaten to burn a person with cow-dung, as a lingering death. When this was used it was generally under their pots. This fuel is a very striking contrast to thorns and furze, and things of that kind, which would doubtless be speedily consumed, with the crackling noise alluded to in this passage. Probably it is this contrast which gives us the energy of the comparison.—HARMER.

Ver. 10. Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these? for thou dost not inquire wisely concerning this.

The Hindoos have four ages, which nearly correspond with the golden, silver, brazen, and iron ages of the western heathen. In the first age, called Kretha, they say the corn sprang up spontaneously, and required no attention; in the second, named Treatha, the justice of kings and the blessings of the righteous caused it to grow; in the third, called Turara, rain produced it; but in this, the fourth age, called Kally, many works have to be done to cause it to grow. "Our fathers," say they, "had three harvests in the year: the trees also gave an abundance of fruit. Where is now the cheapness of provisions? the abundance of fish? the fruitful flocks? the rivers of milk? the plenty of water? Where the pleasures? Where the docility of animals? Where the righteousness, the truth, and affection? Where the riches, the peace, the plenty? Where the mighty men? Where the chaste and beautiful mothers, with their fifteen or sixteen children? Alas! alas! they are all fled."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 13. Consider the work of God: for who can make that straight which he hath made crooked?

"My lord, it is of no use trying to reform that fellow: his ways are crooked: should you by force make him a little straight, he will relapse into his former state." "If you make straight the tail of the dog, will it remain so?"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 25. I applied my heart to know, and to search, and to seek out wisdom, and the reason of things, and to know the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness.

The margin has, instead of applied, "I and my heart compassed," i. e. encircled, went round it. According to Dr. Adam Clarke, "I made a circuit;—I circumscribed the ground I was to traverse: and all within my circuit I was determined to know."—In English we say, "I studied the subject," but in eastern idiom, it is, "I went round it." "Have you studied grammar?"—"Yes, sutte sutte," round and round. "That man is well acquainted with magic, for to his knowledge he has been round and round it: nay more, I am told he has COMPASSED ALL the sciences."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 26. And I find more bitter than death the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and her hands as bands: whose pleaseth God shall escape from her; but the sinner shall be taken by her.

The following insidious mode of robbery gives a very lively comment upon these words of Solomon: "The most cunning robbers in the world are in this country. They use a certain slip with a running noose, which they cast with so much sleight about a man's neck when they are within reach of him, that they never fail, so that they strangle him in a trice. They have another curious trick also to catch travellers. They send out a handsome woman upon the road, who, with her hair dishevelled, seems to be all in tears, sighing and complaining of some misfortune which she pretends has befallen her. Now, as she takes the same way as the traveller goes, he easily falls into conversation with her, and finding her beautiful, offers her his assistance, which she accepts: but he hath no sooner taken her up on horseback behind him, but she throws the snare about his neck, and strangles him, or at least stuns him, until the robbers who lie hid come running in to her assistance, and complete what she hath begun." (Thevenot).—BURDER.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 8. Let thy garments be always white; and let thy head lack no ointment.

This comparison loses all its force in Europe, but in India, where white cotton is the dress of all the inhabitants, and where the beauty of garments consists, not in their shape, but in their being clean and white, the exhortation becomes strikingly proper. A Hindoo catechist addressing a native Christian on the necessity of correctness of conduct, said, See how welcome a person is whose garments are clean and white. Such let our conduct be, and then, though we have lost caste, such will be our reception. (Ward).—BURDER.

Ver. 12. For man also knoweth not his time: as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare; so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them.

"Alas! alas! trouble has come suddenly upon me; I am caught as fishes in the net." "We are all of us to be caught as fishes in the net."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 7. I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth.

See on I Kings 10. 8.

In all ages and nations, we read or hear of complaints against those who have arisen from obscurity to respectability or rank in the state. It is not so modern as some suppose for servants and inferiors to imitate their superiors; and though some would like to see a return of the "good old times" when a man's vest and jerkin would have to be regulated by his rank, such things are doubtless best left to themselves. The Hindoos are most tenacious in their adherence to caste, and should any one, through property or circumstances, be elevated in society, he will always be looked upon with secret contempt. Their proverb is, "He who once walked on the ground, is now in his palanquin; and he who was in his palanquin, is now on the ground."—ROBERTS.

Persons of rank and opulence, in those countries, are now distinguished from their inferiors, by riding on horseback when they go abroad; while those of meaner station, and Christians of every rank, the consuls of Christian powers excepted, are obliged to content themselves with the ass or the mule. A Turkish grandee, proud of his exclusive privilege, moves on horseback with a very slow and stately pace. To the honour of riding upon horses, and the stately manner in which the oriental nobles proceed through the streets, with a number of servants walking before them, the wise man seems to allude, in his account of the disorders which occasionally prevail in society: "I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth."—PAXTON.

Ver. 8. He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it; and whose breaketh a hedge, a serpent shall bite him.

Other enclosures have fences of loose stones, or mud walls, some of them very low, which often furnish a retreat to venomous reptiles. To this circumstance the royal preacher alludes, in his observations of wisdom and folly: "He that diggeth a pit, shall fall into it: and whose breaketh a hedge, a serpent shall bite him." The term which our translators render hedge in this passage, they might with more propriety have rendered wall, as they had done in another part of the writings of Solomon: "I went by the field of the slothful, and by the vineyard of the man void of understanding; and lo, it was all grown over with thorns, and nettles had covered the face thereof, and the stone wall thereof was broken down."—PAXTON.

Ver. 11. Surely the serpent will bite without enchantment; and a babler is no better.

The incantation of serpents is one of the most curious and interesting facts in natural history. This wonderful art, which soothes the wrath, and disarms the fury of the deadliest snake, and renders it obedient to the charmer's voice, is not an invention of modern times; for we discover manifest traces of it in the remotest antiquity. It is asserted, that Orpheus, who probably flourished soon after letters were introduced into Greece, knew how to still the hissing of the approaching snake, and to extinguish the poison of the creeping serpent. The Argonauts are said to have subdued by the power of song the terrible dragon that guarded the golden fleece; Ἡδίστη εὐσθη θελξαι τιρας. Ovid ascribes the same effect to the soporific influence of certain herbs, and magic sentences. But it seems to have been the general persuasion of the ancients, that the principal power of the charmer lay in the sweetness of his music. Pliny says accordingly, that serpents were drawn from their lurking places by the power of music. Serpents, says Augustine, are supposed to hear and understand the words of the Marsi; so that, by their incantations, these reptiles, for the most part, sally forth from their holes.

The wonderful effect which music produces on the serpent tribes, is confirmed by the testimony of several respectable moderns. Adders swell at the sound of a flute, raising themselves upon the one half of their body, turning themselves round, beating proper time, and following the instrument. Their head, naturally round and long like an eel, becomes broad and flat like a fan. The tame serpents, many of which the Orientals keep in their houses, are known to leave their holes in hot weather, at the sound of a musical instrument, and run upon the performer. Dr. Shaw had an opportunity of seeing a number of serpents keep exact time with the derivishes in their circulatory dances, running over their heads and arms, turning when they turned, and stopping when they stopped. The rattlesnake acknowledges the power of music as much as any of his family; of which the following instance is a decisive proof: When Chateaubriand was in Canada, a snake of that species entered their encampment; a young Canadian, one of the party, who could play on the flute, to divert his associates, advanced against the serpent with his new species of weapon. "On the approach of his enemy, the haughty reptile coiled himself into a spiral line, flattened his head, inflated his cheeks, contracted his lips, displayed his venomous fangs and his bloody throat; his double tongue glowed like two flames of fire; his eyes were burning coals; his body, swollen with rage, rose and fell like the bellows of a forge; his dilated skin assumed a dull and scaly appearance; and his tail, which sounded the denunciation of death, vibrated with so great rapidity, as to resemble a light vapour. The Canadian now began to play upon his flute, the serpent started with surprise, and drew back his head. In proportion as he was struck with the magic effect, his eyes lost their fierceness, the oscillations of his tail became slower, and the sound which it emitted became weaker, and gradually died away. Less perpendicular upon their spiral line, the rings of the fascinated serpent were by degrees expanded, and sunk one after another upon the ground, in concentric circles. The shades of azure, green, white, and gold, recovered their brilliancy on his quivering skin, and slightly turning his head, he remained motionless, in the attitude of attention and pleasure. At this moment, the Canadian advanced a few steps, producing with his flute sweet and simple notes. The reptile, inclining his variegated neck, opened a passage with his head through the high grass, and began to creep after the musician, stopping when he stopped, and beginning to follow him again, as soon as he moved forward." In this manner he was led out of their camp, attended by a great number of spectators, both savages and Europeans, who could scarcely believe their eyes, when they beheld this wonderful effect of harmony. The assembly unanimously decreed that the serpent which had so highly entertained them should be permitted to escape. Many of them are carried in baskets through Hindostan, and procure a maintenance for a set of people who play a few simple notes on the flute, with which the snakes seem much delighted, and keep time by a graceful motion of the head, erecting about half their length from the ground, and following the music with gentle curves, like the undulating lines of a swan's neck.

The serpent most common at Cairo, belongs to the viper class, and is undoubtedly poisonous. If one of them enter a house, the charmer is sent for, who uses a certain form of words. By this means, Mr. Brown saw three serpents enticed out of the cabin of a ship lying near the shore. The operator handled them, and put them into a bag. At other times, he saw the fascinated reptiles twist round the bodies of these charmers in all directions, without having had their fangs extracted, or broken, and without doing them any harm. Adders and serpents will twist themselves round the neck and naked bodies of young children belonging to the charmers, and suffer them to escape unhurt. But if any person who is ignorant of the art happens to approach them, their destructive powers immediately revive. At Surat, an Armenian seeing one of these charmers make an adder bite him, without receiving any other injury than the mere incision, boasted he could do the same; and causing himself to be wounded in the hand, died in less than two hours.

While the creature is under the influence of the charm, they sometimes break out the tooth which conveys the poison, and render it quite harmless: for the poison is contained in a bag, at the bottom of the fangs, which lie flat in the mouth, and are erected only when the serpent intends to bite. The bag, upon being pressed, discharges the poison through a hole or groove in the fang, formed to receive it, into the wound, which is at the same instant inflicted by the tooth. That all the teeth are not venomous, is evident from this circumstance, that the charmers will cause their serpents to bite them, till they draw blood, and yet the hand will not swell.

But on some serpents, these charms seem to have no power; and it appears from scripture, that the adder sometimes takes precautions to prevent the fascination which he sees preparing for him; "for the deaf adder shutteth her ear, and will not hear the voice of the most skillful charmer." The method is said to be this; the reptile lays one ear close to the ground, and with his tail covers the other, that he cannot hear the sound of the music; or he repels the incantation by hissing violently. The same allusion is involved in the words of Solomon: "Surely the serpent will bite without enchantment, and a babbler is no better." The threatening of the prophet Jeremiah proceeds upon the same fact: "I will send serpents (cockatrices) among you, which will not be charmed, and they shall bite you." In all these quotations, the sacred writers, while they take it for granted that many serpents are disarmed by charming, plainly admit, that the powers of the charmer are in vain exerted upon others. To account for this exception, it has been alleged, that in some serpents the sense of hearing is very imperfect, while the power of vision is exceedingly acute; but the most intelligent natural historians maintain, that the very reverse is true. In the serpent tribes, the sense of hearing is much more acute than the sense of vision. Pliny observes, that the serpent is much more frequently roused by the ear than by sight: "Jam primum hebetes oculos huic malo dedit, eosque non in fronte ex adverso cernere sed in temporibus: itaque excitatur, sed sarpus auditu quam visu." In this part of his work, the ancient naturalist discourses not concerning any particular species, but the whole class of serpents, asserting of them all, that nature has compensated the dulness of their sight, by the acuteness of their hearing. Unable to resist the force of truth, others maintain, that the adder is deaf, not by nature, but by design; for the Psalmist says, she shutteth her ear, and will not hear the voice of the charmer. But the phrase perhaps means no more than this, that some adders are of a temper so stubborn, that the various arts of the charmer make no impression; they are like creatures destitute of hearing, or whose ears are so completely obstructed, that no sounds can enter. The same phrase is used in other parts of scripture to signify a hard and obdurate heart: "Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard." It is used in the same sense by the prophet: "That stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood, and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil." The righteous man remains unmoved by the cruel and sanguinary counsels of the wicked, as if he had stopped his ears. In the same manner, the stubborn or infuriated asp, as little regards the power of song, as if her sense of hearing were obstructed or destroyed.

If the serpent repel the charm, or is deaf to the song, the charmer, it is believed, exposes himself to great danger, the whole force of the incantation falling upon the head of its author, against whom the exasperated animal directs its deadliest rage. But which of the serpent tribes have the power to repel the incantations of the charmer, or inject a poison which his art is unable to counteract, no ancient Greek writer has been able to discover, or has thought proper to mention. Ælian states, indeed, that the bite of an asp admits of no remedy, the powers of medicine, and the arts of the charmer, being equally unavailing. But their omission has been amply supplied by the Arabian philosophers quoted by Bochart, our principal guide in this part of the work. These clear and accurate writers divide serpents into three classes. In the first, the force of the poison is so intense, that the sufferer does not survive their attack longer than three hours, nor does the wound admit of any cure, for they belong to the class of deaf or stridulous serpents, which are either not affected by music and other charms, or which, by their loud and furious hissing, defeat the purpose of the charmer. The only remedy, in this case, is instantaneous amputation, or searing the wound with a hot iron, which extinguishes the virus, or prevents it from reaching the sanguiferous system. In this class they place the regulus, the basilisk, and the various kinds of asps, with all those the poison of which is in the highest degree of intensity. This doctrine seems to correspond with the view which the Psalmist and the prophet give us in the passages already quoted, of the adder and cockatrice, or basilisk. It is certain, however, from the authentic statements of different travellers, that some of those serpents, as the asp and the basilisk, which the Arabians place on the list of deaf and unteachable snakes, whose bite admits of no remedy, have been frequently subjected to the power of the charmer; nor is it necessary to refer the words of the inspired writers to this subject, for they nowhere recognise the classification adopted by the Arabian philosophers. The only legitimate conclusion to be drawn from their words, is, that the power of the charmer often fails, whether he try to fascinate the asp, basilisk, or any other kind of serpent. In order to vindicate the sacred writers, it is not necessary to suppose, with the Arabians, that some species of serpents exist, which the charmer endeavours in vain to fascinate; for in operating upon the same species, the success of his incantations may be various.—PAXTON.

Ver. 16. Wo to thee, O land, when thy king is a child, and thy princes eat in the morning!

It is considered to be most gross, most disgraceful, and ruinous, to eat EARLY in the morning: of such a one it is said, "Ah! that fellow was born with his belly."—"The beast eats on his bed!"—"Before the water awakes, that creature begins to take his food," which alludes to the notion that water in the well sleeps in the night. "He only eats and sleeps pandy-pole," i. e. as a pig.—"How can we prosper? he no sooner awakes than he cries, teen! teen!" food! food!—ROBERTS.

Ver. 16. Wo to thee, O land, when thy king is a child, and thy princes eat in the morning!
17. Blessed art thou, O land, when thy king is the son of nobles, and thy princes eat in due season, for strength, and not for drunkenness!

Dr. Russel tells us of the eastern people, that "as soon as they get up in the morning, they breakfast on fried eggs, cheese, honey, leban," &c.

We are not to suppose that when Solomon says, "Wo to thee, O land, when thy king is a child, and thy princes eat in the morning," Eccles. x. 16, that he means absolutely all kinds of eating; but feasting, the indulging themselves such length of time in eating, and drinking proportionably of wine, so as improperly to abridge the hours that should be employed in affairs of government, and perhaps to disqualify themselves for a cool and dispassionate judgment of matters.

This is confirmed by the following words, "Blessed art thou, O land, when thy king is the son of nobles, and thy princes eat in due season, for strength, and not for drunkenness," ver. 17. They may with propriety eat in a morning, bread, honey, milk, fruit, which, in summer, is a common breakfast with them, but it would be wrong then to drink wine as freely as in the close of the day.

Wine being forbidden the Mohammedans by their religion, and only drank by the more licentious among them, in a more private manner, it is not to be expected to appear at their breakfasts; but it is used by others, who are not under such restraints, in the morning, as well as in their other repasts.

So Dr. Chandler tells us, in his Travels in Asia Minor: "In this country, on account of the heat, it is usual to rise with the dawn. About daybreak we received from the French consul, a Greek, with a respectable beard, a present of grapes, the clusters large and rich, with other fruits, all fresh gathered. We had, besides, bread and coffee for breakfast, and good wines, particularly one sort, of an exquisite flavour, called muscadell." If they drank then wine at all in a morning, it ought to be, according to the royal preacher, in small quantities, for strength, not for drunkenness.

The eastern people, Arabians and Turks both, are observed to eat very fast, and, in common, without drinking; but when they feast and drink wine, they begin with fruit and sweetmeats, and drinking wine, and they sit long at table: Wo to the land whose princes so eat in a morning, eating after this manner a great variety of things, and slowly, as they do when feasting, and prolonging the time with wine. So the prophet Isaiah, in like manner, says, ch. v. 11, "Wo unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink, that continue until night, until wine inflame them." Such appears to be the view of Solomon here.

If great men will indulge themselves in the pleasures of the table and of wine, it certainly should be in the evening, when public business is finished.—HARMER.

Ver. 20. Curse not the king, no, not in thy thought; and curse not the rich in thy bedchamber; for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter.

The manner of sending advice by pigeons was this: They took doves, which had a very young and unfledged brood, and carried them on horseback to the place from whence they wished them to return, taking care to let them have a full view. When any advices were received, the correspondent tied a billet to the pigeon's foot, or under the wing, and let her loose. The bird, impatient to see her young, flew off with the utmost impetuosity, and soon arrived at the place of her destination. These pigeons have been known to travel from Alexandretta to Aleppo, a distance of seventy miles, in six hours, and in two days from Bagdad; and when taught, they never fail, unless it be very dark, in which case they usually send two, for fear of mistake. The poets of Greece and Rome, often allude to these winged couriers, and their surprising industry. Anacreon's dove, which he celebrates in his ninth ode, was employed to carry her master's letters; and her fidelity and despatch are eulogized in these lines:

Εγώ δὲ Ἀνακρεῶντι, &c.

"In such things, I minister to Anacreon; and now see what letters I bring him."

It is more than probable, that to this singular custom Solomon alludes in the following passage: "Curse not the king, no, not in thy thought; and curse not the rich in thy bedchamber; for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and they which have wings shall tell the matter." The remote antiquity of the age in which the wise man flourished, is no valid objection; for the customs and usages of Orientals, are almost as permanent as the soil on which they tread. Averse to change, and content, for the most part, with what their fathers have taught them, they transmit the lessons they have received, and the customs they have learned, with little alteration, from one generation to another. The pigeon was employed in carrying messages, and bearing intelligence, long before the coming of Christ, as we know from the odes of Anacreon and other classics; and the custom seems to have been very general, and quite familiar. When, therefore, the character of those nations, and the stability of their customs, are duly considered, it will not be reckoned extravagant to say, Solomon, in this text, must have had his eye on the carrier pigeon.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1. Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days.

I believe Dr. Adam Clarke is right in supposing that this alludes to the sowing of rice. The Tamil translation has it, "Cast thy food upon the waters, and the profit thereof shall be found after many days." Rice fields are so made as to receive and retain the rains of the wet monsoon, or to be watered from the tanks or artificial lakes. The rice prospers the most when the ground, at the time of sowing, is in the state of mud, or covered with a little water. In some lands, the water is allowed first to overflow the whole, and then the roots are just stuck into the mud, leaving the blades to float on the surface. In reaping-time, as the water often remains, the farmer simply lops off the ears. See on Job xxiv. 24.—ROBERTS.

The Arabs have a very similar proverb, "Do good, throw bread into the water, it will one day be repaid thee." The Turks have borrowed it from the Arabs, with a slight alteration, according to which, it is as follows: "Do good, throw bread into the water; even if the fish does not know, yet the Creator knows it." The meaning of the Hebrew, as well as of the Arabic and Turkish proverb, is, "Distribute thy bread to all poor people, whether known or unknown to thee; throw thy bread even into the water, regardless whether it swims, and who may derive advantage from it, whether men or fish; for even this charity, bestowed at a venture, God will repay thee sooner or later."—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 9. Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thy heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.

Herodotus, speaking of the Egyptians, says, that "at the entertainments of the rich, just as the company are about to rise from the repast, a small coffin is carried round, containing a perfect representation of a dead body; it is in size sometimes of one, but never of more than two cubits, and as it is shown to the guests in rotation, the bearer exclaims, Cast your eyes on this figure; after death you yourself will resemble it; drink, then, and be happy."—BURDER.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 4. And the doors shall be shut in the streets, when the sound of the grinding is low; and he shall rise up at the voice of the bird; and all the daughters of music shall be brought low.

It is to the first crowing of the house-cock in the morning, which is before daybreak, that Solomon probably alludes. This well describes the readiness of the restless old man to quit his uneasy bed, since it was much earlier than the usual time of rising. In the East, it was common to all, the young and the healthy, as well as the aged, to rise with the dawn.

The people in the East bake every day, and usually grind their corn as they want it. The grinding is the first work in the morning. This grinding with their mills makes a considerable noise, or rather, as Sir John Chardin says, "the songs of those who work them." May not this help to explain the meaning of this passage, in which the royal preacher, describing the infirmities of old age, among other weaknesses, says, the doors shall be shut in the streets, when the sound of the grinding is low? that is, the feeble old man shall not be able to rise from his bed early in the morning to attend that necessary employment of grinding corn, consequently his doors shall be shut; neither will the noise of their songs, which are usual at that employment, be heard, or when it is heard, it will be only in a low, feeble tone.—BURNER.

Ver. 5. Also when they shall be afraid of that which is high, and fears shall be in the way, and the almond-tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desire shall fail; because man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets.

See on Jer. I. 11, 12.

Ver. 11. The words of the wise are as goads, and as nails fastened by the masters of assemblies, which are given from one shepherd.

It is said, "The words of that judge are quite certain; they are like the driven nails." "I have heard all he has to say, and the effect on my mind is like a nail driven home." "What a speaker! all his words are nails; who will draw them out again!"—ROBERTS.

THE SONG OF SOLOMON.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 5. I am black, but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem; as the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon.

Entertainments are frequently given in the country under tents, which, by the variety of their colours, and the peculiar manner in which they are sometimes pitched, make a very pleasant appearance. To this agreeable custom the spouse probably alludes, in that description of her person: "I am black, but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem; as the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon." The seeming contradiction in the first clause, is easily obviated. The Arabs generally make use of tents covered with black hair-cloth; the other nations around them live in booths, or huts, constructed of reeds and boughs, or other materials, or in tents of different colours. In Palestine, the Turcomans live in tents of white linen cloth; while the Turks, in their encampments, prefer green or red, which have a very pleasing effect in the eye of the traveller. It is only the Arabian tents, or the tents of Kedar, which are uniformly black, or striped. This is the reason the spouse compares herself, not to tents in general, which are of different colours, but to those of Kedar, which are all covered with black hair-cloth, and have therefore a disagreeable appearance. These tents are stretched on three or four pickets, only five or six feet high, which gives them a very flat appearance: at a distance, one of these camps seems only like a number of black spots.

To be black, but comely, involves no contradiction; for it is certain that the face may be discoloured by the sun, to the influence of which the spouse positively ascribes her sable hue, and yet possess an exquisite gracefulness. The Arab women, whom Mr. Wood saw among the ruins of Palmyra, were well shaped, and, although very swarthy, yet had good features. Zenobia, the celebrated queen of that renowned city, was reckoned eminently beautiful; and the description we have of her person answers to that character; her complexion of a dark brown, (the necessary effect of her way of life in that burning climate;) her eyes black and sparkling, and of an uncommon fire; her countenance animated and sprightly in a very high degree; her person graceful and genteel beyond imagination; her teeth white as pearl; her voice clear and strong. Such is the picture which historians have drawn of the beautiful and unfortunate Zenobia; from whence it appears, that a person may be both black and comely; and by consequence, that the description of Solomon, which certainly refers to the moral and religious state and character of the genuine worshipper of Jehovah, is neither incongruous nor exaggerated, but perfectly agreeable to nature. In this case, however, the duskiness of complexion was not natural, but the consequence of exposure to the rays of the sun; for the spouse anticipates the surprise which the daughters of Jerusalem would feel when they beheld her countenance: "Look not upon me, because I am black, because the sun hath looked upon me." Females of distinction in Palestine, and even in Mesopotamia, are not only beautiful and well-shaped, but, in consequence of being always kept from the rays of the sun, are very fair. This fact is attested by D'Arvieux, who was favoured with a sight of several Arabian ladies of high rank. It is not unworthy of notice, that the scripture bears the same testimony concerning the complexion of Sarah, of Rebecca, and of Rachel; they were "beautiful and well-favoured." But the women in general are extremely brown and swarthy in the complexion; although there are not a few of exquisite beauty in these torrid regions, especially among those who are less exposed to the heat of the sun. It is on this account that the prophet Jeremiah, when he would describe a beautiful woman, represents her as one that keeps at home: because those who are desirous to preserve their beauty, go very little abroad. The spouse proceeds, "As the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon." By the last clause may be understood those splendid tents, to which the great monarch, who, by his own confession, denied himself no earthly pleasure, retired in the heats of summer, or when he wished to entertain his nobles and courtiers, or sought the amusement of the chase. Some are of opinion, these curtains refer to the sumptuous hangings which surrounded the bed of the Israelitish king: and their idea receives some countenance from a manuscript note of Dr. Russell's, which states, that mosquito curtains are sometimes suspended over the beds in Syria and Palestine. But since it is common in Hebrew poetry to express nearly the same thought in the second parallel line as in the first; and since it is equally common in scripture to put a pari for the whole,—it is more natural to suppose, that the tents of Solomon are actually meant in this passage; and as we are sure they were extremely magnificent, they might, with great propriety, be introduced here, on account of their beauty.—PAXTON.

Ver. 7. Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon: for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions?

Before noon, the shepherds and their flocks may be seen slowly moving towards some shady banyan, or other tree, where they recline during the heat of the day. The sheep sleep, or lazily chew the cud; and the shepherds plait pouches, mats, or baskets, or in dreamy musings while away their time.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 9. I have compared thee, O my love, to a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots.

This appears a very coarse compliment to a mere English rider, arising from the difference of our manners; but the horse is an animal in very high estimation in the East. The Arabians are extravagantly fond of their horses, and caress them as if they were their children. D'Arvieux gives a diverting account of the affectionate caresses an Arab used to give a mare which belonged to him. He had sold it to a merchant at Rama, and when he came to see it, (which he frequently did,) he would weep over it, kiss its eyes, and when he departed, go backwards, bidding it adieu in the most tender manner. The horses of Egypt are so remarkable for staidness and beauty, as to be sent as presents of great value to the sublime port; and it appears from sacred history, that they were in no less esteem formerly among the kings of Syria, and of the Hittites, as well as Solomon himself, who bought his horses at 150 shekels, which (at Dean Prideaux's calculation of three shillings the shekel) is £22 10s. each, a very considerable price at which to purchase twelve thousand horses together. The qualities which form the beauty of these horses, are tallness, proportionable corpulency, and staidness of manner; the same qualities which they admire in their women, particularly corpulency, which is known to be one of the most esteemed characters of beauty in the East. Niebuhr says, "as plumpness is thought a beauty in the East, the women, in order to obtain this beauty, swallow, every morning and every evening, three of these insects, (a species of tenebriones), fried in butter." Upon this principle is founded the compliment of Solomon; and it is remarkable that the elegant Theocritus, in his epithalamium for the celebrated queen Helen, whom he described as plump and large, uses exactly the same image, comparing her to the horse in the chariots of Thessaly.—BURDER.

Ver. 10. Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, thy neck with chains of gold.

Olearius observes, in his description of the dress of the Persian women, "around the cheeks and chin they have one or two rows of pearls or jewels, so that the whole face is adorned with pearls or jewels. I am aware that this is a very ancient eastern custom; for already in Solomon's song it is said, "thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels," &c. All these Persian court ladies had over their curled locks, instead of pearls, two long and thick cords of woven and beaten gold, hanging down from the crown of the head over the face on both sides; this ornament, because it is worn at court, is quite usual among the Persian women, and does not become them ill, in their black hair." (Della Valla.) Rauwolf gives a similar description of the head-dress of the Arabian women in the desert of Mesopotamia: "When they wish to adorn themselves they have their trinkets, such as balls of marble, and yellow agate, glass beads of divers colours, longish pieces of metal strung upon a thread, hanging pendent upon their temples, nearly a span in length."—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 12. While the King sitteth at his table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof.

See on Mark 14. 3, 5.

Ver. 13. A bundle of myrrh is my well-beloved unto me; he shall lie all night betwixt my breasts.

The eastern women, among other ornaments, used little perfume-boxes, or vessels filled with perfumes, to smell at. These were worn suspended from the neck, and hanging down on the breast. This circumstance is alluded to in the bundle of myrrh. These ofactoriola, or smelling-boxes, (as the Vulgate rightly denominates them,) are still in use among the Persian women, to whose necklaces, which fall below the bosom, is fastened a large box of sweets; some of these boxes are as big as one's hand; the common ones are of gold, the others are covered with jewels. They are all boied through, and filled with a black paste very light, made of musk and amber, but of very strong smell.—BURDER.

Ver. 14. My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire in the vineyards of Engedi.

"A cluster of camphire." This is the al-hennah, or cyprus. It is here mentioned as a perfume, and its clusters are noticed. This beautiful odoriferous plant, if it is not annually cut and kept low, grows ten or twelve feet high, putting out its little flowers in clusters, which yield a most grateful smell, like camphire, and may, therefore, be alluded to, Cant. i. 14. Its plants after they are dried and powdered, are disposed of to good advantage in all the markets of this kingdom, of Tunis. For with this all the African ladies, that can purchase it, tinge their lips, hair, hands, and feet; rendering them thereby of a tawny, saffron colour, which, with them, is reckoned a great beauty. Russel mentions the same practice of dyeing their feet and hands with hennah, as general among all sects and conditions at Aleppo. Hasselquist assures us he saw the nails of some mummies tinged with the al-hennah, which proves the antiquity of the practice. And as this plant does not appear to be a native of Palestine, but of India and Egypt, and seems mentioned, Cant. i. 14, as a curiosity growing in the vineyards of Engedi, it is probable that the Jews might be acquainted with its use as a die or tinge before they had experienced its odoriferous quality, and might, from the former circumstance, give it its name. See more concerning the hennah, or al-hennah, in Harmer's Outlines of a New Commentary on Solomon's Song, p. 218, &c.—BURDER.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1. I am the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valleys.

In the East this flower is extremely fragrant, and has always been much admired. In what esteem it was held by the ancient Greeks, may be seen in the Odes of Anacreon, and the comparisons in Eccles. 24. 14. 18. L. 8. show that the Jews were likewise much delighted with it. "In no country of the world does the rose grow in such perfection as in Persia; in no country is it so cultivated and prized by the natives. Their gardens and courts are crowded with its plants, their rooms ornamented with vases, filled with its gathered bunches, and every bath strewn with the full-blown flowers, plucked from the ever-replenished stems. Even the humblest individual, who pays a piece of copper money for a few whiffs of a kelion, feels a double enjoyment when he finds it stuck with a bud from his dear native tree." (Sir R. K. Porter.)—BURDER.

Ver. 3. As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons. I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste.

In Canaan, and the circumjacent regions, the apple-tree is of no value; and, therefore, seems by no means entitled to the praise with which it is honoured by the spirit of inspiration. The inhabitants of Palestine and Egypt import their apples from Damascus, the produce of their own orchards being almost unfit for use. The tree then, to which the spouse compares her Lord in the Song of Solomon, whose shade was so refreshing, and whose fruit was so delicious, so comforting, so restorative, could not be the apple-tree, whose fruit can hardly be eaten; nor could the apple-tree, which the prophet mentions with the vine, the fig, the palm, and the pomegranate, which furnished the hungry with a grateful repast, the failure of which was considered as a public calamity, be really of that species: "The vine is dried up, the fig-tree languisheth, the pomegranate-tree, the palm-tree, also the apple-tree, even all the trees of the field, are withered; because joy is withered away from the sons of men." M. Forskall says, the apple-tree is extremely rare, and is named uffah by the inhabitants of Palestine. In deference to his authority, the editor of Calcutt, with every disposition to render the original term by the citron, is inclined to revert again to the apple. But if, as Forskall admits, the apple-tree is extremely rare, it cannot, with propriety, be classed with the vine, and other fruit-bearing trees, that are extremely common in Palestine and Syria. And if it grow "with difficulty in hot countries," and required even the "assiduous attention" of such a monarch as Solomon, before it could be raised and propagated, an inspired writer certainly would not number it among the "trees of the field," which, as the phrase clearly implies, can live and thrive without the fostering care of man.

The citron is a large and beautiful tree, always green, perfuming the air with its exquisite odour, and extending a deep and refreshing shade over the panting inhabitants of the torrid regions. Well, then, might the spouse exclaim: "As the citron-tree among the trees of the wood; so is my beloved among the sons. I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste." A more beautiful object can hardly be conceived, than a large and spreading citron, loaded with gold-coloured apples, and clothed with leaves of the richest green. Maundrell preferred the orange garden, or citron grove, at Beeroth, the palace of the Emir Facardine, on the coast of Syria, to every thing else he met with there, although it was only a large quadrangular plot of ground, divided into sixteen smaller squares; but the walks were so shaded with orange-trees, of a large spreading size, and so richly adorned with fruit, that he thought nothing could be more perfect in its kind, or had it been duly cultivated, could have been more delightful. When it is recollected that the difference between citron and orange-trees is not very discernible, excepting by the fruit, both of which, however, have the same golden colour, this passage of Maundrell's may serve as a comment on the words of Solomon, quoted in the beginning of the section.—PAXTON.

Shade, according to Mr. Wood, in his description of the ruins of Balbec, is an essential article in oriental luxury. The greatest people seek these refreshments, as well as the meaner. So Dr. Pococke found the patriarch of the Maronites, (who was one of their greatest families,) and a bishop, sitting under a tree. Any tree that is thick and spreading doth for them; but it must certainly be an addition to their enjoying of themselves, when the tree is of a fragrant nature, as well as shady, which the citron-tree is. Travellers there, we find in their accounts, have made use of plane-trees, walnut-trees, &c., and Egmont and Heyman were entertained with coffee at Mount Sinai, under the orange-trees of the garden of that place.

The people of those countries not only frequently sit under shady trees, and take collations under them, but sometimes the fruit of those trees under which they sit, is shaken down upon them, as an agreeableness. So Dr. Pococke tells us, when he was at Sidon, he was entertained in a garden, in the shade of some apricot-trees, and the fruit of them was shaken upon him. He speaks of it indeed as if it was done as a great proof of their abundance, but it seems rather to have been designed as an agreeable addition to the entertainment.—HARNER.

Ver. 5. Stay me with flagons, comfort me with apples; for I am sick of love.

Dr. Boothroyd:—"Support me with cordials; support me with citrons: for still I languish with love." Dr. A. Clarke:

—"The versions in general understand some kind of ointments or perfumes by the first term," i. e. flagons. "Comfort me with apples;" they had not cordials, as we in England; it is, therefore, probable that the citron or the orange (both of which are believed to be good for the complaint alluded to) is the fruit meant. "I am sick of love." Is it not amusing to see parents and physicians treating this affection as a DISEASE of a very serious nature? It is called the Cama-Câchal, i. e. Cupid's fever, which is said to be produced by a wound inflicted by one of his five arrows. When a young man or woman becomes languid, looks thin, refuses food, seeks retirement, and neglects duties, the father and mother hold grave consultations; they apply to the medical man, and he furnishes them with medicines, which are forthwith to be administered, to relieve the poor patient.

I believe the "versions in general" are right in supposing "ointments or perfumes" are meant, instead of flagons, because they are still considered to be most efficacious in removing the complaint. Thus, when the fever is most distressing, the sufferer is washed with rose-water, rubbed with perfumed oils, and the dust of sandal wood. The margin has, instead of comfort, "straw me with apples;" which probably means the citrons were to be put near to him, as it is believed they imbibe the heat, and consequently lessen the fever. It is also thought to be highly beneficial for the young sufferer to sleep on the tender leaves of the plantain-tree, (banana), or the lotus flowers; and if, in addition, strings of pearls are tied to different parts of the body, there is reason to hope the patient will do well.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 7. I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes, and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please.

See on 2 Sam. 2. 18.

Here again the custom illustrates the passage; it would be considered barbarous in the extreme to awake a person out of his sleep. How often, in going to the house of a native, you are saluted with "Nittera-kulla-karâr," i. e. "He sleeps." Ask them to arouse him: the reply is, "Koodâtha," i. e. "I cannot." Indeed, to request such a thing shows at once that you are griffin, or new-comer. "Only think of that ignorant Englishman: he went to the house of our chief, and being told he was asleep, he said he must see him, and actually made such a noise as to awake him; and then laughed at what he had done."—ROBERTS.

The antelope, like the hind, with which it is so frequently associated in scripture, is a timid creature, extremely jealous and watchful, sleeps little, is easily disturbed, takes alarm on the slightest occasion; and the moment its fears are awakened, it flies, or seems rather to disappear, from the sight of the intruder. Soft and cautious is the step which interrupts not the light slumbers of this gentle and suspicious creature. It is probable, from some hints in the sacred volume, that the shepherd in the eastern desert, sometimes wished to benigne the tedious moments, by contemplating the beautiful form of the sleeping antelope. But this was a gratification he could not hope to enjoy, unless he approached it with the utmost care, and maintained a profound silence. When, therefore, an Oriental charged his companion by the antelope, not to disturb the repose of another, he intimated, by a most expressive and beautiful allusion, the necessity of using the greatest circumspection. This statement imparts a great degree of clearness and energy, to the solemn adjuration which the spouse twice addresses to the daughters of Jerusalem, when she charged them not to disturb the repose of her beloved: "I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes, (the antelopes,) and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please." In this language, which is pastoral, and equally beautiful and significant, the spouse delicately intimates her anxiety to detain her Lord, that she may enjoy the happiness of contemplating his glory; her deep sense of the evil nature and bitter consequences of sin; her apprehension, lest her companions, the members of her family, should by some rash and unholy deed provoke him to depart; and how reasonable it was, that they who coveted the society of that beautiful creature, and were accustomed to watch over its slumbers in guarded silence, should be equally cautious not to disturb the communion which she then enjoyed with her Saviour.—PAXTON.

Ver. 8. The voice of my beloved! behold, he cometh leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills.

See on Ps. 18. 33.

Ver. 8. The voice of my beloved! behold, he cometh leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills. 9. My beloved is like a roe, or a young hart: behold, he standeth behind our wall, he looketh forth at the window, showing himself through the lattice.

Mr. Harmer thinks this means the green wall, as it were, of a kiosque, or eastern arbour, which is thus described by Lady M. W. Montague: "In the midst of the garden is the kiosque, that is, a large room, commonly beautified with a fine fountain in the midst of it. It is raised nine or ten steps, and enclosed with gilded lattices, round which vines, jessamines, and honeysuckles, make a sort of green wall; large trees are planted round this place, which is the scene of their greatest pleasures."—BURDER.

In the Song of Solomon, the spouse more than once compares her beloved to the antelope, particularly alluding to the wonderful elasticity of its limbs, and the velocity with which, by a few leaps, it scales the loftiest precipice, or oouds from one cliff to another. Waiting with eager expectation his promised coming, she hears him at last speaking peace and comfort to her soul; and instantly describes him as hastening, in the ardour of his love, to her relief, and surmounting with ease every obstruction in his way.—PAXTON.

Dr. Russel observes, that the two species of antelopes about Aleppo, in Syria, "are so extremely fleet, that the greyhounds, though very good, can seldom take them, without the assistance of a falcon, unless in soft, deep ground." The following occurrence proves the strong attachment which some of the Arabs cherish for these animals: "A little Arab girl brought a young antelope to sell, which was bought by a Greek merchant, whose tent was next to me, for half a piaster. She had bored both ears, into each of which she had inserted two small pieces of red silk riband. She told the purchaser, that as it could run about and lap milk, he might be able to rear it up; and that she should not have sold it, but that she wanted money to buy a riband, which her mother could not afford her; then almost smothering the little animal with kisses, she delivered it, with tears in her eyes, and ran away. The merchant ordered it to be killed and dressed for supper. In the close of the evening, the girl came to take her last farewell of her little pet, knowing that we were to decamp at daybreak. When she was told that it was killed, she seemed much surprised, saying that it was impossible that anybody could be so cruel as to kill such a pretty creature. On its being shown to her, with its throat cut, she burst into tears, threw the money in the man's face, and ran away crying." (Parson's Travels.)—BURDER.

Ver. 10. My beloved spake, and said unto me, Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away.

11. For, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone.

The Orientals distinguish their winter into two parts, or rather the depth of winter, from the commencement and termination of the season, by the severity of the cold. This, which lasts about forty days, they call Murbania. To this rigorous part of the season, the wise man seems to refer, in that beautiful passage of the Song: "Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away. For, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth: the time of the singing of birds is come; and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land." If we explain this text by the natural phenomena, these words, "the rain is over and gone," cannot be considered as an exposition of the preceding clause, "for, lo, the winter is past;" and as denoting, that the moist part of the year was entirely gone, along with which, Dr. Russel assures us, all rural delights abandon the plains of Syria: but the meaning is, that the Murbania, the depth of winter, is past and over, and the weather become agreeably warm; the rain has just ceased, and consequently, has left the sure and agreeable prospect of undisturbed and pleasant serenity, for several days. It had been no inducement to the spouse to quit her apartments with the view of enjoying the pleasures of the country, to be told, that the rainy season had completely terminated, and the intense heats of summer, under which almost any plant and flower sickens and fades away, had commenced.—PAXTON.

Ver. 12. The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land.

The inhabitants of the great towns of Syria, during the pleasant weather in winter, frequently leave their homes, and give entertainments to their friends under tents, pitched in the country for that purpose. In April, and part of May, they retire to the gardens; and in the heat of summer, receive their guests in the summer-houses, or under the shade of the trees. The same custom seems, from the invitation of the bridegroom, to have prevailed in the land of Canaan in the time of Solomon. The inhabitants of Aleppo make their excursion very early in the season; and the cold weather is not supposed by Solomon to have ceased long before, since it is distinctly mentioned. In Syria, the narcissus flowers during the whole of the Murbania; yacynth and violets, at latest, before it is quite over. Therefore, when Solomon says the flowers appear on the earth, he does not mean the time when the earliest flowers disclose their bloom, but when the verdant turf is thickly studded with all the rich, the gay, and the diversified profusion of an oriental spring. This delightful season is ushered in at Aleppo about the middle of February, by the appearance of a small cranes-bill on the bank of the river, which meanders through its extensive gardens; and a few days after, so rapid is the progress of vegetation, all the beauty of spring is displayed: about the same time, the birds renew their songs. When Thevenot visited Jordan, on the sixteenth of April, he found the little woods on the margin of the river, filled with nightingales in full chorus. This is rather earlier than at Aleppo, where they do not appear till nearly the end of the month. These facts illustrate the strict propriety of Solomon's description, every circumstance of which is accurately copied from nature.—PAXTON.

Ver. 14. O my dove, that art in the clefts of the rock, in the secret places of the stairs, let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice; for sweet is thy voice, and thy countenance is comely.

See on Ps. 68. 13.

The Tamul translation has, instead of "countenance," "form;" "Thy form is comely." Dr. Boothroyd says, "stairs" is certainly improper; but may there not be here an allusion to the ancient custom of building towers in the East, for the purpose of accommodating doves? I have seen one which had stairs inside, (probably to enable a person to ascend and watch for the approach of strangers;) on the outside were numerous holes, in regular order, where the doves concealed themselves, and brought up their young. It is common to call a female by the name of dove, but it refers more to secrecy than beauty. The mother of Ramar said it was necessary for him to go to the desert, but she did not mention the reason to her husband; upon which he said, by way of persuading her to tell him, "Oh! my dove, am I a stranger?"—ROBERTS.

The phrase, which we render the secret places of the stairs, may, with more propriety, be translated, the secret crevices of the precipitous rocks; for the original term signifies a place so high and steep, that it cannot be approached but by ladders. So closely pursued were the people of Israel, and so unable to resist the assault of their enemies, that, like the timid dove, they fled to the fastnesses of the mountains, and the holes of the rocks.—PAXTON.

Ver. 15. Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines; for our vines have tender grapes.

Foxes are observed by many authors to be fond of grapes, and to make great havoc in vineyards. Aristophanes (in his Equites) compares soldiers to foxes, who spoil whole countries, as the others do vineyards. Galen (in his book of Aliments) tells us, that hunters did not scruple to eat the flesh of foxes in autumn, when they were grown fat with feeding on grapes.—BURDEA.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 5. I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes, and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love till he please.

See on ch. 2. 7.

Ver. 6. Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense, with all powders of the merchant?

The use of perfumes at eastern marriages is common; and upon great occasions very profuse. Not only are the garments scented till, in the Psalmist's language, they smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia; it is also customary for virgins to meet, and lead the procession, with silver gilt pots of perfumes; and sometimes aromatics are burned in the windows of all the houses in the streets through which the procession is to pass, till the air becomes loaded with fragrant odours. In allusion to this practice it is demanded, "Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense?" So liberally were these rich perfumes burned on this occasion, that a pillar of smoke ascended from the censers, so high, that it could be seen at a considerable distance; and the perfume was so rich, as to equal in value and fragrance all the powders of the merchant. The custom of burning perfumes on these occasions still continues in the East; for Lady Mary Wortley Montague, describing the reception of a young Turkish bride at the bagnio, says, "Two virgins met ~~at~~ at the door; two others filled silver gilt pots with perfumes, and began the procession, the rest following in pairs, to the number of thirty. In this order they marched round the three rooms of the bagnio." And Maillet informs us, that when the ambassadors of an eastern monarch, sent to propose marriage to an Egyptian queen, made their entrance into the capital of that kingdom, the streets through which they passed were strewed with flowers, and precious odours burning in the windows, from very early in the morning, embalmed the air.—PAXTON.

Ver. 11. Go forth, O ye daughters of Zion, and behold King Solomon with the crown where-with his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals, and in the day of the gladness of his heart.

Such a ceremony as this was customary among the Jews at their marriages. Maillet informs us the crowns were made of different materials. Describing the custom, as practised by the members of the Greek church, who now live in Egypt, he says, "that the parties to be married are placed opposite to a reading-desk, upon which the book of the gospels is placed, and upon the book two crowns, which are made of such materials as people choose, of flowers, of cloth, or of tinsel. There he (the priest) continues his benedictions and prayers, into which he introduces all the patriarchs of the Old Testament. He after that places these crowns, the one on the head of the bridegroom, the other on that of the bride, and covers them both with a veil." After some other ceremonies, the priest concludes the whole by taking off their crowns, and dismissing them with prayers.—BURDEA.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 9. Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse; thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes, with one chain of thy neck.

There is a singularity in this imagery, which has much perplexed the critics; and perhaps it is not possible to ascertain the meaning of the poet beyond a doubt. Supposing the royal bridegroom to have had a profie, or sprofile, or side view of his bride, in the present instance, only one eye, or one side of her necklace, would be observable; yet this charms and overpowers him. Tertullian mentions a custom in the East, of women unweaving only one eye in conversation, while they keep the other covered; and Niebuhr mentions a like custom in some parts of Arabia. This brings us to nearly the same interpretation as the above. (Williams.)—BURDEA.

Ver. 12. A garden enclosed is my sister, my spouse; a spring shut up, a fountain sealed.

This morning we went to see some remarkable places in the neighbourhood of Bethlehem. The first place that we directed our course to, was those famous fountains, pools, and gardens, about an hour and a quarter distant from Bethlehem, southward, said to have been the contrivance and delight of King Solomon. To these works and places of pleasure, that great prince is supposed to allude, Eccl. ii. 5, 6, where, among the other instances of his magnificence, he reckons up his gardens, and vineyards, and pools. As for the pools, they are three in number, lying in a row above each other, being so disposed that the waters of the uppermost may descend into the second, and those of the second into the third. Their figure is quadrangular; the breadth is the same in all, amounting to about ninety paces; in their length there is some difference between them, the first being about one hundred and sixty paces long, the second two hundred, the third two hundred and twenty. They are all lined with wall, and plastered, and contain a great depth of water. Close by the pools is a pleasant castle of a modern structure; and at about the distance of one hundred and forty paces from them is a fountain, from which, principally, they derive their waters. This the friars will have to be that sealed fountain, to which the holy spouse is compared, Cant. iv. 12, and, in confirmation of this opinion, they pretend a tradition, that King Solomon shut up these springs, and kept the door of them sealed with his signet, to the end that he might preserve the waters for his own drinking, in their natural freshness and purity. Nor was it difficult thus to secure them, they rising under ground, and having no avenue to them but by a little hole, like to the mouth of a narrow well. Through this hole they descend directly down, but not without some difficulty, for about four yards, and then arrive in a vaulted room, fifteen paces long, and eight broad. Joining to this is another room, of the same fashion, but somewhat less. Both these rooms are covered with handsome stone arches, very ancient, and perhaps the work of Solomon himself. Below the pools here runs down a narrow rocky valley, enclosed on both sides with high mountains. This the friars will have to be the enclosed garden alluded to in the same place of the Canticles before cited. What truth there may be in this conjecture, I cannot absolutely pronounce. As to the pools, it is probable enough they may be the same with Solomon's; there not being the like store of excellent spring-water to be met with anywhere else throughout all Palestine. (Maundrell.)—BURDEA.

Férouz, a vizier, having divorced his wife Chemsennissa, on suspicion of criminal conversation with the sultan, the brothers of Chemsennissa applying for redress to their judge, "My lord," said they, "we had rented to Férouz a most delightful garden, a terrestrial paradise; he took possession of it, encompassed with high walls, and planted with the most beautiful trees, that bloomed with flowers and fruit. He has broken down the walls, plucked the tender flowers, devoured the finest fruit, and would now restore to us this garden, robbed of every thing that contributed to render it delicious, when we gave him admission to it." Férouz, in his defence, and the sultan in his attention to Chemsennissa's innocence, still carry on the same allegory of the garden, as may be seen in the author.—BURDEA.

Ver. 16. Awake, O north wind, and come, thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out. Let my beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits.

The suffocating heats wafted on the wings of the south wind from the glowing sands of the desert, are felt more or less in all the oriental regions; and even in Italy itself, although far distant from the terrible wastes of the neighbouring continents, where they produce a general languor, and difficulty of respiration. A wind so fatal or injurious to the people of the East, must be to them an object of alarm or dismay. Yet, in the Song of Solomon, its pestilential blast is invited by the spouse to come and blow upon her garden, and waft its fragrance to her beloved. If the south winds in Judea are as oppressive as they are in Barbary and Egypt, and as the winds from the desert are at Aleppo, (which, according to Russel, are of the same nature as the south winds in Canaan;) or if they are only very hot, as Le Bruin certainly found them in October, would the spouse have desired the north wind to depart, as Bochart renders it, and the south wind to blow? The supposition cannot be admitted. An inspired writer never departs from the strictest truth and propriety in the use of figures, according to the rules of oriental composition; and therefore a meaning directly opposite must be the true one, to correspond with the physical character of that wind. The nature of the prayer also requires a different version; for is it to be supposed that the spouse, in the same breath, would desire two directly opposite winds to blow upon her garden? It now remains to inquire, if the original text will admit of another version; and it must be evident, that the only difficulty lies in the term which we render, Come thou. Now the verb bo, signifies both to come and to depart; literally, to remove from one place to another. In this sense of going or departing, it is used in the prophecies of Jonah twice in one verse: "He found a ship (baa) going to Tarshish; so he paid the fare thereof, and went down into it (labo) to go with them." It occurs again in this sense in the book of Ruth, and is so rendered in our translation: "He went (vayabo) to lie down at the end of the heap of corn." The going down or departure of the sun, is expressed by a derivative of the same verb in the book of Deuteronomy: "Are they not on the other side Jordan, by the way where the sun goeth down?" Joshua uses it in the same sense: "Unto the great sea, (Mebo,) towards the going down of the sun, shall be your coast." The passage, then, under consideration, may be rendered in this manner, putting the address to the south wind in a parenthesis: Arise, O north wind, (retire, thou south,) blow upon my garden, let the spices thereof flow forth, that my beloved may come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits.

This conclusion, were any confirmation necessary to establish so plain a truth, is verified by the testimony of Le Bruin, already quoted, who, in the course of his travels in Palestine, found, from experience, that it produced an oppressive heat, not the gentle and inviting warmth which Sanctius supposed. No traveller, so far as the writer has been able to discover, gives a favourable account of the south wind; consequently, it cannot be an object of desire; the view therefore which Harmer first gave of this text, is, in every respect, entitled to the preference: "Awake, O north wind, (depart, thou south,) blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out."—PAXTON.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 2. I sleep, but my heart waketh: it is the voice of my beloved that knocketh, saying, Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled: for my head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night.

See on ch. 6. 9.

Ver. 4. My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door, and my bowels were moved for him.

In the capital of Egypt, also, all their locks and keys are of wood; they have none of iron, not even for their city gates, which may with ease be opened without a key. The keys, or bits of timber, with little pieces of wire, lift up other pieces of wire that are in the lock, and enter into certain little holes, out of which the ends of the wires that are in the key have just expelled the corresponding wires, upon which the gate is opened. But to accomplish this, a key is not necessary; the Egyptian lock is so imperfectly made, that one may without difficulty open it with his finger, armed with a little soft paste. The locks in Canaan, at one time, do not seem to have been made with greater art, if Solomon allude to the ease with which they were frequently opened without a key; "My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door, and my bowels were moved for him."—PAXTON.

Ver. 5. I rose up to open to my beloved; and my hands dropped with myrrh, and my fingers with sweet-smelling-myrrh, upon the handles of the lock.

When the spouse rose from her bed to open to her beloved, her hand dropped myrrh, (balsam,) and her fingers sweet-smelling myrrh, on the handles of the lock. In this remark, she seems to allude rather to a liquid than a powder; for the word rendered dropped, signifies to distil as the heavens or the clouds do rain, or as the mountains are said to distil new wine from the vines planted there, or as the inverted cups of lilies shed their roscid or honey drops. The same term is figuratively applied to words or discourse, which are said to distil as the dew, and drop as the rain; but still the allusion is to some liquid. As a noun, it is the name of stacte, or myrrh, distilling from the tree of its own accord, without incision. Again, the word rendered sweet-smelling signifies passing off, distilling, or trickling down; and, therefore, in its present connexion, more naturally refers to a fluid than to a dry powder. If these observations be just, it will not be difficult to ascertain the real sense of the passage.

When the spouse rose from her bed, to open the door of her apartment, she hastily prepared to receive her beloved, by washing herself with myrrh and water; or, according to an established custom in the East, by anointing her head with liquid essence of balsam; a part of which, in either case, might remain on her hands and fingers, and from them trickle down on the handles of the lock.—PAXTON.

Ver. 7. The watchmen that went about the city found me, they smote me, they wounded me; the keepers of the walls took away my veil from me.

See on Ezek. 33. 2.

They plucked off her veil, in order to discover who she was. It is well known that the eunuchs, in the eastern countries, are at present authorized to treat the females under their charge in this manner.—BURNE.

Ver. 10. My beloved is white and ruddy, the chiefest among ten thousand.

In our translation, the church represents her Saviour as the standard-bearer in the armies of the living God. "My beloved is white and ruddy, the chiefest among ten thousand;" or, according to the margin, a standard-bearer among ten thousand. These phrases are made synonymous, on the groundless supposition that a standard-bearer is the chief of the company; for among the modern Orientals, a standard-bearer is not the chief, more than among the nations of Europe. He is, on the contrary, the lowest commissioned officer in the corps who bears the colours. This, however, seems to be merely a mistake of our translators, in rendering the phrase dagul meribabah. If we understand by the word dagul, such a flag as is carried at the head of our troops, then, as the Hebrew participle is the pahul, which has a passive, and not an active sense, it must signify one before whom a standard is borne; not the person who lifts up and displays it, but him in whose honour the standard is displayed. It was not a mark of superior dignity in the East to display the standard, but it was a mark of dignity and honour to have the standard carried before one; and the same idea seems to be entertained in other parts of the world. The passage then, is rightly translated thus: My beloved is white and ruddy, and honourable, as one before whom, or around whom, ten thousand standards are borne.

The compliment is returned by her Lord in these words: "Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah, comely as Jerusalem, terrible as an army with banners;" and again, "Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, terrible as an army with banners?" Mr. Harmer imagines that these texts refer to a marriage procession, surrounded with flambeaux. But what is terrible in a company of women, even although "dressed in rich attire, surrounded with nuptial flambeaux," blazing ever so fiercely! Besides, his vine sinks the last member of the comparison, and, indeed, seems to throw over it an air of ridicule: Who is this that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and dazzling, like a bride lighted home with flambeaux? The common translation certainly sustains much better the dignity of the last clause, while it gives the genuine meaning of (עֵין) aim, which, in every passage of scripture where it occurs, signifies either terrible, or the tumult and confusion of mind which terror produces.—PAXTON.

Ver. 12. His eyes are as the eyes of doves by the rivers of water, washed with milk, and fitly set.

Hebrew, for fitly set, "sitting in fulness;" that is, "fitly placed, and set as a precious stone in the foil of a ring." "See that youth, what a beautiful eye he has! it is like a sapphire set in silver;" which means, the metal represents the white and the blue, the other part of the eye. The eyes of their more sacred idols are made of precious stones. "Washed with milk." Though people thus wash themselves after a funeral, the custom is also spoken of by way of figure, as a matter of great joy. "Oh! yes, they are a happy pair; they wash themselves with milk." "The joy is as great as being bathed in milk." But some do thus actually wash their bodies three or four times a month, and the effect is said to be cooling and pleasing. I suppose, however, it arises as much from an idea of luxury, as any other cause. The residence of the god Vishnoo is said to be surrounded by a SEA OF MILK, which may also be another reason to induce the devotee thus to bathe himself.—ROBERTS.

The eyes of a dove, always brilliant and lovely, kindle with peculiar delight by the side of a crystal brook, for this is her favourite haunt; here she loves to wash and to quench her thirst. But the inspired writer seems to intimate, that not satisfied with a single rivulet, she delights especially in those places which are watered with numerous streams, whose full flowing tide approaches the height of the banks, and offers her an easy and abundant supply. They seem as if they were washed with milk, from their shining whiteness; and fitly, rather fully set, like a gem set in gold, neither too prominent nor too depressed, but so formed as with nice adaptation to fill up the socket.—PAXTON.

Ver. 15. His legs are as pillars of marble set upon sockets of fine gold; his countenance is as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars.

"His thighs are as pillars of marble, fixed upon pedestals of fine gold;" alluding to his sandals bound on his feet with golden ribands; or, perhaps, expressive of the feet themselves, as being of a redder tincture than the legs and thighs. The Asiatics used to tie their feet of a deep red colour. Thus the lover in Gitagovinda says, O dam-el, shall I die red with the juice of alactaea, those beautiful feet, which will make the full-blown land lotos bluish with shame? (Sir W. Jones.)—BURDES.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 4. Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah; comely as Jerusalem; terrible as an army with banners.

This and the next chapter give an idea of what were the notions of beauty in the bride: she was like the city of Tirzah, belonging to the tribe of Ephraim. A handsome Hindoo female is compared to the sacred city of Seedambaram. The following, also, are signs of beauty in an eastern woman: her skin is the colour of gold; her hands, nails, and soles of the feet, are of a reddish hue; her limbs must be smooth, and her gait like the stately swan. Her feet are small, like the beautiful lotus; her waist is slender as the lightning; her arms are short, and her fingers resemble the five petals of the kantha flower; her breasts are like the young cocoa-nut, and her neck is as the trunk of the areca-tree. Her mouth is like the ambal flower, and her lips as coral; her teeth are like beautiful pearls; her nose is high, and lifted up, like that of the chameleon, (when raised to snuff the wind;) her eyes are like the sting of a wasp, and the karungu-vally flower; her brows are like the bow, and nicely separated; and her hair is as the black cloud.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 9. My dove, my undefiled, is but one: she is the only one, of her mother, she is the choice one of her that bare her.

The conjugal chastity of the dove has been celebrated by every writer, who has described or alluded to her character. She admits but of one mate; she never forsakes him till death puts an end to their union; and never abandons her own accord, the nest which their united labour has provided. Ælian, and other ancient writers, affirm, that the turtle and the wood-pigeon punish adultery with death. The black pigeon, when her mate dies, obstinately rejects the embraces of another, and continues in a widowed state for life. Hence, among the Egyptians, a black pigeon was the symbol of a widow who declined to enter again into the marriage relation. This fact was so well known, or at least so generally admitted among the ancients, that Tertulian endeavours to establish the doctrine of monogamy by the example of that bird. These facts have been transferred by later authors to the widowed turtle, which, deaf to the solicitations of another mate, continues, in mournful strains, to deplore her loss, till death puts a period to her sorrows. These facts unfold the true reason, that the church is by Solomon so frequently compared to the dove.—PAXTON.

Ver. 11. I went down into the garden of nuts, to see the fruits of the valley, and to see whether the vine flourished, and the pomegranates budded.

See on ch. 7. II, 12.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1. How beautiful are thy feet with shoes, O prince's daughter! the joints of thy thighs are like jewels, the work of the hands of a cunning workman.

The word rendered joints means the concealed dress, or drawers, which are still worn by the Moorish and Turkish women of rank. Lady M. W. Montague, in describing her Turkish dress, says, "the first part of my dress is a pair of drawers, very full, that reaches down to my shoes, and conceals the legs more modestly than your petticoats; they are of a thin, rose-coloured damask, brocaded with flowers."—BURDES.

Ver. 3. Thy two breasts are like two young roes that are twins.

See on ch. 2. 8.

Ver. 4. Thy neck is as a tower of ivory; thine eyes like the fish-pools in Heshbon, by the gate of Bathrabbim; thy nose is as the tower of Lebanon, which looketh towards Damascus.

Whatever is majestic and comely in the human countenance; whatever commands the reverence, and excites the love of the beholder,—Lebanon, and its towering cedars, are employed by the sacred writers to express. In the commendation of the church, the countenance of her Lord is as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars: while in the eulogium which he pronounces on his beloved, one feature of her countenance is compared to the highest peak of that mountain, to the Sannin, which rises, with majestic grandeur, above the tallest cedars that adorn its summits: "Thy nose is as the tower of Lebanon, which looketh towards Damascus." Calmet imagines, with no small degree of probability, that the sacred writer alludes to an elegant tower of white marble, which, in his days, crowned the summit of a lofty precipice, at the foot of which the river Barrady flows, about the distance of two miles from Damascus. When Maundrell visited the place, he found a small structure, like a sheik's sepulchre, erected on the highest point of the precipice, where it had probably stood. From this elevated station, which forms a part of Lebanon, the traveller enjoyed the most perfect view of the city. So charming was the landscape, so rich and diversified the scenery, that he confessedly found it no easy matter to tear himself away from the paradise of delights which bloomed at his feet. Nor was a very late traveller less delighted with this most enchanting prospect.—PAXTON.

Ver. 5. Thy head upon thee is like Carmel, and the hair of thy head like purple; the King is held in the galleries.

The only remarkable mountain on the western border of Canaan, is Carmel, which lies on the seacoast, at the south end of the tribe of Asher, and is frequently mentioned in the sacred writings. On this mountain, which is very rocky, and about two thousand feet in height, the prophet Elijah fixed his residence; and the monks of the Greek church, who have a convent upon it, show the inquisitive stranger the grotto, neatly cut out in the solid rock, where, at a distance from the tumult of the world, the venerable seer reposed. At the distance of a league are two fountains, which they pretend the prophet, by his miraculous powers, made to spring out of the earth; and lower down, towards the foot of the mountain, is the cave where he instructed the people. It is an excavation in the rock, cut very smooth, both above and below, of about twenty paces in length, fifteen in breadth, and very high; and Thevenot, who paid a visit to the monks of Mount Carmel, pronounces it one of the finest grottoes that can be seen. The beautiful shape and towering height of Carmel, furnish Solomon with a striking simile, expressive of the loveliness and majesty of the church in the eyes of her Redeemer: "Thy head upon thee is like Carmel, and the hair of thy head like purple; the King is held in the galleries." The mountain itself is nothing but rock. The monks, however, have with great labour covered some parts of it with soil, on which they cultivate flowers and fruits of various kinds; but the fields around have been celebrated in all ages for the extent of their pastures, and the richness of their verdure. So great was the fertility of this region, that, in the language of the sacred writers, the name, Carmel, is often equivalent to a fruitful field. This was undoubtedly the reason that the covetous and churlish Nabal chose it for the range of his numerous flocks and herds.—PAXTON.

Ver. 8. I said, I will go up to the palm-tree, I will take hold of the boughs thereof; now also thy breasts shall be as clusters of the vine, and the smell of thy nose like apples.

See on ch. 2. 3.

Ver. 11. Come, my beloved, let us go forth into the field; let us lodge in the village. 12. Let us get up early to the vineyards; let us see if the vine flourish, whether the tender grape appear, and the pomegranates bud forth: there will I give thee my loves.

In the gardens around Aleppo, commodious villas are built, for the use of the inhabitants, to which they retire during the oppressive heats of summer. Here, amid the wild and almost impervious thickets of pomegranate, and other fruit-bearing trees, the languid native and exhausted traveller find a delightful retreat from the scorching beams of the sun. A similar custom of retiring into the country, and taking shelter in the gardens, at that season, appears to have been followed in Palestine, in ages very remote.

The exquisite pleasure which an Oriental feels, while he reclines under the deep shade of the pomegranate, the apple, and other fruitful trees, in the Syrian gardens, which, uniting their branches over his head, defend him from the glowing firmament, is well described by Russel. "Revived by the freshening breeze, the purring of the brooks, and the verdure of the groves, his ear will catch the melody of the nightingale, delightful beyond what is heard in England; with conscious gratitude to heaven, he will recline on the simple mat, and bless the hospitable shelter. Beyond the limits of the gardens, hardly a vestige of verdure remains the fields are turned into a parched and naked waste." In Persia, Mr. Martyn found the heat of the external air quite intolerable. In spite of every precaution, the moisture of the body being soon quite exhausted, he grew restless, and thought he should have lost his senses, and concluded, that though he might hold out a day or two, death was inevitable. Not only the actual enjoyment of shade and water diffuses the sweetest pleasure through the panting bosom of an Oriental, but what is almost inconceivable to the native of a northern clime, even the very idea, the simple recurrence of these gratifications to the mind, conveys a lively satisfaction, and a renovating energy to his heart, when ready to fail him in the midst of the burning desert. "He who smiles at the pleasure we received," says Lichtenstein, "from only being reminded of shade, or thinks this observation trivial, must feel the force of an African sun, to have an idea of the value of shade and water."—PAXTON.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 2. I would lead thee, and bring thee into my mother's house, who would instruct me: I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine of the juice of my pomegranate.

The fragrant odour of the wines produced in the vineyards of Lebanon, seems chiefly to have attracted the notice of our translators. This quality is either factitious or natural. The Orientals, not satisfied with the fragrance emitted by the essential oil of the grape, frequently put spices into their wines, to increase their flavour. To this practice Solomon alludes in these words: "I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine of the juice of my pomegranate." But Savary, in his Letters on Greece, affirms, that various kinds of naturally perfumed wines, are produced in Crete and some of the neighbouring islands; and the wine of Lebanon, to which the sacred writer alludes, was probably of the same species.—PAXTON.

Ver. 6. Set me as a seal upon thy heart, as a seal upon thine arm: for love is strong as death; jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame.

When a husband is going to a distant country, the wife says to him, "Ah! place me as a seal upon thy heart," i. e. let me be impressed on thy affections, as the seal leaves its impression upon the wax. "Let not your arms embrace another; let me only be sealed there:" "for love is strong as death, jealousy is cruel as the grave."—ROBERTS.

This alludes to jewels, having the name or portrait of the beloved person engraved on it, and worn next the heart, or on the arm. In the pictures of the eastern princesses and heroines, there is sometimes a large square jewel on the forepart of the arm, a little below the shoulder. "When all the persons had assembled in the divan, every one remained sitting or standing in his place without moving, till in about half an hour came two kapudschis, one of whom carried the imperial signet-ring, and presented it to the grand vizier, who arose from his sofa, and received the signet-ring with a kind of bow, kissed it, put it on his hand, took it off again, and put it in the bag in which it had been before, and placed both in a pocket at the left side of his kaftan, as it were upon his heart." (Schultz.)—ROSENMULLER.

Ver. 14. Make haste, my beloved, and be thou like to a roe, or to a young hart, upon the mountains of spices.

See on ch. 2. 8, 9.

ISAIAH.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 3. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib: but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider.

"Ah! my children, my cows and my sheep know me well; but you cease to acknowledge me." "Alas! alas! my cattle know me better than my wife; I will go and live with them, for their love is sincere to me. I will not remain any longer in such a family; henceforth the affectionate cattle shall be my companions, they shall be my children."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 8. And the daughter of Zion is left as a cottage in a vineyard, as a lodge in a garden of cucumbers, as a besieged city.

This was a little temporary hut, covered with boughs, straw, turf, or the like materials, for a shelter from the heat by day, and the cold and dews by night, for the watchman that kept the garden, or vineyard, during the short season while the fruit was ripening, (Job xxvii. 18.) and presently removed when it had served that purpose. The eastern people were probably obliged to have such a constant watch to defend the fruit from the jackals. "The jackal," says Hasselquist, "is a species of mustela, which is very common in Palestine, especially during the vintage, and often destroys whole vineyards, and gardens of cucumbers."—BURDELL.

Ver. 9. Except the LORD of hosts had left unto us a very small remnant, we should have been as Sodom, and we should have been like unto Gomorrah.

See on Job 4. 9.

Ver. 18. Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool.

This, by many, is believed to refer to the strength of the colour, and to the difficulty of discharging it: and though I do not presume to contradict that opinion, it may perhaps be suggested to have an additional meaning. Dr. Adam Clarke says, "Some copies have (כֶּסֶם) ke-shanim, like crimson garments."

The iniquities of Israel had become very great. In the 10th verse the rulers are addressed as if of Sodom and Gomorrah; and in the 21st, it is said the faithful city had become a HARLOT. In the 29th, "They shall be ashamed of the oaks which ye have desired, and ye shall be confounded for the gardens that ye have chosen." Is it not certain that these references to Sodom, to a harlot, and the gardens, allude to the wickedness, the idolatry, and the union which Israel had formed with the heathen? For what purposes were the gardens or groves used, of which the frequenters were to be ashamed? No doubt, for the same as those in the East at the present day. The courtesans of the temples receive those in the groves, who are ashamed to go to their houses. Those wretched females are called Soti-kilikal, i. e. parrots of the grove. "The wicked world is always gathering flowers in the grove." "Thou hideous wretch! no one will marry thee; thou art not fit for the grove." (See on chap. lxi. 17.)

Scarlet, or crimson, was the favourite colour of the ancient heathen prostitutes. (Jer. iv. 30.) "And when thou art spoiled, what wilt thou do? Though thou clovest thyself with crimson, though thou deckest thee with ornaments of gold, though thou rentest thy face with painting, in vain shalt thou make thyself fair; thy lovers will despise thee." This is an exact description of the dress, and other modes of allurements, used by a female of the same character, at this day. (Rev. xvii. 4.) "The woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls; having a golden cup in her hand, full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication: And upon her forehead was a name written, Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots and Abominations of the Earth." In that most vivid description of Ezekiel (chap. xxii.) of the idolatries of Samaria and Jerusalem, they are represented as TWO HARLOTS, and there such disclosures are made as convey a most frightful picture of the depravity of the people. "She increased her whoredoms: for when she saw men portrayed upon the wall, the images of the Chaldeans portrayed with vermilion." Her paramours, also, were "exceeding in diet attire upon their heads." The sacred prostitutes of the temple always have their garments of scarlet, crimson, or vermilion.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 22. Thy silver is become dross, thy wine mixed with water.

This is an image used for the adulteration of wine with more propriety than may at first appear, if what Thevenot says of the people of the Levant of late times, were true of them formerly. "They never mingle water with their wine to drink, but drink by itself what water they think proper for abating the strength of the wine." It is remarkable, that whereas the Greeks and Latins, by mixed wine, always understood wine diluted and lowered with water, the Hebrews, on the contrary, generally mean by it, wine made stronger and more intoxicating, by the addition of higher and more powerful ingredients, such as honey, spices, defrutum, (or wine inspissated by boiling it down to two thirds, or one half of the quantity,) myrrh, mandragora, opiates, and other strong drugs. Such were the exhilarating, or rather stupefying ingredients, which Helen mixed in the bowl, together with the wine, for her guests oppressed with grief, to raise their spirits, the composition of which she had learned in Egypt. Such was the spiced wine mentioned Solomon's Song viii. 2; and how much the eastern people, to this day, deal in artificial liquors of prodigious strength, the use of wine being forbidden, may be seen in a curious chapter of Kempfer, upon that subject.—LOWTH.

Ver. 25. And I will turn my hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away all thy tin.

The propriety of the denunciation will appear from the following circumstance: "Silver, of all the metals, suffers most from an admixture of tin, a very small quantity serving to make that metal as brittle as glass; and, what is worse, being with difficulty separated from it again. The very vapour of tin has the same effect as the metal itself, on silver, gold, and copper, rendering them brittle." (New and Complete Dictionary of Arts, art. Tin.)—BURDELL.

Ver. 29. For they shall be ashamed of the oaks which ye have desired, and ye shall be confounded for the gardens that ye have chosen.

In the language of the Hebrews, every place where plants and trees were cultivated with greater care than in the open field, was called a garden. The idea of such an enclosure was certainly borrowed from the garden of Eden, which the bountiful Creator planted for the reception of his favour's creature. The garden of Hesperides, in eastern fable, was protected by an enormous serpent; and the gardens of Adonis, among the Greeks, may be traced to the same origin; for the terms "horti Adonides," the gardens of Adonis, were used by the ancients to signify gardens of pleasure, which corresponds with the name of Paradise, or the garden of Eden, as horti Adonis answers to the garden of the Lord. Besides, the gardens of primitive nations were commonly, if not in every instance, devoted to religious purposes. In these shady retreats were celebrated, for a long succession of ages, the rites of pagan superstition. Thus, Jehovah calls the apostate Jews, "a people that provoked me continually to anger to my face, that sacrificeth in gardens." And in a preceding chapter, the prophet threatens them in the name of the Lord: "They shall be ashamed of the oaks which ye have desired, and ye shall be confounded for the gardens which ye have chosen." The inspired writer not only mentions these gardens, but also makes a clear allusion to the tree of life, or rather of knowledge, both of which were placed in the midst of Paradise.—PAXTON.

Ver. 30. For ye shall be as an oak whose leaf fadeth, and as a garden that hath no water.

See on Ps. 1. 3.

In the hotter parts of the eastern countries, a constant supply of water is so absolutely necessary for the cultivation, and even for the preservation and existence of a garden, that should it want water but for a few days, every thing in it would be burnt up with the heat, and totally destroyed. There is therefore no garden whatever in those countries, but what has such a certain supply, either from some neighbouring river, or from a reservoir of water collected from springs, or filled with rain-water in the proper season, in sufficient quantity to afford ample provision for the rest of the year.—BURDER.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 4. And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

See on Joel 3. 10.

Ver. 8. Their land also is full of idols: they worship the work of their own hands, that which their own fingers have made.

This is a true and literal description of India; the traveller cannot proceed a mile, through an inhabited country, without seeing idols and vestiges of idolatry in every direction. See their vessels, their implements of husbandry, their houses, their furniture, their ornaments, their sacred trees, their domestic and public temples; and they all declare that the land is full of idols.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 13. And upon all the cedars of Lebanon, that are high and lifted up, and upon all the oaks of Bashan.

See on Deut. 3. 25.

Ver. 20. In that day a man shall cast his idols of silver, and his idols of gold, which they made each one for himself to worship, to the moles, and to the bats.

This, no doubt, refers to the total destruction of idolatry. "To the bats," (Præls), those of the smaller species; as the larger are eaten by the Hindoos, and were also used as an article of food by the Assyrians. The East may be termed the country of bats; they hang by hundreds and thousands in caves, ruins, and under the roofs of large buildings. To enter such places, especially after rain, is most offensive. I have lived in rooms where it was sickening to remain, on account of the smell produced by those creatures, and whence it was almost impossible to expel them. What from the appearance of the creature, its sunken diminutive eye, its short legs, (with which it cannot walk), its leather-like wings, its half-hairy, oily skin, its offensive ordure ever and anon dropping on the ground, its time for food and sport, darkness, "when evil spirits also range abroad," makes it one of the most disgusting creatures to the people of the East. No wonder, then, that its name is used by the Hindoos (as by the prophet) for an epithet of contempt. When a house ceases to please the inhabitants, on account of being haunted, they say, (and also do,) give it to the bats. "Alas! alas! my wife and children are dead; my houses, my buildings, are all given to the bats." "The bats are now the possessors of the once splendid mansions of royalty." People ask, when passing a tenanted house, "Why is this habitation given to the bats?" "Go, miscreant, go, or I will give thee to the bats." "The old magic an has been swearing we shall all be given to the bats."—ROBERTS.

The bat is a winged quadruped, the link which connects the four-footed animal and the bird. It is a most deformed and hideous creature, which uniformly endeavours to shun the light of day, as if conscious of its disgusting aspect, and fixes its abode in the horrid cavern, or the ruined habitation. The great, or Ternat bat, belongs to the East, and was not altogether unknown to the ancients. It is noted for its cruelty, voracity, and filthiness. It is more mischievous than any other species of bat; but it carries on the work of destruction by open force, both during the night and day. It kills poultry and small birds; attacks men, and of en wounds them in the face. This unsightly animal, says Forbes, fixes its dwelling among owls and noxious reptiles in the desolate tower, or lonely, unfrequented mausoleum, which it seldom or never leaves, except in the dusk of evening. In the East, where they grow to an enormous size, their stench is so intolerable that it is impossible to remain many seconds to examine the place. Into the vault or trench of the mole, and those dismal abodes frequented by the Ternat bats, which man can scarcely endure to visit, the idolater, terrified by the destructive judgments of a just and righteous God, shall cast his idols of silver, and his idols of gold, which he made for himself to worship; regardless of their intrinsic value, ashamed of the trust be reposed in them, and distracted by the terrors of the Almighty, he shall cast them in desperation and scorn out of his sight, that, freed from the useless encumbrance, he may escape for his life. "In that day a man shall cast his idols of silver, and his idols of gold, which they made each one for himself to worship, to the moles, and to the bats." Instead of building magnificent temples for their reception, where nothing to offend the senses is permitted to enter; instead of watching over them with scrupulous care, devoting their days, their riches, and all they possess, to their service, instead of adoring them with insensate prostrations and offerings, they shall cast them to creatures so vile or dangerous, into places so dismal and loathsome, as to preclude the possibility of returning to their idolatrous practices. Or to cast their idols to the moles and the bats, may signify the utter destruction of these objects of worship. When the Greeks said, Εὐδὴ ἔς κορακίς, cast him to the ravens, the meaning was, cast him to destruction; and this prophecy may refer to a proverbial expression among the Jews of similar import.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 15. What mean ye that ye beat my people to pieces, and grind the faces of the poor? saith the LORD God of hosts.

"Ah! my lord, do not thus crush my face: alas! alas! my nose and other features will soon be rubbed away. Is my face to be made quite flat with grinding? My heart is squeezed, my heart is squeezed. That head man has been grinding the faces of all his people."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 16. Moreover, the LORD saith, Because the daughters of Zion are haughty, and walk with stretched-forth necks and wanton eyes, walking, and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet.

In this, and the next eight verses, we have an accurate description of the ornaments and manners of a Hindoo dancing girl. These females are given by their parents, when they are about seven years of age, to the temples, for the purposes of being taught to sing the praises of the gods; of dancing before them, during some of their services, or when taken out in procession; and to be given to the embraces of the priests and people. Near the temples and the topes, i. e. groves, are houses built for their accommodation, and there they are allowed to receive their paramours. When they become too old for the duties of their profession, their business is to train the young ones for their diabolical services and pleasures.

"Walk with stretched-forth necks." When the females dance, they stretch forth their necks, and hold them awry, as if their heads were about to fall off their shoulders. "And wanton eyes." The margin, "deceiving with their eyes." As the votaries glide along, they roll their eyes, (which are painted,) and cast wanton glances on those around. "Walking and mincing;" margin, "tripping nicely." Some parts of the dance consist of a tripping or mincing step, which they call talle-talle. The left foot is put first, and the inside of the right keeps following the heel of the former. "Making a tinkling with their feet." This sound is made by the ornaments which are worn round their ankles. The first is a large silver curb, like that which is attached to a bridle; the second is of the same kind, but surrounded by a great number of small bells; the third resembles a bracelet; and the fourth is a convex hoop, about two inches deep.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 18. In that day the LORD will take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet, and their cauls, and their round tires like the moon.

After the hair is platted and perfumed, the eastern ladies proceed to dress their heads, by tying above the lock into which they collect it, a triangular piece of linen, adorned with various figures in needle-work. This, among persons of better fashion, is covered with a sarnah, as they call it, which is made in the same triangular shape, of thin flexible plates of gold or silver, carefully cut through, and engraved in imitation of lace, and might therefore answer to the hasecheranim, the moon-like ornament mentioned by the prophet in his description of the toilet of a Jewish lady. A handkerchief of crape, gauze, silk, or painted linen, bound close over the sarnah, and falling afterward carelessly upon the favourite lock of hair, completes the head-dress of the Moorish ladies. The kerchief is adjusted in the morning, and worn through the whole of the day; in this respect it differs from the veil, which is assumed as often as they go abroad, and laid aside when they return home. So elegant is this part of dress in the esteem of the Orientals, that it is worn by females of every age, to heighten their personal charms. In Persia, the prophet Ezekiel informs us, the kerchief was used by women of loose character, for the purpose of seduction; for so we understand that passage in his writings, "Wo to the women that sew pillows to all arm-holes, and make kerchiefs upon the head of every stature to hunt souls." The oriental ladies delighted in ornamenting their dress with devices of embroidery and needle-work; but it was chiefly about the neck they displayed their taste and ingenuity. To such decorations the sacred writers often allude, which clearly shows how greatly they were valued, and how much they were used. Nor were they confined to the female sex; they seem to have been equally coveted by the males; and a garment of needle-work was frequently reserved, as the most acceptable part of the spoil, for the stern and ruthless warrior. The mother of Sisera, in the fondness of her heart, allotted to her son the robe curiously wrought with vivid colours on the neck: "To Sisera, a prey of divers colours, a prey of divers colours of needle-work, of divers colours of needle-work on both sides, meet for the necks of them that take the spoil."—PAXTON.

"Tinkling ornaments," i. e. those which have been described. "Cauls;" margin, "net-works." The caul is a strap, or girdle, about four inches long, which is placed on the top of the head, and which extends to the brow in a line with the nose. The one I have examined is made of gold, and has many joints; it contains forty-five rubies, and nine pearls, which give it a net-work appearance.

"Round tires like the moon." The shape of an ornament like the crescent moon is a great favourite in all parts of the East. In Judges viii. 21, it is said that Gideon "took away the ornaments that were on the camels' necks;" but in the Septuagint, the word ornaments, is rendered, like the moon; so also in the margin of the English Bible. The crescent is worn by Parvati and Siva, from whom proceed the lingam, and the principal impurities of the system. No dancing girl is in full dress without her round tires like the moon.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 19. The chains, and the bracelets, and the mufflers.

These consist, first, of one most beautifully worked, with a pendent ornament for the neck; there is also a profusion of others, which go round the same part, and rest on the bosom. In making curious chains, the goldsmiths of England do not surpass those of the East. The Trichinopoly chains are greatly valued by the fair of our own country. The "bracelets" are large ornaments for the wrists, in which are sometimes enclosed small bells. The mufflers are, so far as I can judge, not for the face, but for the breasts.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 20. The bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs, and the head-bands, and the tablets, and the ear-rings.

Besides ornamental rings in the nose and the ears, they wore others round the legs, which made a tinkling as they went. This custom has also descended to the present times; for Rauwolf met with a number of Arabian women on the Euphrates, whose ankles and wrists were adorned with rings, sometimes a good many together, which moving up and down as they walked, made a great noise. Chardin attests the existence of the same custom in Persia, in Arabia, and in very hot countries, where they commonly go without stockings, but ascribes the tinkling sound to little bells fastened to those rings. In the East Indies, golden bells adorned the feet and ankles of the ladies from the earliest times; they placed them in the flowing tresses of their hair; they suspended them round their necks, and to the golden rings which they wore on their fingers, to announce their superior rank, and exact the homage which they had a right to expect from the lower orders; and from the banks of the Indus, it is probable the custom was introduced into the other countries of Asia. The Arabian females in Palestine and Syria, delight in the same ornaments, and, according to the statements of Dr. Clarke, seem to claim the honour of leading the fashion. "Their bodies are covered with a long blue shift; upon their heads they wear two handkerchiefs; one as a hood, and the other bound over it, as a fillet across the temples. Just above the right nostril, they place a small button, sometimes studded with pearl, a piece of glass, or any other glittering substance; this is fastened by a plug, thrust through the cartilage of the nose. Sometimes they have the cartilaginous separation between the nostrils bored for a ring, as large as those ordinarily used in Europe for hanging curtains; and this pendant in the upper lip covers the mouth; so that, in order to eat, it is necessary to raise it. Their faces, hands, and arms, are tattooed, and covered with hideous scars; their eyelashes and eyes being always painted, or rather dirtied, with some dingy black or blue powder. Their lips are died of a deep and dusky blue, as if they had been eating blackberries. Their teeth are jet black; their nails and fingers brick red; their wrists, as well as their ankles, are laden with large metal cinctures, studded with sharp pyramidal knobs and bits of glass. Very ponderous rings are also placed in their ears."—PAXTON.

Ver. 22. The changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the wimples, and the crisping-pins.

The eastern ladies take great pride in having many changes of apparel, because their fashions NEVER alter. Thus, the rich brocades worn by their grandmothers, are equally fashionable for themselves. "The mantles." A loose robe, which is gracefully crossed on the bosom. "Wimples." Probably the fine muslin which is sometimes thrown over the head and body. "Crisping-pins." This has been translated, the "little purses," or CLASPS! When the dancing girl is in full dress, halt her long hair is folded in a knot on the top of the head, and the other half hangs down her back in three tails. To keep these from unbraiding, a small clasp, or gold hoop, curiously worked, is placed at the end of each tail.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 21. And it shall come to pass, that instead of sweet smell, there shall be stink; and instead of a girdle, a rent; and instead of well-set hair, baldness; and instead of a stomacher, a girding of sackcloth; and burning instead of beauty.

"Sweet smell." No one ever enters a company without being well perfumed; and in addition to various scents and oils, they are adorned with numerous garlands, made of the most odoriferous flowers. "A girdle." Probably that which goes round the waist, which serves to keep the garments from falling, while the girls are dancing. It is sometimes made of silver. "Well-set hair." No ladies pay more attention to the dressing of the hair than do these; for as they never wear caps, they take great delight in this, their natural ornament. "Baldness," in a woman, makes her most contemptible; and formerly, to shave their head was a most degrading punishment. "Stomacher." I once saw a dress beautifully plaited and stiffened for the front, but I do not think it common. Here, then, we have a strong proof of the accurate observations of Isaiah in reference to the Jewish ladies; he had seen their motions, and enumerated their ornaments; and here we have a most melancholy picture of the fallen state of "the daughters of Zion."—ROBERTS.

The persons of the Assyrian ladies are elegantly clothed and scented with the richest oils and perfumes; and it appears from the sacred scriptures, that the Jewish females did not yield to them in the elegance of their dress, the beauty of their ornaments, and the fragrance of their essences. So pleasing to the Redeemer is the exercise of divine grace in the heart and conduct of a true believer: "How much better is thy love than wine, and the smell of thine ointments than all spices! The smell of thy garments is like the smell of Lebanon." When a queen was to be chosen by the king of Persia instead of Vashiti, the virgins collected at Susana, the capital, underwent a purification of twelve months' duration, to wit, "six months with oil of myrrh, and six months with sweet odours." The general use of such precious oils and fragrant perfumes among the ancient Romans, particularly among ladies of rank and fashion, may be inferred from these words of Virgil:—

Spirare: pedes vestis fluxit ad imos."—Æn. l. I. 403.

"From her head the ambrosial locks breathed divine fragrance; her robe hung waving down to the ground." In the remote age of Homer, the Greeks had already learnt the lavish use of such perfumes; for, in describing Juno's dress, he represents her pouring ambrosia and other perfumes all over her body. Hence, to an eastern lady, no punishment could be more severe, none more mortifying to her delicacy, than a diseased and loathsome habit of body, instead of a beautiful skin, softened and made agreeable with all that art could devise, and all that nature, so prodigal in those countries of rich perfumes, could supply. Such was the punishment which God threatened to send upon the haughty daughters of Zion, in the days of Isaiah: "And it shall come to pass, that instead of perfume there shall be ill savour; and instead of a girdle, a rent; and instead of well-set hair, baldness; and instead of a stomacher, a girding of sackcloth; and a sun-burnt skin instead of beauty."

The description which Pietro della Valle gives of his own wife, an Assyrian lady, born in Mesopotamia, and educated at Bagdad, whom he married in that country, will enable the reader to form a pretty distinct idea of the appearance and ornaments of an oriental lady in full dress. "Her eyelashes, which are long, and according to the custom of the East, dressed with stibulum, (as we often read in the holy scriptures of the Hebrew women of old, and in Xenophon of Astyages, the grandfather of Cyrus, and the Medes of that line,) give a dark, and, at the same time, a majestic shade to the eyes. The ornaments of gold and of jewels for the head, for the neck, for the arms, for the legs, and for the feet, (for they wear rings even on their toes,) are, indeed, unlike those of the Turks, carried to great excess, but not of great value: for in Bagdad, jewels of high price either are not to be had, or are not used; and they wear such only as are of little value, as turquoises, small rubies, emeralds, carbuncles, garnets, pearls, and the like. My spouse dresses herself with all of them, according to their fashion; with exception, however, of certain ugly rings, of very large size, set with jewels, which, in truth very absurdly, it is the custom to wear fastened to one of their nostrils, like buffaloes; an ancient custom, however, in the East, which, as we find in the holy scriptures, prevailed among the Hebrew ladies, even in the time of Solomon. These nose-rings, in compliance to me, she has left off; but I have not yet been able to prevail with her cousin, and her sisters, to do the same; so fond are they of an old custom, be it ever so absurd, who have been long habituated to it."—PAXTON.

Ver. 26. And her gates shall lament and mourn: and she, being desolate, shall sit upon the ground.

Sitting on the ground was a posture that denoted mourning and deep distress. Lam. ii. 10. "We find Judea on several coins of Vespasian and Titus in a posture that denotes sorrow and captivity—sitting on the ground. The Romans might have an eye on the customs of the Jewish nation, as well as those of their own country, in the several marks of sorrow they have set on this figure. The Psalmist describes the Jews lamenting their captivity, in the same pensive posture: 'By the waters of Babylon we sat down, and wept when we remembered thee, O Zion.' But what is more remarkable, we find Judea represented as a woman in sorrow sitting on the ground, in a passage of the prophet that foretels the very captivity recorded on this medal." (Addison.)—BURGER.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1. Now will I sing to my well-beloved a song of my beloved touching his vineyard. My well-beloved hath a vineyard in a very fruitful hill: 2. And he fenced it, and gathered out the stones thereof, and planted it with the choicest vine, and built a tower in the midst of it, and also made a wine-press therein: and he looked that it should bring forth grapes, and it brought forth wild grapes.

The wine-press, constructed for expressing the juice of the grapes, does not seem to be a moveable implement in the East; and our Lord, in the parable of the vineyard, says expressly, that it was formed by digging. Chardin found the wine-press in Persia was made after the same manner; as it was a hollow place dug in the ground, and lined with mason-work. Besides this, they had what the Romans called lacus, the lake, a large open place or vessel, which, by a conduit or spout, received the must from the wine-press. In very hot countries it was perhaps necessary, or at least convenient, to have the lake under ground, or in a cave hewed out of the rock for coolness, that the heat might not cause too great a fermentation, and sour the must. To these circumstances the prophet Isaiah distinctly refers, in the beginning of the fifth chapter: "My well-beloved has a vineyard in a very fruitful hill: and he fenced it, and gathered out the stones thereof, and planted it with the choicest vine, and built a tower in the midst of it, and also made a wine-press therein: and he looked that it should bring forth grapes, and it brought forth wild grapes." The tower which the prophet mentions, and which our Lord also introduces into one of his parables, is generally explained by commentators, as designed for the keepers of the vineyard to watch and defend the fruits. But for this purpose it was usual to make a little temporary hut, called in the first chapter, not a tower, but a cottage, which might answer for the short season while the grapes were ripening, and was afterward removed. The tower, therefore, according to Lowth, means a building of a more permanent nature and use; the farm of the vineyard, as we may call it, containing all the offices and implements, and the whole apparatus necessary for cultivating the vineyard and making the wine. To this image in the allegory, the situation, the manner of building, the use, and the whole service of the temple, exactly answered. They have still such towers for pleasure or use, in their gardens, in the oriental regions; for Marcus Sanutus, as quoted by Harmer, informs us, that in the thirteenth century the inhabitants of Ptolemais beat down the towers of their gardens to the ground, and removed the stones of them, together with those of their burying-places, on the approach of the Tartars. The gardens of Damascus are furnished with the same kind of edifices. In most of the gardens near Aleppo, summer-houses are built for the reception of the public. In others, at a greater distance, are tolerable commodious villas, to which the Franks resort in the spring, as the natives do in the summer. "To a tower, or building of this kind, it is to be supposed," says Russel, "our Lord refers in the parable; for it is scarcely to be imagined that he is speaking of the slight and unexpensive buildings in a vineyard, which, indeed, are sometimes so slight as to consist only of four poles, with a floor on the top of them, to which they ascend by a ladder: but rather of those elegant turrets erected in gardens, where the eastern people of fortune spend some considerable part of their time." But this excellent writer expressly admits that in all the orchards near Aleppo, a small square watch-house is built for the accommodation of the watchmen in the fruit season, or, in their stead, temporary bowers are constructed of wood, and thatched with green reeds and branches. Small and detached square towers for the accommodation of the watchmen appointed to guard the vineyards, are still to be met with in Judea. It is more probably to the substantial watch-tower that the Saviour alludes, than either to the offices of the vineyard, or the commodious summer-house.—PAXTON.

Ver. 2. And built a tower in the midst of it, and made a wine-press therein.

See on 2 Kings 4. 39.

Lowth, "And he hewed out also a lake therein." By this expression we are to understand, not the wine-press itself, but what the Romans called lacus, the lake, the large open place, or vessel, which by a conduit or spout received the must from the wine-press. In very hot countries it was perhaps necessary, or at least very convenient, to have the lake under ground, or in a cave hewn out of the side of a rock, for coolness, that the heat might not cause too great a fermentation, and sour the wine. The wine-presses in Persia, Chardin says, are formed by making hollow places in the ground, lined with mason's work.—BURDER.

Ver. 11. Wo unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink; that continue until night, till wine inflame them!

The Persians, when they commit a debauch, arise betimes, and esteem the morning as the best time for beginning to drink wine, by which means they carry on their excess till night.—MORIER.

Ver. 18. Wo unto them that draw iniquity with cords of vanity, and sin as it were with a cart-rope!

See on Isa. 66. 20.

Ver. 26. And he will lift up an ensign to the nations from far, and will hiss unto them from the end of the earth: and, behold, they shall come with speed swiftly.

* The metaphor is taken from the practice of those that keep bees, who draw them out of their hives into the fields, and lead them back again, by a hiss or a whistle.—LOWTH.

Ver. 28. Whose arrows are sharp, and all their bows bent, their horses' hoofs shall be counted like flint, and their wheels like whirlwind.

The shoeing of horses with iron plates nailed to the hoof, is quite a modern practice, and was unknown to the ancients, as appears from the silence of the Greek and Roman writers, especially those that treat of horse-medicine, who could not have passed over a matter so obvious, and of such importance, that now the whole science takes its name from it, being called by us farriery. The horse-shoes of leather and of iron, which are mentioned; the silver and the gold shoes, with which Nero and Poppea shod their mules, used occasionally to preserve the hoofs of delicate cattle, or for vanity, were of a very different kind; they enclosed the whole hoof, as in a case, or as a shoe does a man's foot, and were bound, or tied on. For this reason the strength, firmness, and solidity of a horse's hoof, was of much greater importance with them than with us, and was esteemed one of the first praises of a fine horse. For want of this artificial defence to the foot, which our horses have, Amos, vi. 12, speaks of it as a thing as much impracticable to make horses run upon a hard rock, as to plough up the same rock with oxen. These circumstances must be taken into consideration, in order to give us a full notion of the propriety and force of the image by which the prophet sets forth the strength and excellence of the Babylonish cavalry, which made a great part of the strength of the Assyrian army.—LOWTH.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 11. Then said I, LORD, how long? And he answered, Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate.

A public edict of the Emperor Adrian rendered it a capital crime for a Jew to set a foot in Jerusalem, and prohibited them from viewing it even at a distance. Heathens, Christians, and Mohammedans, have alternately possessed Judea; it has been the prey of the Saracens; the descendants of Ishmael have often overrun it; the children of Israel have alone been denied the possession of it, though thither they ever wish to return; and though it forms the only spot on earth where the ordinances of their religion can be observed. And, amid all the revolutions of states, and the extinction of many nations, in so long a period, the Jews alone have not only ever been aliens in the land of their fathers, but whenever any of them have been permitted, at any period since the time of their dispersion, to sojourn there, they have experienced even more contumelious treatment than elsewhere. Benjamin of Tudela, who travelled in the twelfth century through great part of Europe and of Asia, found the Jews everywhere oppressed, particularly in the Holy Land. And to this day (while the Jews who reside in Palestine, or who resort thither in old age, that their bones may not be laid in a foreign land, are alike ill-treated and abused by Greeks, Armenians, and Europeans) the haughty deportment of the despotic Turkish soldier, and the abject state of the poor and helpless Jews, are painted to the life by the prophet.—KEITH.

Ver. 13. But yet in it shall be a tenth, and it shall return, and shall be eaten: as a teil-tree, and as an oak, whose substance is in them when they cast their leaves, so the holy seed shall be the substance thereof.

Though the cities be waste, and the land be desolate, it is not from the poverty of the soil that the fields are abandoned by the plough, nor from any diminution of its ancient and natural fertility, that the land has rested for so many generations. Judea was not forced only by artificial means, or from local and temporary causes, into a luxuriant cultivation, such as a barren country might have been, concerning which it would not have needed a prophet to tell, that if once devastated and abandoned it would ultimately and permanently revert into its original sterility. Phœnicia at all times held a far different rank among the richest countries of the world: and it was not a bleak and sterile portion of the earth, nor a land which even many ages of desolation and neglect could impoverish, that God gave in possession and by covenant to the seed of Abraham. No longer cultivated as a garden, but left like a wilderness, Judea is indeed greatly changed from what it was; all that human ingenuity and labour did devise, erect, or cultivate, men have laid waste and desolate; all the "plenteous goods" with which it was enriched, adorned, and blessed, have fallen like seared and withered leaves, when their greenness is gone; and, stripped of its "ancient splendour," it is left as an oak whose leaf fadeth—but its inherent sources of fertility are not dried up; the natural richness of the soil is unblighted: the substance is in it, strong as that of the teitree or the solid oak, which retain their substance when they cast their leaves. And as the leafless oak waits throughout winter for the genial warmth of returning spring, to be clothed with renewed foliage, so the once glorious land of Judea is yet full of latent vigour, or of vegetative power strong as ever, ready to shoot forth, even "better than at the beginning," whenever the sun of heaven shall shine on it again, and the "holy seed" be prepared for being finally "the substance thereof." The substance that is in it—which alone has here to be proved—is, in few words, thus described by an enemy: "The land in the plains is fat and loamy, and exhibits every sign of the greatest fecundity. Were nature assisted by art, the fruits of the most distant countries might be produced within the distance of twenty leagues." "Galilee," says Malte Brun, "would be a paradise, were it inhabited by an industrious people, under an enlightened government. Vine stocks are to be seen here a foot and a half in diameter."—KERR.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 18. And it shall come to pass in that day, that the LORD shall hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria.

Some writers have contended that bees are destitute of the sense of hearing; but their opinion is entirely without foundation. This will appear, if any proof were necessary, from the following prediction: "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt; and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria." The allusion which this text involves, is the practice of calling out the bees from their hives, by a hissing, or whistling sound, to their labour in the fields, and summoning them again to return, when the heavens begin to lower, or the shadows of evening to fall. In this manner, Jehovah threatens to rouse the enemies of Judah, and lead them to the prey. However widely scattered, or far remote from the scene of action, they should hear his voice, and with as much promptitude as the bee, that has been taught to recognise the signal of its owner, and obey his call, they should assemble their forces; and although weak and insignificant as a swarm of bees in the estimation of a proud and infatuated people, they should come, with irresistible might, and take possession of the rich and beautiful region which had been abandoned by its terrified inhabitants.—PAXTON.

This insect is called Zimb; it has not been described by any naturalist. It is, in size, very little larger than a bee, of a thicker proportion, and his wings, which are broader than those of a bee, placed separate, like those of a fly: they are of pure gauze, without colour or spot upon them; the head is large, the upper jaw or lip is sharp, and has at the end of it a strong pointed hair, of about a quarter of an inch long; the lower jaw has two of these pointed hairs; and this pencil of hairs, when joined together, makes a resistance to the finger, nearly equal to that of a strong hog's bristle; its legs are serrated in the inside, and the whole covered with brown hair or down. As soon as this plague appears, and their buzzing is heard, all the cattle forsake their food, and run wildly about the plain, till they die, worn out with fatigue, fright, and hunger. No remedy remains, but to leave the black earth, and hasten down to the sands of Abarah; and there they remain, while the rains last, this cruel enemy never daring to pursue them farther. Though his size be immense, as is his strength, and his body covered with a thick skin, defended with strong hair, yet, even the camel is not capable to sustain the violent punctures the fly makes with his pointed proboscis. He must lose no time in removing to the sands of Abarah; for, when once attacked by this fly, his body, head, and legs, break out into large bosses, which swell, break, and putrefy, to the certain destruction of the creature. Even the elephant and rhinoceros, who, by reason of their enormous bulk, and the vast quantity of food and water they daily need, cannot shift to desert and dry places, as the season may require, are obliged to roll themselves in mud and mire, which, when dry, coats them over like armour, and enables them to stand their ground against this winged assassin: yet I have found some of these tubercles upon almost every elephant and rhinoceros that I have seen, and attribute them to this cause. All the inhabitants of the sea-coast of Melinda, down to Cape Gardafan, to Saba, and the south coast of the Red Sea, are obliged to put themselves in motion, and remove to the next sand, in the beginning of the rainy season, to prevent all their stock of cattle from being destroyed. This is not a partial emigration; the inhabitants of all the countries, from the mountains of Abyssinia northward, to the confluence of the Nile, and Astaboras, are once a-year obliged to change their abode, and seek protection on the sands of Beja; nor is there any alternative, or means of avoiding this, though a hostile band were in their way, capable of spoiling them of half their substance. This fly has no sting, though he seems to me to be rather of the bee kind; but his motion is more rapid and sudden than that of the bee, and resembles that of the gadfly in England. There is something particular in the sound or buzzing of this insect; it is a jarring noise, together with a humming, which induces me to believe it proceeds, at least in part, from a vibration made with the three hairs at his snout. (BRUCE.)—BURDER.

Ver. 20. In the same day shall the LORD shave with a razor that is hired, namely, by them beyond the river, by the king of Assyria, the head, and the hair of the feet: and it shall also consume the beard.

By reading what is written on 2 Kings ii. 23, a better view will be gained of the contempt attached to those who were bald, and of the term, as being expressive of the most complete weakness and desitition. To tell a man you will shave him, is as much as to say you will ruin him—entirely overthrow him. "Our king has shaved all his enemies," means, he has punished them; reduced them to the most abject condition; so that they have not a single vestige of power in their possession. "What, fellow! didst thou say thou wouldst shave me?" "I will give thy bones to the crows and the jackals. Begone, bald-head, get out of my way." The punishment to be inflicted on the Jews was very great: they were to be shaved on the head, the beard, and "the hair of the feet." The latter expression alludes to a most disgusting practice, common in all parts of the East. Calmet says, "The Hebrews modestly express by feet those parts which decency forbids to name: 'the water of the feet,' 'to cover the feet,' 'the hair of the feet.'" Thus the Lord was about to shave the Jews by a razor which they themselves had hired!—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 6. Forasmuch as this people refuseth the waters of Shiloah that go softly, and rejoice in Rezin and Remaliah's son; 7. Now therefore, behold, the LORD bringeth up upon them the waters of the river, strong and many, even the king of Assyria, and all his glory: and he shall come up over all his channels, and go over all his banks.

The gentle waters of Shiloah, a small fountain and brook just without Jerusalem, which supplied a pool within the city for the use of the inhabitants, are an apt emblem of the state of the kingdom and house of David, much reduced in its apparent strength, yet supported by the blessing of God; and are finely contrasted with the waters of the Euphrates, great, rapid, and impetuous; the image of the Babylonian empire, which God threatens to bring down like a mighty flood upon all these apostates of both kingdoms, as a punishment for their manifold iniquities.—BURDER.

Ver. 14. And he shall be for a sanctuary; but for a stone of stumbling, and for a rock of offence, to both houses of Israel: for a gin and for a snare to the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

The idea appears to be taken from a stone, or a block of wood, being thrown in the path of travellers, over which they fall. "Well, friend, did the king grant you your request?"—"No, no; there was a Udaru-Katti, (from the verb Udaru-kulu, to stumble, and katti, a block,) a stumbling-block in the way." "Just as Valen was attaining the object of his wishes, that old stumbling-block, the Modeliar, laid down in the way, and the poor fellow stumbled, and fell." "Why are you so dejected this morning?"—"Because I have had a severe fall over that stumbling-block, my profligate son."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 3. Thou hast multiplied the nation, and not increased the joy: they joy before thee according to the joy in harvest, and as men rejoice when they divide the spoil.

"Kandan's wife has at length borne her husband a son, and all the relations are rejoicing together, like unto the joy of harvest." "Are you happy in your new situation?"—"Yes; my sandesham, my happiness, is greater than that of the time of harvest." "Listen to the birds, how merry they are; can they be taking in their harvest?"—ROBERTS.

Ver. 6. For unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace.

It is common in the East to describe any quality of a person by calling him the father of the quality. D'Herbelot, speaking of a very eminent physician, says, he did such admirable cures, that he was surnamed Abou Berekat, the father of benedictions. The original words of this title of Christ, may be rendered, the father of that which is everlasting: Christ, therefore, as the head and introducer of an everlasting dispensation, never to give place to another, was very naturally, in the eastern style, called the father of eternity.—HARMER.

The phrase, "shall be called," refers not so much to the appellation by which the promised child should be known, as to the nature by which he should be distinguished. It is remarkable that the original word, (pela), here rendered "wonderful," is elsewhere rendered "secret." Thus Judg. xiii. 17, 18, "And Manoah said unto the angel of the Lord, What is thy name, that when thy sayings come to pass, we may do thee honour? And the angel of the Lord said unto him, Why askest thou this after my name, seeing it is secret, (pala)?" Here the angel evidently appropriates one of the distinguishing titles of the promised Messiah, thus identifying his real character, and while ostensibly refusing to make known his name, does in fact impart one of the most significant and sublime of all his designations.—BUSA.

Ver. 10. The bricks are fallen down, but we will build with hewn stones; the sycamores are cut down, but we will change them into cedars.

The houses of the lower orders in Egypt are in like manner constructed of unburnt bricks, or square pieces of clay, baked in the sun, and only one story high; but those of the higher classes, of stone, are generally two, and sometimes three stories high. These facts are at once a short and lively comment on the words of the prophet: "All the people shall know, even Ephraim, and the inhabitants of Samaria, that say, in the pride and stoutness of heart, The Bricks are fallen down, but we will build with hewn stones; the sycamores are cut down, but we will change them into cedars." Bricks dried in the sun, are poor materials for building, compared with hewn stone, which, in Egypt, is almost equal to marble, and forms a strong contrast between the splendid palace and mud-walled cabin. And if, as is probable, the houses of the higher orders in Israel were built with the same species of costly and beautiful stone, the contrast stated by the prophet places the vanquish of his wealthier countrymen in a very strong light. The boastful extravagance of that people is still further displayed by the next figure: "The sycamores are cut down, but we will change them into cedars;" the forests of sycamore, the wood of which we have been accustomed to employ in building, are cut down by the enemy, but instead of them we will import cedars, of whose fragrant and beautiful wood we will construct and adorn our habitations. The sycamore grew in abundance in the low country of Judea, and was not much esteemed; but the cedar was highly valued; it was brought at a great expense, and with much labour, from the distant and rugged summits of Lebanon, to beautify the dwellings of the great, the palaces of kings, and the temple of Jehovah. It was therefore an extravagant boast, which betrayed the pride and vanity of their depraved hearts, that all the warnings, threatenings, and judgments of the living God, were insufficient to subdue or restrain.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1. Wo unto them that decree unrighteous decrees, and that write grievousness which they have prescribed.

The manner of making eastern decrees differs from ours: they are first written, and then the magistrate authenticates them, or annals them. This, I remember, is the Arab manner, according to D'Arvieux. When an Arab wanted a favour of the emir, the way was to apply to the secretary, who drew up a decree according to the request of the party; if the emir granted the favour, he printed his seal upon it; if not, he returned it torn to the petitioner. Sir J. Chardin confirms this account, and applies it, with great propriety, to the illustration of a passage which I never thought of when I read over D'Arvieux. After citing Is. x. 1, Wo unto them that decree unrighteous decrees, and to the writers that write grievousness, for so our translators have rendered the latter part of the verse in the margin, much more agreeably than in the body of the version, Sir John goes on, "The manner of making the royal acts and ordinances hath a relation to this: they are always drawn up according to the request; the first minister, or he whose office it is, writes on the side of it, 'according to the king's will,' and from thence it is sent to the secretary of state, who draws up the order in form."

They that consult Vitringa upon the passage, will find that commentators have been perplexed about the latter part of this wo: every one sees the propriety of denouncing evil on those that decree unrighteous judgments; but it is not very clear why they are threatened that write them; it certainly would be wrong to punish the clerks of our courts, that have no other concern in unjust decrees, than barely writing them down, according to the duty of their place, as mere amanuenses. But according to the eastern mode, we find he that writes or draws up the order at first, is deeply concerned in the injustice, since he expresses matters as he pleases, and is the source of the mischief; the superior only passes or rejects it. He indeed is guilty if he passes an unjust order, because he ought to have rejected it; but a great deal of the guilt unquestionably comes upon him who first draws the order, and who makes it more or less oppressive to others, just as he pleases, or rather, according to the present that is made him by the party that solicits the order. For it appears from D'Arvieux, that the secretary of the emir drew up no order without a present, which was wont to be proportionate to the favour asked; and that he was very oppressive in his demands.

In this view of things the words of the prophet are very clear, and easy to be understood; and Sir John Chardin, by his acquaintance with the East, proves a much better interpreter than the most learned western commentators, even celebrated rabbies themselves: for according to Vitringa, Rabbi David Kimchi supposes the judges themselves were the writers the prophet meant, and so called, because they caused others to write unjust determinations: though Vitringa admits, that such an interpretation does not well agree with the conjugation of the Hebrew word.—HARMER.

Ver. 13. For he saith, By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom; for I am prudent: and I have removed the bounds of the people, and have robbed their treasures.

and I have put down the inhabitants like a valiant man: 14. And my hand hath found, as a nest, the riches of the people: and as one gathereth eggs that are left, have I gathered all the earth; and there was none that moved the wing, or opened the mouth, or peeped.

These are the sentiments and boasts of Sennacherib, a proud Assyrian monarch, who viewed and treated cities just as we in Africa viewed and treated ostrich nests, when they fell in our way: we seized the eggs as if they had been our own, because we had found them, and because there was no power that could prevent us. So did Sennacherib seize and plunder cities with as little compunction as we seized the eggs of the absent ostrich; never thinking of the misery for life which he thereby brought on many peaceable families, who had done nothing to injure or offend him.—CAMPBELL.

Ver. 19. And the rest of the trees of his forest shall be few, that a child may write them.

Volney remarks, in a note, that there are but four or five of those trees, which deserve any notice; and in a note, it may be added, from the words of Isaiah, "the rest of the trees of his forest shall be few, that a child may write them," ch. x. 49. Could not the infidel write a brief note, or state a minute fact, without illustrating a prophecy? Maundrell, who visited Lebanon in the end of the seventeenth century, and to whose accuracy in other matters all subsequent travellers who refer to him bear witness, describes some of the cedars near the top of the mountain as "very old, and of a prodigious bulk, and others younger, of a smaller size." Of the former he could reckon up only sixteen. He measured the largest, and found it above twelve yards in girth. Such trees, however few in number, show that the cedars of Lebanon had once been no vain boast. But after the lapse of more than a century, not a single tree of such dimensions is now to be seen. Of those which now remain, as visited by Captains Irby and Mangles, there are about fifty in the whole, on a single small eminence, from which spot the cedars are the only trees to be seen in Lebanon.—KERR.

Ver. 32. As yet shall he remain at Nob that day: he shall shake his hand against the mount of the daughter of Zion, the hill of Jerusalem.

This is a part of the description of the march of Sennacherib against Jerusalem. When he arrives near the city, he lifts up his hand and shakes it, to denote that he will soon inflict signal punishment upon it. How often may this significant motion of the hand be seen; it is done by lifting it up to the height of the head, and then moving it backward and forward in a cutting direction. Thus, when men are at so great a distance as to be scarcely able to hear each other's voice, they have this convenient way of making known their threatenings. Sometimes, when brawlers have separated, and apparently finished their quarrel, one of them will turn round and bawl out with all his might, and then shake his hand in token of what he will still do.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 4. But with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth: and he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked.

The application of this figure in the East refers rather to angry expressions, than to a judicial sentence. "The mouth of that man burns up his neighbours and friends." "His mouth! it has set on fire all the people."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 6. The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf, and the young lion, and the fating together; and a little child shall lead them. 7. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together: and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. 8. And the suckling child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice-den. 9. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea.

See on Job 20. 14.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 7. Therefore shall all hearts be faint, and every man's heart shall melt.

This figure appears to be taken from the melting of wax, or metals. "My heart, my mind, melts for him; I am dissolved by his love." "Alas! alas! my bowels are melting within me."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 8. And they shall be afraid: pangs and sorrows shall take hold of them; they shall be in pain as a woman that travaileth; they shall be amazed one at another; their faces shall be as flames.

Great pains are often spoken of as the anguish of parturition. "Ah! my lord, I am very ill; my pains are like those of a woman when bringing forth her first-born." "Has it come to this? am I to bring forth like a woman?" "He cries like the woman in her agony." "Yes, my friend; as the pains of a female in child-bearing are produced by sin; so your present sufferings are produced by the sins of a former birth."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 14. And it shall be as the chased roe, (antelope,) and as a sheep that no man taketh up; they shall every man turn to his own people, and flee every one into his own land.

See on 2 Sam. 2. 10.

To hunt the antelope is a favourite amusement in the East; but which, from its extraordinary swiftness, is attended with great difficulty. On the first alarm, it flies like an arrow from the bow, and leaves the best mounted hunter, and the fleetest dog, far behind. The sportsman is obliged to call in the aid of the falcon, trained to the work, to seize on the animal, and impede its motions, to give the dogs time to overtake it. Dr. Russel thus describes the chase of the antelope: "They permit horsemen, without dogs, if they advance gently, to approach near, and do not seem much to regard a caravan that passes within a little distance; but the moment they take the alarm, they bound away, casting from time to time a look behind; and if they find themselves pursued, they lay their horns backward, almost close on the shoulders, and flee with incredible swiftness. When dogs appear, they instantly take alarm; for which reason the sportsmen endeavour to steal upon the antelope unawares, to get as near as possible before slipping the dogs; and then, pushing on at full speed, they throw off the falcon, which, being taught to strike or fix upon the cheek of the game, retards its course by repeated attacks, till the greyhounds have time to get up."—BURDER.

Ver. 18. Their bows also shall dash the young men to pieces; and they shall have no pity on the fruit of the womb; their eye shall not spare children.

See on 2 Sam. 22. 35.

Both Herodotus and Xenophon mention that the Persians used large bows; and the latter says particularly, that their bows were three cubits long. They were celebrated for their archers, Jer. xlix. 35. Probably their neighbours and allies, the Medes, dealt much in the same sort of arms. In Psalm xviii. 34, and Job xx. 24, mention is made of a bow of brass. If the Persian bows were of metal, we may easily conceive that with a metalline bow of three cubits' length, and proportionably strong, the soldiers might dash and slay the young men, the weaker and unresisting part of the inhabitants, in the general carnage on taking the city.—LOWTH.

Ver. 19. And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. 20 It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation; neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there, neither shall the shepherds make their fold there.

From Rauwolf's testimony it appears that in the sixteenth century, "there was not a house to be seen." And now the eye wanders over a barren desert, in which the ruins are nearly the only indication that it had ever been inhabited. "It is impossible," adds Major Keppel, "to behold this scene, and not to be reminded how exactly the predictions of Isaiah and Jeremiah have been fulfilled, even in the appearance Babylon was doomed to present, that she should never be inhabited; that 'the Arabian should not pitch his tent there'; that she should 'become heaps'; that her cities should be a 'desolation, a dry wilderness.'" "Babylon is spurned alike by the heel of the Ottomans, the Israelites, and the sons of Ishmael. It is a tenantless and desolate metropolis."—(Mignan.)

Neither shall the Arabian pitch his tent there, neither shall the shepherds make their fold there. It was prophesied of Ammon, that it should be a stable for camels and a couching-place for flocks; and of Philistia, that it should be cottages for shepherds, and a pasture for flocks. But Babylon was to be visited with a far greater desolation, and to become unfit or unsuited even for such a purpose. And that neither a tent would be pitched there, even by an Arab, nor a fold made by a shepherd, implies the last degree of solitude and desolation. "It is common in these parts for shepherds to make use of ruined edifices to shelter their flocks in." (Mignan.) But Babylon is an exception. Instead of taking the bricks from thence, the shepherd might with facility erect a defence from wild beasts, and make a fold for his flock amid the heaps of Babylon: and the Arab, who fearlessly traverses it by day, might pitch his tent by night. But neither the one nor the other could now be persuaded to remain a single night among the ruins. The superstitious dread of evil spirits, far more than the natural terror of the wild beasts, effectually prevents them. Captain Mignan was accompanied by six Arabs, completely armed, but he "could not induce them to remain towards night, from the apprehension of evil spirits. It is impossible to eradicate this idea from the minds of these people, who are very deeply imbued with superstition." And when the sea sunk behind the Mujelibé, and the moon would have still lighted his way among the ruins, it was with infinite regret that he obeyed "the summons of his guides." "All the people of the country assert that it is extremely dangerous to approach this mound after nightfall, on account of the multitude of evil spirits by which it is haunted."—KEITH.

The scriptures, in describing the ruined state into which some celebrated cities were to be reduced, represent them not unfrequently, (Jer. xlix. 18.) as to be so desolated, that no shepherds with flocks should haunt them; which supposes they were to be found on the remains of others.

This is a proper representation of complete destruction. For in the East it is common for shepherds to make use of remaining ruins to shelter their flocks from the heat of the middle of the day, and from the dangers of the night. So Dr. Chandler, after mentioning the exquisite remains of a temple of Apollo, in Asia Minor, which were such as that it was impossible, perhaps, to conceive greater beauty and majesty of ruin, goes on, "At evening a large flock of goats, returning to the fold, their bells tinkling, spread over the heap, climbing to browse on the shrubs and trees growing between the huge stones." Another passage of the same writer, shows that they make use of ruins also to guard their flocks from the noon-tide heat. Speaking of Aiasaluck, generally understood to be the ancient Ephesus, and certainly near the site of that old city, and at least its successor, he says, "A herd of goats was driven to it for shelter from the sun at noon; and a noisy flight of crows from the quarries seemed to insult its silence. We heard the partridge call in the area of the theatre and of the stadium. The glorious pomp of its heathen worship is no longer remembered; and Christianity, which was there nursed by apostles, and fostered by general councils, until it increased to fulness of stature, barely lingers on in an existence hardly visible."

This description is very gloomy and melancholy; however, the usefulness of these ruins is such, for the habitation of those that tend flocks, that it often prevents a place from being quite desolate, and continues it among inhabited places, though miserably ruined. Such is the state of Ephesus: it is described by Chandler, as making a very gloomy and melancholy appearance, but as not absolutely without people. "Our horses," says he, "were disposed among the walls and rubbish, with their saddles on; and a mat was spread for us on the ground. We sat here, in the open air, while supper was preparing; when, suddenly, fires began to blaze up among the bushes, and we saw the villagers collected about them in savage groups, or passing to and fro with lighted brands for torches. The flames, with the stars and a pale moon, afforded us a dim prospect of ruin and desolation. A shrill owl, called cucuvaia, from its note, with a nighthawk, flitted near us; and a jackal cried mournfully, as if forsaken by his companions on the mountain."—BURDER.

Ver. 21. But wild beasts of the desert shall lie there; and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there.

"Yes; the wretch is now punished for his crimes, and those of his father; dogs and devils are now dwelling in his habitation." The owl, whose native name is אנטיא, is one of the most ominous birds of the East. Let him only alight upon the house of a Hindoo, and begin his dismal screech, and all the inmates will be seized with great consternation. Some one will instantly run out and make a noise with his arca-nut cutter, or some other instrument, to affright it away. I recollect one of these creatures once flew into the house of a lady when she was in the pains of parturition: the native servants became greatly alarmed, and run to me, lamenting the fearful omen. I had it driven from the house; and notwithstanding the malignant influence of the feathered visitor, and the qualms of the domestics, all things went on well. On another occasion, I shot one of them which had troubled us on the roof, night by night: but as he was only wounded in the wing, I took him into the house, with the intention of keeping him: but the servants were so uncomfortable, and complained so much at having such a "BEAST" in the house, I was obliged to send him away. From these statements it will be seen what ideas would be attached to the owls dwelling in the houses of Babylon.—ROBERTS.

"There are many dens of wild beasts in various parts. There are quantities of porcupine quills, (kephud.) And while the lower excavations are often pools of water, in most of the cavities are numbers of bats and owls. These souterrains, (caverns,) over which the chambers of majesty may have been spread, are now the refuge of jackals and other savage animals. The mouths of their entrances are strewn with the bones of sheep and goats; and the loathsome smell that issues from most of them is sufficient warning not to proceed into the den." (Buckingham.) The king of the forest now ranges over the site of that Babylon which Nebuchadnezzar built for his own glory. And the temple of Belus, the greatest work of man, is now like unto a natural den of lions. "Two or three majestic lions" were seen upon its heights, by Sir Robert Ker Porter, as he was approaching it; and "the broad prints of their feet were left plain in the clayey soil." Major Keppel saw there a similar foot-print of a lion. It is also the unmolested retreat of jackals, hyenas, and other noxious animals. Wild beasts are "numerous" at the Mujelibé, as well as on Birs Nimrod. "The mound was full of large holes; we entered some of them, and found them strewn with carcases and skeletons of animals recently killed. The ordure of wild beasts was so strong, that prudence got the better of curiosity, for we had no doubt as to the savage nature of the inhabitants. Our guides, indeed, told us that all the ruins abounded in lions and other wild beasts; so literally has the divine prediction been fulfilled, that wild beasts of the desert should lie there, and their houses be full of doleful creatures; that the wild beasts of the island should cry in their desolate houses." (Keppel).—KERR.

Ver. 22. And the wild beasts of the island shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant palaces; and her time is near to come, and her days shall not be prolonged.

Europeans are often astonished, in walking through a town or village, to see so many desolate houses, and frequently come to improper conclusions, from an idea that the place had once a greater number of inhabitants. At half an hour's notice, families may be seen to leave their dwellings, never to enter them more. Hence, in almost every direction, may be seen buildings with roofs half fallen in; with timbers hanging in various positions; shutters and doors flapping in the wind, or walls half-levelled to the ground. Various are the reasons for which the superstitious idolater will leave his dwelling: should one of the family die on the fifth day of the new or waning moon, the place must be forsaken for six months; or should the Cobra Capella (serpent) enter the house at the times alluded to, the people must forthwith leave the house. Does an owl alight on the roof for two successive nights, the inmates will take their departure; but if for one only, then, by the performance of certain ceremonies, the evils may be averted. Are evil spirits believed to visit the dwelling? are the children often sick? are the former as well as the present occupiers unfortunate? then will they never rest till they have gained another habitation. Sometimes, however, they call for the sastre, i. e. magician, to inquire if he can find out the cause of their troubles; when perhaps he says, the walls are too high, or too much in this or that direction; and then may be seen master, servants, children, carpenters, and masons, all busily employed in making the prescribed alterations. But another reason for the desolation in houses is, that a father sometimes leaves the dwelling to two or three of his sons; and then, when the necessary repairs have to be made, one will not do this, another will not do that, till the whole tumbles to the ground.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 8. Yea, the fir-trees rejoice at thee, and the cedars of Lebanon, saying, Since thou art laid down, no feller is come up against us.

As we passed through the extensive forest of fir-trees situated between Deir el Kamr and Aneq, we had already beard, at some distance, the stroke of one solitary axe, resounding from hill to hill. On reaching the spot, we found a peasant, whose labour had been so far successful, that he had felled his tree and lopped the branches. He was now hewing it in the middle, so as to balance the two halves upon his camel, which stood patiently by him, waiting for his load. In the days of Hiram, king of Tyre, and subsequently under the kings of Babylon, this romantic solitude was not so peaceful: that most poetic image in Isaiah, who makes these very trees vocal, exulting in the downfall of the destroyer of nations, seems now to be almost realized anew.—Yea, the fir-trees rejoice at thee, and the cedars of Lebanon, saying, Since thou art laid down, no feller is come up against us.—JOWETT.

Ver. 9. Hell from beneath is moved for thee to meet thee at thy coming: it stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the chief ones of the earth; it hath raised up from their thrones all the kings of the nations.

The sepulchres of the Hebrews, at least those of respectable persons, and those which hereditarily belonged to the principal families, were extensive caves, or vaults, excavated from the native rock by art and manual labour. The roofs of them in general were arched; and some were so spacious as to be supported by colonnades. All round the sides were cells for the reception of the sarcophagi; these were properly ornamented with sculpture, and each was placed in its proper cell. The cave or sepulchre admitted no light, being closed by a great stone, which was rolled to the mouth of the narrow passage or entrance. Many of these receptacles are still extant in Judea; two in particular are more magnificent than all the rest, and are supposed to be the sepulchres of the kings. One of these is in Jerusalem, and contains twenty-four cells; the other, containing twice that number, is in a place without the city.—BURDER.

Ver. 16. They that see thee shall narrowly look upon thee, and consider thee, saying, Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms?

Narrowly to look on and to consider even the view of the Mujelibé, is to see what the palace of Babylon, in which kings, proud as "Lucifer," boasted of exalting themselves above the stars of God, has now become, and how, cut down to the ground, it is broken in pieces. "On pacing over the loose stones, and fragments of brick-work which lay scattered through the immense fabric, and surveying the sublimity of the ruins," says Captain Mignan, "I naturally recurred to the time when these walls stood proudly in their original splendour,—when the halls were the scenes of festive magnificence, and when they resounded to the voices of those whom death has long since swept from the earth. This very pile was once the seat of luxury and vice; now abandoned to decay, and exhibiting a melancholy instance of the retribution of Heaven. It stands alone;—the solitary habitation of the goatherd marks not the forsaken site."—KERR.

Ver. 19. But thou art cast out of thy grave like an abominable branch, and as the raiment of those that are slain, thrust through with a sword, that go down to the stones of the pit; as a carcass trodden under feet.

Rather like the abominable tree, meaning that on which criminals were executed. This, in the Roman law, is denominated infelix arbor; and Maimonides tells us, that the Jews used to bury it with the criminal who suffered on it, as involved equally with him in the malediction of their law.—BURDER.

"Several deep excavations have been made in different places into the sides of the Mujelibé: some probably by the wearing of the seasons; but many others have been dug by the rapacity of the Turks, tearing up its bowels in search of hidden treasure,"—as if the palace of Babylon were cast out of its grave. "Several penetrate very far into the body of the structure," till it has become as the raiment of those that are slain, thrust through with a sword. "And some, it is likely, have never yet been explored, the wild beasts of the desert literally keeping guard over them." (Keppel.) "The mound was full of large holes"—thrust through. Near to the Mujelibé, on the supposed site of the hanging gardens which were situated within the walls of the palace, "the ruins are so perforated in consequence of the digging for bricks, that the original design is entirely lost. All that could favour any conjecture of gardens built on terraces are two subterranean passages. There can be no doubt that both passages are of vast extent: they are lined with bricks laid in with bitumen, and covered over with large masses of stone. This is nearly the only place where stone is observable." Arches built upon arches raised the hanging-gardens from terrace to terrace, till the highest was on a level with the top of the city walls. Now they are cast out like an abominable branch—and subterranean passages are disclosed—down to the stones of the pit. "As a carcass trodden under feet." The streets of Babylon were parallel, crossed by others at right angles, and abounded with houses three and four stories high; and none can now traverse the site of Babylon, or find any other path, without treading them under foot. The traveller directs his course to the highest mounds; and there are none, whether temples or palaces, that are not trodden on. The Mujelibé "rises in a steep ascent, over which the passengers can only go up by the winding paths worn by frequent visits to the ruined edifice."—KERR.

Ver. 23. I will also make it a possession for the bittern, and pools of water: and I will sweep it with the besom of destruction, saith the LORD of hosts.

What was he going to sweep? The devoted city of Babylon. The word besom is often used, as a figure, to denote the way in which people are swept from the earth. Thus, when the cholera morbus began to rage, it was said, "Alas! alas! it is sweeping us away as with a besom." "How is the cholera in your village?"—"It has come like besoms." When the people made offerings and sacrifices to the demons who were believed to produce the disease, the magician, who was believed to be the devil's agent, sometimes said, "Make such and such offerings, or I will sweep you away with a besom." In the Hindoo calendar, or almanac, where predictions are given respecting certain months of the year, it is often said, "The year is not good, it brings a besom."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 29. Rejoice not thou, whole Palestina, because the rod of him that smote thee is broken: for out of the serpent's root shall come forth a cockatrice, and his fruit shall be a fiery flying serpent.

In Egypt and other oriental countries, a serpent was the common symbol of a powerful monarch; it was embroidered on the robes of princes, and blazoned on their diadem, to signify their absolute power and invincible might, and that, as the wound inflicted by the basilisk is incurable, so the fatal effects of their displeasure were neither to be avoided nor endured. These are the allusions involved in the address of the prophet, to the irreconcilable enemies of his nation.—PAXTON.

Ver. 31. Howl, O gate; cry, O city: thou, whole Palestina, art dissolved: for there shall come from the north a smoke, and none shall be alone in his appointed times.

This may be in allusion to smoke arising from distant conflagrations, caused by an advancing desolating army, the sight of which would greatly alarm the inhabitants of Palestina. I have seen the smoke from mountains, whose grass and bushes were on fire, at the distance of forty or fifty miles. Or it may refer to clouds of sand or dust raised by troops rapidly advancing to attack them. By this means I have observed the advance of travelling parties, long before they reached us, from the cloud of sand raised by the movement of the oxen. Game is also frequently discovered by the same means.—CAMPBELL.

CHAPTER XV.

Ver. 1. The burden of Moab. Because in the night Ar of Moab is laid waste, and brought to silence; because in the night Kir of Moab is laid waste, and brought to silence.

See on Jer. 49. 1—28.

CHAPTER XVI.

Ver. 2. For it shall be, that as a wandering bird cast out of the nest, so the daughters of Moab shall be at the fords of Arnon.

The figure appears to be taken from a young bird being thrown out of the nest before it is able to fly, and which consequently wanders about for a place of refuge. "Well, Tamnan, what has become of your profligate son?"—"I know not, my friend, because I have turned him out of the nest." "Why, my boy, have you come to this distant country?"—"Because my relations turned me out of the nest." "Alas for me! alas for me!" says the bereaved mother; "my young one has taken to the wing; it has flown from the nest." "I have only one left in the nest; shall I not take care of it?" "I should like to get into that nest;" says the young man who wishes to marry into a high and rich family. "Ah! my lord, dismiss me not from your service.

to whom shall I go for employment? I have many children, who will be sufferers if I leave you: who will throw a stone at the nestlings I who will put fire to the lair of the young eubs of the jungle? Ah! my lord, turn me not away; I shall be like a bird wandering from its nest."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 6. Yet gleanings-grapes shall be left in it, as the shaking of an olive-tree, two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough, four or five in the outmost fruitful branches thereof, saith the LORD God of Israel.

The vintager cuts down the grapes from the vine with a sharp hook or sickle; but the olive was sometimes beaten off the tree, and sometimes shaken. The former method is mentioned by Moses, in one of his precepts: "When thou beatest thine olive-tree, thou shalt not go over the boughs again; it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow." The latter is marked by the prophet Isaiah: "Yet gleanings grapes shall be left in it, as the shaking of an olive-tree; two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough, four or five in the outmost fruitful branches thereof, saith the Lord God of Israel." It occurs again in a denunciation of divine judgments, by the same prophet: "When thus it shall be in the midst of the land among the people, there shall be as the shaking of an olive-tree, and as the gleanings grapes, when the vintage is done." The conjecture of Harmer, on these quotations, in which the shaking of the olive-tree is connected with the gleanings of grapes, is not improbable, "that the shaking of the olive-tree does not indicate an improvement made in after times on the original mode of gathering them; or different methods of procedure by different people, in the same age and country, who possessed olive-yards; but rather expressed the difference between the gathering of the main crop by the owners, and the way in which the poor collected the few olive-berries that were left, and which, by the law of Moses, they were permitted to take."

The custom of beating the olive with long poles, to make the fruit fall, is still followed in some parts of Italy. This foolish method, besides hurting the plant, and spoiling many branches that would bear the year following, makes the ripe and unripe fruit fall indiscriminately, and bruises a great deal of both kinds, by which they become rancid in the heaps, and give an ill-flavoured oil. Such is the statement of the Abbot Fortis, in his account of Dalmatia; we are not then to wonder, that in the time of Moses, when the art of cultivation was in so simple and unimproved a state, beating should have been the common way of gathering olives by the owners, who were disposed to leave, we may suppose, as few as possible, and were forbidden by their law to go over the branches a second time. But shaking them appears to have been sufficient, when they had hung till they were fully ripe; and was therefore practised by the poor, or by strangers, who were either not provided with such long poles as the owners possessed, or did not find them necessary. Indeed, it is not improbable, that the owners were well aware of the injury done to the olive-trees by beating, although they practised it, because it was the most effectual way of gathering the fruit with which they were acquainted; and might therefore prohibit the poor and the stranger to collect the gleanings in that manner: they were on that account reduced to the necessity of shaking the olive-berries from the tree, how ineffectual soever might be the method, or remain without them. The main crop, then, seems to have been taken from the olive by beating, and the gleanings uniformly by shaking. Under this conviction, Dr. Lowth has, with great judgment, translated the sixth verse of the seventeenth chapter of Isaiah: A gleanings shall be left in it, as in the shaking of the olive-tree.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 2. That sendeth ambassadors by the sea, even in vessels of bulrushes upon the waters, saying, Go, ye swift messengers, to a nation scattered and peeled, to a people terrible from their beginning hitherto; a nation meted out and trodden down, whose land the rivers have spoiled!

"In order to pass along the Nile, the inhabitants have recourse to the contrivance of a float, made of large earthen pitchers, tied closely together, and covered with leaves of palm-trees. The man that conducts it, has commonly in his mouth a cord, with which he fishes, as he passes on." (Norden.) Egmont and Heyman saw some small floats, used by the Egyptian fishermen, consisting of bundles of reeds, floated by calabashes. "My palanquin bearers now found no difficulty in fording the stream of the Dabder; the last time I crossed, it was with some danger on a raft placed over earthen pots, a contrivance well known in modern Egypt, where they make a float of earthen pots, tied together, covered with a platform of palm-leaves, which will bear a considerable weight, and is conducted without difficulty." (Forbes.)—BURDER.

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver. 5. Prepare the table, watch in the watch-tower, eat, drink: arise, ye princes, and anoint the shield.

The ancient warrior did not yield to the moderns in keeping his armour in good order. The inspired writer often speaks of furbishing the spear, and making bright the arrows; and the manner in which he expresses himself in relation to this part of the soldier's duty, proves that it was generally and carefully performed. But they were particularly attentive to their shields, which they took care frequently to scour, polish, and anoint with oil. The oriental soldier seems to have gloried in the dazzling lustre of his shield, which he so highly valued, and upon which he engraved his name and warlike exploits. To produce the desired brightness, and preserve it undiminished, he had recourse to frequent unction; which is the reason of the prophet's invitation: "Arise, ye princes, and anoint the shield." As this was done to improve its polish and brightness, so it was covered with a case, when it was not in use, to preserve it from becoming rusty. This is the reason the prophet says, "Kir uncovered the shield." The words of David, already quoted, from his lamentation over Saul and Jonathan, may refer to this practice of anointing the shield, rather than anointing the king: "The shield of the mighty is vilely cast away, the shield of Saul, as though it had not been anointed with oil." the word he being a supplement, the version now given is perfectly agreeable to the original text.—PAXTON.

Strange as it may appear, the Hindoos make offerings to their weapons of war, and to those used in hunting. Fishermen offer incense to the bag in which they carry their fish, and also to the net; thus, while the incense is burning, they hold the different implements in the smoke. They also, when able, sacrifice a sheep or a fowl, which is said to make the ceremony more acceptable to Varuna, the god of the sea. Should the tackle thus consecrated not prove successful, they conclude some part of the ceremony has not been properly performed, and therefore must be repeated. But in addition to this, they often call for their magicians to bless the waters, and to intercede for prosperity. Nor is this sacrificing to implements and weapons confined to fishermen, hunters, and warriors, for even artisans do the same thing to their tools; as also do students and scholars to their books. Thus, at the feast called naravratere, i. e. the nine nights, carpenters, masons, goldsmiths, weavers, and all other tradesmen, may be seen offering to their tools. Ask them a reason, and they say the incense and ceremonies are acceptable to Sarusa-pathi, the beautiful goddess of Brahma.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 9. And, behold, here cometh a chariot of men, with a couple of horsemen. And he answered and said, Babylon is fallen, is fallen; and all the graven images of her gods he hath broken unto the ground.

This is a prophecy, and yet speaks as if the event to which it relates had been already accomplished. In Jeremiah, also, li. 8, it is said, "Babylon is suddenly fallen and destroyed." David says, "Thou hast smitten all mine enemies." Dr. A. Clarke says, "That is, thou wilt smite!" He speaks in full confidence of God's interference, and knows that he shall as surely have the victory, as if he had it already. In these selections the PAST tense is used instead of the FUTURE. He who came from Edom, with died garments from Bozrah, is made to say, "I will stain all my raiment." Dr. A. Clarke has, "And I have stained." In this instance, therefore, the FUTURE is used for the PAST, Ps. lxxix.—"Let their table become a snare before them; and that which should have been for their welfare, let it become a trap. Let their eyes be darkened, that they see not; and make their loins continually to shake. Pour out thine indignation upon them, and let thy wrathful anger take hold of them. Let their habitation be desolate; and let none dwell in their tents." Dr. Boothroyd renders these imprecations in the future, because he believes the whole to refer to judgments that should fall on the enemy. Dr. A. Clarke says, "The execrations here, and in the following verses, should be read in the FUTURE tense, because they are PREDICTIVE, and not in the IMPERATIVE mood, as if they were the offspring of the Psalmist's resentment." It is common in eastern speech, in order to show the CERTAINTY of any thing which SHALL be done, to speak of it as having been ALREADY accomplished. Thus the Psalmist, in speaking of the iniquities of bad men as having already received their reward, evidently alludes to the CERTAINTY of future punishment. It is therefore of the first importance to know in what tense the verb is meant, as that alone will give a true view of the intention of the writer. In the Tamil language the PAST tense is often elegantly used for the FUTURE; thus, in the Nan-naol (the Native Grammar) this distinction is beautifully illustrated. Does a note require to be taken to another place in a very short time, the messenger, on being charged not to loiter on the way, replies, "Nan vanthu vuttolai," i. e. "I have already returned;" whereas he has not taken a single step of his journey. "My friend," asks the priest, "when do you intend to go to the sacred place and perform your vows?" "Nan poye van-thain," i. e. "I have been and returned," which means he is going immediately. "Carpenter, if you are not quick in finishing that car, the gods will be angry with you."—"My lord, the work is already done;" when perhaps some months will have to elapse before the work can be finished. But they also use the PAST for the FUTURE, to denote CERTAINTY as well as SPEED. Do the ants begin to run about with their eggs in their mouth, it is said, "mally-poy-yattu," it has rained, though a single drop has not fallen on the ground. The meaning is, the sign is so CERTAIN, that all doubt is removed. "Why does that man go to the village? Does he not know the cholera is sweeping as a besom? Alas! alas! arvon-chetu ponan; he is already dead;" which means, he will certainly die. Should the friends of a young man inquire whether he may go to sea, the soothsayer says, (if the signs are unfavourable), "He is already drowned." But the FUTURE is also used instead of the past, as in the case of the deliverer from Bozrah: "I will stain," for "I have stained." Should a man refuse to obey an officer, and inquire, "Where is the order of the king?" the reply is, "He will command," which strongly intimates it has been done, and that other consequences will follow. Ver. 11. The burden of Dumah. He calleth to me out of Seir, Watchman, what of the night? watchman, what of the night?

The Orientals employed watchmen to patrol the city during the night, to suppress any disorders in the streets, or to guard the walls against the attempts of a foreign enemy. To this custom Solomon refers in these words: "The watchmen that went about the city found me, they smote me, they wounded me, the keepers of the wall took away my veil from me." This custom may be traced to a very remote antiquity; so early as the departure of Israel from the land of Egypt, the morning watch is mentioned, certainly indicating the time when the watchmen were commonly relieved. In Persia, the watchmen were obliged to indemnify those who were robbed in the streets; which accounts for the vigilance and severity which they display in the discharge of their office, and illustrates the character of watchman given to Ezekiel, who lived in that country, and the duties he was required to perform. If the wicked perished in his iniquities without warning, the prophet was to be accountable for his blood; but if he duly pointed out his danger, he delivered his own soul. These terms, therefore, were neither harsh nor severe; they were the common appointments of watchmen in Persia. They were also charged to announce the progress of the night to the slumbering city: "The burden of Dumah: he calls to me out of Seir, Watchman, what of the night? watchman, what of the night? The watchman said, The morning cometh, and also the night." This is confirmed by an observation of Chardin, upon these words of Moses: "For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night;" that as the people of the East have no clocks, the several parts of the day and of the night, which are eight in all, are announced. In the Indies, the parts of the night are made known, as well by instruments of music, in great cities, as by the rounds of the watchmen, who, with cries and small drums, give them notice that a fourth part of the night is past. Now, as these cries awakened those who had slept all that quarter part of the night, it appeared to them but as a moment. There are sixty of these people in the Indies by day, and as many by night; that is, fifteen for each division. It is evident the ancient Jews knew, by means of some public notice, how the night-watches passed away; but, whether they simply announced the termination of the watch, or made use of trumpets, or other sonorous instruments, in making the proclamation, it may not be easy to determine; and still less what kind of chronometers the watchmen used. The probability is, that the watches were announced with the sound of a trumpet; for the prophet Ezekiel makes it a part of the watchman's duty, at least in time of war, to blow the trumpet, and warn the people.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 1. The burden of the valley of vision. What aileth thee now, that thou art wholly gone up to the house-tops?

The houses in the East were in ancient times as they are still, generally, built in one and the same uniform manner. The roof or top of the house is always flat, covered with broad stones, or a strong plaster of terrace, and guarded on every side with a low parapet-wall. The terrace is frequented as much as any part of the house. On this, as the season favours, they walk, they eat, they sleep, they transact business, they perform their devotions. The house is built with a court within, into which chiefly the windows open; those that open to the street are so obstructed with lattice-work, that no one either without or within can see through them. Whenever, therefore, any thing is to be seen or heard in the streets, every one immediately goes up to the house-top to satisfy his curiosity. In the same manner, when any one had occasion to make any thing public, the readiest and most effectual way of doing it, was to proclaim it from the house-tops to the people in the streets.—LOWTH.

Ver. 8. And he discovered the covering of Judah, and thou didst look in that day to the armour of the house of the forest.

The editor of the Fragments subjoined to Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible, thus renders and explains this passage: He rolled up, turned back, the covering of Judah, as the covering veils, hanging at the door of a house or tent, are rolled up, for more convenient passage, and did look, inspect carefully, the arms and weapons of the house of the forest. The ideas contained in this interpretation are aptly expressed in the following extract from Frazer's History of Kouli Khan: "Nadir Shah, having taken Delhi, ordered Sirbuland Khan to attend the Towpeli Bashi, the master of the ordnance; and the Nissikchi Bachi, head regulator, commissary of seizures, who had each two hundred horse, to seize all the king's and the omra's ordnance, the treasury, jewels, toishik-khanna, (the arsenal), and all the other implements and arms that belonged to the emperor, and the deceased omras; and to send to Mahommed Shah, the captive emperor, his son, Sultan Ahmed, and Malika al Zumani, (the queen of the times), the empress, Nadir Shah took away the ordnance, effects, and treasure." May not such a conduct in a conqueror justify the allusion supposed to be intended in this representation of the prophet; for what is this but rolling back what covered the privacy of the conquered state, and prying into the house of its armoury.—BURDE.

Ver. 16. What hast thou here, and whom hast thou here, that thou hast hewed thee out a sepulchre here, as he that hewed him out a sepulchre on high, and that graveth a habitation for himself in a rock?

The Orientals bury without the walls of their cities, unless when they wish to bestow a distinguishing mark of honour upon the deceased. For this reason, the sepulchres of David and his family, and the tomb of Huldah the prophetess, were within the city of Jerusalem; and perhaps the only ones to be found there. The sepulchres of the Hebrews, that were able to afford the necessary expense, were extensive caves or vaults, excavated in the native rock, by the art and exertions of man. The roofs were generally arched; and some were so spacious as to be supported by colonnades. All round the sides were cells for the reception of the sarcophagi; these were ornamented with appropriate sculpture, and each was placed in its proper cell. The cave or sepulchre admitted no light, being closed by a great stone which was rolled to the mouth, by the narrow passage or entrance. Many of these receptacles are still extant in Judea; two in particular are more magnificent than all the rest, and for that reason supposed to be the sepulchres of the kings. One of these is in Jerusalem, and contains twenty-four cells; the other, containing twice that number, is without the city. "You are to forin to yourself," says Lowth, speaking of these sepulchres, "an idea of an immense subterraneous vault, a vast gloomy cavern, all round the sides of which are cells to receive the dead bodies; here the deceased monarchs lie in a distinguished sort of state, suitable to their former rank, each on his own couch, with his arms beside him, his sword at his head, and the bodies of his chiefs and companions round about him."

"Whoever," says Maundrell, "was buried there, this is certain, that the place itself discovers so great an expense, both of labour and of treasure, that we may well suppose it to have been the work of kings. You approach it at the east side through an entrance cut out of the natural rock, which admits you into an open court of about forty paces square, cut down into the rock, with which it is encompassed instead of walls. On the south side of the court, is a portico, nine paces long, and four broad, hewn likewise out of the rock. This has a kind of architrave running along its front, adorned with sculpture of fruits and flowers, still discernible, but by time much defaced. At the end of the portico on the left hand, you descend to the passage into the sepulchres. Passing through it, you arrive in a large apartment about seven or eight yards square, cut out of the natural rock. Its sides and ceiling are so exactly square, and its angles so just, that no architect with levels and plummet could build a room more regular; and the whole is so firm and entire, that it may be called a chamber hollowed out of one piece of marble. From this room you pass into six more, one within another, all of the same fabric as the first. Of these the two innermost are deeper than the rest, having a second descent of about six or seven steps into them. In every one of these rooms, except the first, were coffins of stone placed in niches in the sides of the chambers. They had been at first covered with handsome lids, and carved with garlands; but now most of them are broken to pieces by sacrilegious hands. The sides and ceilings of the rooms were also drooping with the moist damps condensed upon them; to remedy which nuisance, and to preserve these chambers of the dead polite and clean, there was in each room a small channel cut in the floor, which served to drain the drops that fell constantly into it.

To these sepulchres, and their interior chambers, one within another, the wise man, by a bold and striking figure, compares the dwelling of a lewd woman: "Her house is the way to hades;" her first or outer chamber is like the open court that leads to the tomb, "going down to the chambers of death;" her private apartments, like the separate recesses of a sepulchre, are the receptacles of loathsome corruption; and he calls them, in allusion to the solidity of the rock in which they are hewn, the "long home," (בית עולם) beth olam, the house of ages. The higher such sepulchres were cut in the rock, or the more conspicuously they were situated, the greater was supposed to be the honour of reposing there. "Hezekiah was buried in the chiefest," says our translation; rather, in the highest part of the sepulchres of the sons of David," to do him the more honour. The vanity of Shebna, which so much displeased the Lord, was discovered in preparing for himself a sepulchre in the face of some lofty rock: "What hast thou here, and whom hast thou here, that thou hast hewed thee out a sepulchre here, as he that heweth him out a sepulchre on high, and that graveth a habitation for him in a rock." Several modern travellers mention some monuments still remaining in Persia of great antiquity, which gave them a clear idea of Shebna's pompous design for his sepulchre. They consist of several tombs, each of them hewn in a high rock near the top; the front of the rock to the valley below, being the outside of the sepulchre, is adorned with carved work in relief. Some of these sepulchres are about thirty feet in the perpendicular from the valley. Diodorus Siculus mentions these ancient monuments, and calls them the sepulchres of the kings of Persia. The tombs of Telmessus, in the island of Rhodes, which Dr. Clarke visited, furnish a still more remarkable commentary on this text. They "are of two kinds; the first are sepulchres hewn in the face of perpendicular rocks. Wherever the side of a mountain presented an almost inaccessible steep, there the ancient workmen seem to have bestowed their principal labour. In such situations are seen excavated chambers, worked with such marvellous art, as to exhibit open façades, porticoes with Ionic columns, gates and doors beautifully sculptured, in which are carved the representation of an embossed iron work, bolts and hinges of one stone.

"The other kind of tomb is the true Grecian soros, the sarcophagus of the Romans. Of this sort there are several, but of a size and grandeur far exceeding any thing of the kind elsewhere, standing in some instances upon the craggy pinnacles of lofty precipitous rocks. Each consists of a single stone, others of still larger size, of more than one stone. Some consist of two masses of stone, one for the body, or chest of the soros, and the other for its operculum; and to increase the wonder excited by the skill and labour manifested in their construction, they have been almost miraculously raised to the surrounding heights, and there left standing upon the projections and crags of the rocks, which the casualties of nature presented for their reception. At Macri, the tombs are cut out of the solid rock, in the precipices towards the sea. Some of them have a kind of portico, with pillars in front. In these they were almost plain. The hewn stone was as smooth as if the artist had been employed upon wood, or any other soft substance. They most nearly resemble book-cases, with glass doors. A small rectangular opening, scarcely large enough to pass through, admits a stranger to the interior of these tombs; where is found a square chamber, with one or more receptacles for dead bodies, shaped like baths, upon the sides of the apartment, and neatly chiselled in the body of the rock. The mouths of these sepulchres had been originally closed by square slabs of stone, exactly adapted to grooves cut for their reception; and so nicely adjusted, that when the work was finished, the place of entrance might not be observed. Of similar construction were the sepulchres of the Jews in Palestine, and particularly that in which our Lord was buried. Many of these have the appearance of being inaccessible; but by dint of climbing from rock to rock, at the risk of a dangerous fall, it is possible to ascend even to the highest. They are fronted with rude pillars, which are integral parts of the solid rock. Some of them are twenty feet high. The mouths of these sepulchres are closed with beautiful sculptured imitations of brazen or iron doors, with hinges, knobs, and bars."

This intelligent traveller visited a range of tombs of the same kind on the borders of the lake of Tiberias, hewn by the earliest inhabitants of Galilee, in the rocks which face the water. They were deserted in the time of our Saviour, and had become the resort of wretched men, afflicted by diseases, and made outcasts of society; for these tombs are particularly alluded to in the account of a cure performed upon a maniac in the country of the Gadarenes. The tombs at Naplose, the ancient Sichem, where Joseph, Joshua, and others, were buried, are also hewn out of the solid rock, and durable as the hills in which they are excavated. Constituting integral parts of mountains, and chiselled with a degree of labour not to be conceived from mere description, these monuments suffer no change from the lapse of ages; they have defied, and will defy, the attacks of time, and continue as perfect at this hour, as they were in the first moment of their completion.—PAXTON.

Ver. 17. Behold, the LORD will carry thee away with a mighty captivity, and will surely cover thee.

To be covered is a sign of mourning, of degradation, and inferiority. People in great sorrow cover their faces with their robes; thus may be seen the weeping mother and sorrow-struck father: they cover themselves from the sight of others, to conceal their dejection and tears. But when people are ashamed, also, they cover their heads and faces. For a man to say he will cover another, intimates superiority, and shows that he will put him to confusion. "Yes, the man who was brought up and nourished by the Modelliar, is now greater than his benefactor, for he covers him." "Look at that parasitical banyan tree; when it first began to grow on the other tree, it was a very small plant, but it has been allowed to flourish, and now it covers the parent stock." Thus, those who were to be carried into captivity, were to be COVERED, in token of their sorrow, degradation, and inferiority.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 22. And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder: so he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open.

How much was I delighted when I first saw the people, especially the Moors, going along the streets with each his key on his shoulder. The handle is generally made of brass, (though sometimes of silver,) and is often nicely worked in a device of filigree. The way it is carried, is to have the corner of a kerchief tied to the ring; the key is then placed on the shoulder, and the kerchief hangs down in front. At other times they have a bunch of large keys, and then they have half on one side of the shoulder, and half on the other. For a man thus to march along with a large key on his shoulder, shows at once that he is a person of consequence. "Raman is in great favour with the Modelliar, for he now carries the key." "Whose key have you got on your shoulder?" "I shall carry my key on my own shoulder." The key of the house of David was to be on the shoulder of Ehjakim, who was a type of him who had the "government" upon his shoulder; "the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 23. And I will fasten him as a nail in a sure place; and he shall be for a glorious throne to his father's house.

When a man in power has given a situation to another, it is said of the favoured individual, "He is fastened as a nail." "Yes, his situation is fixed, he will not be moved." "What! has Tamban lost his glory? I thought he had been fastened as a nail."—ROBERTS.

The Orientals, in fitting up their houses, were by no means inattentive to the comfort and satisfaction arising from order and method. Their furniture was scanty and plain; but they were careful to arrange the few household utensils they needed, so as not to encumber the apartments to which they belonged. Their devices for this purpose, which, like every part of the structure, bore the character of remarkable simplicity, may not correspond with our ideas of neatness and propriety; but they accorded with their taste, and sufficiently answered their design. One of these consisted in a set of spikes, nails, or large pegs, fixed in the walls of the house, upon which they hung up the moveables and utensils in common use, that belonged to the room. These nails they do not drive into the walls with a hammer or mallet, but fix them there when the house is building; for if the walls are of brick, they are too hard, or if they consist of clay, too soft and mouldering, to admit the action of the hammer. The spikes, which are so contrived as to strengthen the walls, by binding the parts together, as well as to serve for convenience, are large, with square heads like dice, and bent at the ends so as to make them cramp-irons. They commonly place them at the windows and doors, in order to hang upon them, when they choose, veils and curtains, although they place them in other parts of the room, to hang up other things of various kinds. The care with which they fixed these nails, may be inferred, as well from the important purposes they were meant to serve, as from the promise of the Lord to Eliakim: "And I will fasten him as a nail in a sure place." Pins and nails, Dr. Russel observes, in a manuscript note, are seldom used (at A. epp.) for hanging clothes or other articles upon, which are usually laid one over the other, on a chest, or particular kind of chair. This intelligent writer does not refuse that they are occasionally used in modern times; and it is evident from the words of the prophet, that it was common in his time to suspend upon them the utensils belonging to the apartment: "Will men take a pin of it to hang any vessel thereon?" The word used in Isaiah for a nail of this sort, is the same which denotes the stake, or large pin of iron, which fastened down to the ground the cords of their tents. These nails, therefore, were of necessary and common use, and of no small importance in all their apartments; and if they seem to us mean and insignificant, it is because they are unknown to us, and inconsistent with our notions of propriety, and because we have no name for them but what conveys to our ear a low and contemptible idea. It is evident from the frequent allusions in scripture to these instruments, that they were not regarded with contempt or indifference by the natives of Palestine. "Grace has been showed from the Lord our God," said Ezra, "to leave us a remnant to escape, and to give us a nail in his holy place;" or, as explained in the margin, a constant and sure abode. The dignity and propriety of the metaphor appears from the use which the prophet Zechariah makes of it: "Out of him cometh forth the corner, out of him the nail, out of him the battle bow, out of him every oppressor together." The whole frame of government, both in church and state, which the chosen people of God enjoyed, was the contrivance of his wisdom, and the gift of his bounty: the foundations upon which it rested; the bonds which kept the several parts together; its means of defence; its officers and executors, were all the fruits of distinguishing goodness; even the oppressors of his people were a rod of correction in the hand of Jehovah, to convince them of sin, and restore them to his service.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Ver. 5. The earth also is defiled under the inhabitants thereof, because they have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinance, broken the everlasting covenant.

These expressive words, while they declare the cause of the judgments and desolation, denote also the great depravity of those who were to inhabit the land of Judea, during the time of its desolation, and while its ancient inhabitants were to be "scattered abroad." And although the ignorance of those who dwell therein may be pitied, their degeneracy will not be denied. The ferocity of the Turks, the prelatry habits of the Arabs, the abject state of the few poor Jews who are suffered to dwell in the land of their fathers, the base superstitions of the different Christian sects; the frequent contentions that subsist among such a mingled and diversified people, and the gross ignorance and great depravity that prevail throughout the whole, have all sadly changed and stained the moral aspect of that country, which, from sacred remembrances, is denominated the Holy Land; have converted that region, where alone in all the world, and during many ages, the only living and true God was worshipped; and where alone the pattern of perfect virtue was ever exhibited to human view, or in the human form, into one of the most degraded countries of the globe, and in appropriate terms, may well be said to have defiled the land. And it has been defiled throughout many an age. The Father of mercies afflicteth not willingly, nor grieves the children of men. Sin is ever the precursor of the actual judgments of Heaven. It was on account of their idolatry and wickedness that the ten tribes were earliest plucked from off the land of Israel. The blood of Jesus, according to their prayer, and the full measure of their iniquity, according to their doings, was upon the Jews and upon their children. Before they were extirpated from that land which their iniquities had defiled, it was drenched with the blood of more than a million of their race. Judea afterward had a partial and temporary respite from desolation, when Christian churches were established there. But in that land, the nursery of Christianity, the seeds of its corruption, or perversion, began soon to appear. The moral power of religion decayed, the worship of images prevailed, and the nominal disciples of a pure faith "broke the everlasting covenant." The doctrine of Mohammed, the Koran, or the sword, was the scourge and the cure of idolatry; but all the native impurities of the Mohammedan creed succeeded to a grossly corrupted form of Christianity. Since that period, hordes of Saracens, Egyptians, Fatimites, Tartars, Mamelukes, Turks, (a combination of names of unmatch'd barbarism, at least in modern times,) have, for the space of twelve hundred years, defiled the land of the children of Israel with iniquity and with blood. And in very truth the prophecy savours not in the least of hyperbole: the worst of the heathen shall possess their houses, and the holy places shall be defiled. Omer, on the first conquest of Jerusalem by the Mohammedans, erected a mosque on the site of the temple of Solomon; and, jealous as the God of Israel is, that his glory be not given to another, the unseemly, and violent, and bloody contentions among Christian sects, around the very sepulchre of the Author of the faith which they dishonour, bear not a feebler testimony in the present day, than the preceding fact bore, at so remote a period, to the truth of this prediction. The phrensied zeal of crusading Christians could not expel the heathen from Judea, though Europe then poured like a torrent upon Asia. But the defilement of the land, no less than that of the holy places, is not yet cleansed away. And Judea is still defiled to this hour, not only by oppressive rulers, but by an unprincipled and a lawless people. "The barbarism of Syria," says Volney, "is complete." "I have often reflected," says Burckhardt, in describing the dishonest conduct of a Greek priest in the hauran, (but in words that admit of too general an application,) "that if the English penal laws were suddenly promulgated in this country, there is scarcely any man in business, or who has money-dealings with others, who would not be liable to transportation before the end of the first six months. Under the name of Christianity, every degrading superstition and profane rite, equally remote from the enlightened tenets of the gospel, and the dignity of human nature, are professed and tolerated. The pure gospel of Christ, everywhere the herald of civilization and of science, is almost as little known in the Holy Land, as in California or New Holland. A series of legendary traditions, mingled with remains of Judaism, and the wretched fantasies of illiterate ascetics, may now and then exhibit a glimmering of heavenly light; but if we seek for the effects of Christianity in the Land of Canaan, we must look for that period when the desert shall blossom as the rose, and the wilderness become a fruitful field."—KEITH.

Ver. 6. Therefore hath the curse devoured the earth, and they that dwell therein are desolate: therefore the inhabitants of the earth are burned, and few men left.

"The government of the Turks in Syria is a pure military despotism, that is, the bulk of the inhabitants are subject to the caprices of a faction of armed men, who dispose of every thing according to their interest and fancy. In each government the pacha is an absolute despot. In the villages, the inhabitants, limited to the mere necessities of life, have no arts but those without which they cannot subsist. There is no safety without the towns, nor security within their precincts." (Voiney.) "Few men left." While their character is thus depraved, and their condition miserable, their number is also small indeed, as the inhabitants of so extensive and fertile a region. After estimating the number of inhabitants in Syria in general, Voiney remarks, "So feeble a population in so excellent a country, may well excite our astonishment; but this will be increased, if we compare the present number of inhabitants with that of ancient times. We are informed by the philosophical geographer, Strabo, that the territories of Yanmia and Yoppa, in Palestine alone, were formerly so populous as to bring forty thousand armed men into the field. At present they could scarcely furnish three thousand. From the accounts we have of Judea, in the time of Titus, which are to be esteemed tolerably accurate, that country must have contained four millions of inhabitants. If we go still further back into antiquity, we shall find the same populousness among the Philistines, the Phœnicians, and in the kingdoms of Samaria and Damascus." Though the ancient population of the land of Israel be estimated at the lowest computation, and the existing population be rated at the highest, yet that country does not now contain a tenth part of the number of inhabitants which it plentifully supported, exclusively from their industry, and from the rich resources of its own luxuriant soil, for many successive centuries; and how could it possibly have been imagined that this identical land would ever yield so scanty a subsistence to be desolate dwellers therein, and that there would be so few men left?—KERN.

Ver. 13. When thus it shall be in the midst of the land among the people, there shall be as the shaking of an olive-tree, and as the gleanings of grapes when the vintage is done.

See on ch. 17. 6.

CHAPTER XXV.

Ver. 6. And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees; of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined.

See on ch. 51. 17.

In the East they keep their wine in jugs, from which they have no method of drawing it off fine: it is therefore commonly somewhat thick and turbid, by the lees with which it is mixed: to remedy this inconvenience they filtrate or strain it through a cloth, and to this custom, as prevailing in his time, the prophet here plainly alludes.—BURDEN.

Ver. 10. For in this mountain shall the hand of the Lord rest, and Moab shall be trodden down under him, even as straw is trodden down for the dunghill.

See on ch. 28. 26—28.

Dr. A. Clarke has, "for the dunghill," "under the wheels of the car." This may allude to their ancient cars of war, under which Moab was to be crushed, or under her own heathen cars, in which the gods were taken out in procession. To spread forth the hands, as a person when swimming, may refer to the involuntary stretching forth of the limbs, when the body was crushed with the weight of the car; or to the custom of those who, when they go before the car in procession, prostrate themselves on the ground, and spread out their hands and legs as if swimming; till they have measured the full distance the car has to go, by throwing themselves on the earth at the length of every six feet, and by motions as if in the act of swimming. The whole of this is done as a penance for sin, or in compliance with a vow made in sickness or despair.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Ver. 19. Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead.

As they sometimes plant herbs and flowers above the graves of the dead, so Dr. Addison observed, that the Jews of Barbary adorned the graves of their dead in a less lasting manner, with green boughs brought thither from time to time; might not this practice originate from the doctrine of the resurrection? perhaps from that well known passage of a prophet: "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." Is. xxvi. 19. Or if it was practised still earlier, might not this passage have reference to that custom? It is admitted, that the practice obtained among those that entertained no expectation of a resurrection, but in the language of St. Paul sorrowed as people that had no such hope. The ancient Greeks practised this decking the graves of their dead, but it might notwithstanding originate from that doctrine, and be adopted by those of a different belief, as having something in it softening the horrors of viewing their relatives immersed in the dust; and might be thought to be agreeable by those that entered into medical considerations, as correcting those ill-scented and noxious exhalations that might arise in those burial places, to which their women, more especially, were frequently induced to go, to express their attachment to the departed. Maillet supposes the modern Egyptians lay leaves and herbs on the graves of their friends, from a notion that this was a consolation to the dead, and believed to be refreshing to them from their shade. The women there, according to him, go, "at least two days in the week, to pray and weep at the sepulchres of the dead; and the custom then is to throw upon the tombs a sort of herb which the Arabs call rihan, and which is our sweet basil. They cover them also with the leaves of the palm-tree." If they use any other plants for this purpose in Egypt, he has neglected to mention them.—HARMER.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Ver. 10. Yet the defenced city shall be desolate, and the habitation forsaken, and left like a wilderness: there shall the calf feed, and there shall he lie down, and consume the branches thereof.

Josephus describes Galilee, of which he was the governor, as "full of plantations of trees of all sorts, the soil universally rich and fruitful, and all, without the exception of a single part, cultivated by the inhabitants. Moreover," he adds, "the cities lie here very thick, and there are very many villages, which are so full of people, by the richness of their soil, that the very least of them contained above fifteen thousand inhabitants." Such was Galilee, at the commencement of the Christian era, several centuries after the prophecy was delivered; but now "the plain of Esdraelon and all the other parts of Galilee which afford pasture, are occupied by Arab tribes, around whose brown tents the sheep and lambs gambol to the sound of the reed, which at nightfall calls them home." The calf feeds and lies down amid the ruins of the cities, and consumes, without hindrance, the branches of the trees; and, however changed may be the condition of the inhabitants, the lambs feed after their manner, and, while the land mourns, and the merry-hearted sigh, they gambol to the sound of the reed. The precise and complete contrast between the ancient and existing state of Palestine, as separately described by Jewish and Roman historians and by modern travellers, is so strikingly exemplified in their opposite descriptions, that, in reference to whatever constituted the beauty and the glory of the country, or the happiness of the people, an entire change is manifest, even in minute circumstances. The universal richness and fruitfulness of the soil of Galilee, together with its being "full of plantations of all sorts of trees," are represented by Josephus as "inviting the most slothful to take pains in its cultivation." And the other provinces of the Holy Land are also described by him as "having abundance of trees, full of autumnal fruit, both that which grows wild, and that which is the effect of cultivation." Tacitus relates, that, besides all the fruits of Italy, the palm and balsam-tree flourished in the fertile soil of Judea. And he records the great carefulness with which, when the circulation of the juices seemed to call for it, they gently made an incision in the branches of the balsam, with a shell, or pointed stone, not venturing to apply a knife. No sign of such art or care is now to be seen throughout the land. The balsam-tree has disappeared where long it flourished; and barded plants have perished from other causes than the want of due care in their cultivation. And instead of relating how the growth of a delicate tree is promoted, and the medicinal liquor at the same time extracted from its branches, by a nicety or perfectibility of art worthy of the notice of a Tacitus, a different task has fallen to the lot of the traveller from a far land, who describes the customs of those who now dwell where such arts were practised. "The olive-trees (near Arimathea) are daily perishing through age, the ravages of contending factions, and even from secret mischief. The Mamelukes having cut down all the olive-trees, for the pleasure they take in destroying, or to make fires, Yafahas has lost its greatest convenience." Instead of "abundance of trees" being still the effect of cultivation, such, on the other hand, has been the effect of these ravages, that many places in Palestine are now "absolutely destitute of fuel." Yet in this devastation, and in all its progress, may be read the literal fulfilment of the prophecy, which not only described the desolate cities of Judea as a pasture of flocks, and as places for the calf to feed and lie down, and consume the branches thereof; but which, with equal truth, also declared, "when the boughs thereof are withered, they shall be broken off; the women come and set them on fire."—KEITH.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Ver. 1. Wo to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim, whose glorious beauty is a fading flower, which are on the head of the fat valleys of them that are overcome with wine!

The city of Sebaste, the ancient Samaria, beautifully situated on the top of a round hill, and surrounded immediately with a rich valley and a circle of other hills beyond it, suggested the idea of a chaplet, or wreath of flowers, worn upon their heads on occasions of festivity; expressed by the proud crown and the fading flower of the drunkards. That this custom of wearing chaplets in their banquets prevailed among the Jews, as well as among the Greeks and Romans, appears from Wisdom ii. 7, 8.—LOWTH.

Ver. 15. Because ye have said, We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come unto us; for we have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves.

Of those who have often had a narrow escape from death, it is said, "Those fellows have entered into an agreement with death." "They have made a friendship; death injure them! chee, chee, they understand each other."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 25. When he hath made plain the face thereof, doth he not cast abroad the fitches, and scatter the cummin, and cast in the principal wheat, and the appointed barley, and the rye, in their place?

See on ch. 32. 20.

Ver. 26. For his God doth instruct him to discretion, and doth teach him. 27. For the fitches are not thrashed with a thrashing instrument, neither is a cart-wheel turned about upon the cummin; but the fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod.

28. Bread-corn is bruised; because he will not ever be thrashing it, nor break it with the wheel of his cart, nor bruise it with his horsemen.

The method of thrashing out the grain, varied according to the species. Isaiah mentions four different instruments, the flail, the drag, the wain, and the feet of the ox. The staff, or flail, was used for the smaller seeds, which were too tender to be treated in the other methods. The drag consisted of a sort of strong planks, made rough at the bottom with hard stones or iron; it was drawn by oxen, or horses, over the corn sheaves spread on the floor, the driver sitting upon it. The wain, or cart, was much like the former, but had wheels, with iron teeth or edges like a saw. From the statement of different authors, it would seem that the axle was armed with iron teeth, or serrated wheels throughout. Niebuhr gives a description and print of such a machine, used at present in Egypt for the same purpose; it moves upon three rollers, armed with iron teeth or wheels to cut the straw. In Syria, they make use of the drag, constructed in the very same manner as before described. This not only forced out the grain, but also cut the straw in pieces, which is used in this state over all the East as fodder for the cattle. Virgil also mentions the slow rolling wains of the Eleusinian mother, the planks and sleds for pressing out the corn, and harrows of unwieldy weight. The Israelitish farmer, endowed with discretion from above, made use of all these instruments in separating from the chaff the various produce of his fields: "For his God doth instruct him to discretion, and doth teach him. For the fitches are not thrashed with a thrashing instrument, neither is a cart-wheel turned about upon the cummin; but the fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod. Bread-corn is bruised: because he will not ever be thrashing it, nor break it with the wheel of his cart, nor bruise it with his horsemen. This also cometh forth from the Lord of hosts, who is wonderful in counsel and excellent in working." In the early periods of the Jewish commonwealth, however, these various methods, adapted to the different kinds of grain, were unknown; the husbandman employed the staff, or flail, in thrashing all his crop. When the angel of the Lord appeared to Gideon, he found him thrashing wheat by the wine-press with a staff, for so the original term (סֹבֵב) signifies; and after Ruth had gleaned in the field till the evening, she beat out with a staff (סֹבֵב) what she had gleaned. The Seventy render the verb in both passages, by the Greek word παλίστριον, to beat with a rod; but the natural sagacity of the human mind, directed by the finger of God, at last invented the other more efficacious implements, to which Isaiah so frequently refers in the course of his writings. He compares Moab, in the day of their overthrow, to straw which is trodden down under the wain; and he promises to furnish his oppressed people with the same powerful instrument, which we translate a new sharp thrashing instrument having teeth, that they may thrash the mountains, and beat them small, and make the hills as chaff; or dropping the metaphor, he promises them complete victory over their numerous and powerful enemies, who should be given by the Lord of hosts as driven stubble to their bow, and swept away before the armies of Israel as chaff before the whirlwinds of the south.—PAXTON.

As in different parts of the holy scriptures there are frequent allusions to the sowing of rice, watering the ground, thrashing, or what the prophet Isaiah, xxvii. 28, terms, breaking it with the wheel of the cart; or, bringing the wheel over it, Prov. xx. 26, it may not be improper to conclude these remarks with a short account of the sowing, cultivation, thrashing, and preservation of rice, taken from the travels of Mr. Sonnini, a writer worthy of the utmost credit in every thing that concerns the natural history and antiquities of Egypt.

"Rice is sown in Lower Egypt from the month of March to that of May. During the inundation of the Nile, the fields are covered by its waters; and in order to detain them there as long as possible, small dikes, or a sort of raised embankments, are thrown up, round each field, to prevent them from running off. Trenches serve to convey thither a fresh supply; for, in order to make the plant thrive, its roots must be constantly watered. The ground is so moistened, that in some places a person sinks in half way up to his chin. Rice is nearly six months before it comes to maturity; and it is generally cut down by the mid-de of November. In Egypt the use of the flail is unknown. To separate the grain from the straw, the inhabitants prepare with a mixture of earth and pigeon's dung, spacious floors, well beat, and very clean. The rice is spread thereon in thick layers. They then have a sort of cart, formed of two pieces of wood joined together by two cross-pieces; it is almost in the shape of sledges which serve for the conveyance of burdens in the streets of our cities. Between the longer sides of this sledge are fixed transversely three rows of small wheels, made of solid iron, and narrowed off towards their circumference. On the forepart, a very high and very wide seat is clumsily constructed. A man sitting there drives two oxen, which are harnessed to the machine, and the whole moves on slowly, and always in a circular direction, over every part of the heap of rice, until there remains no more grain in the straw. When it is thus heat, it is spread in the air to be dried. In order to turn it over, several men walk abreast, and each of them, with his foot, makes a furrow in the layer of grain, so that in a few moments the whole mass is moved, and that part which was underneath is again exposed to the air.

"The dried rice is carried to the mill, where it is stripped of its chaff or husk. This mill consists of a wheel turned by oxen, and which sets several levers in motion; at their extremity is an iron cylinder, near a foot long, and hollowed out underneath. They beat in troughs which contain the grain. At the side of each trough there constantly stands a man, whose business is to place the rice under the cylinders. He must not suffer his attention to be diverted; for he would run a risk of having his hand crushed. After this operation, the rice is taken out of the mill, and sifted in the open air; which is done by filling a small sieve with as much grain as a man can lift; this he raises above his head, and gently spills the rice, turning his face to the wind, which blows away the small chaff or dust. This cleaned rice is put a second time in the mill, in order to bleach it. It is afterward mixed up in troughs with some salt, which contributes very much to its whiteness, and principally to its preservation; it has then undergone its whole preparatory process, and in this state it is sold."—HARMER.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Ver. 1. Wo to Ariel, to Ariel, the city where David dwelt! add ye year to year; let them kill sacrifices.

The numbers that assembled at Jerusalem must of course consume great quantities of provision. The consumption of flesh also must there have been much larger, in proportion to the number of the people, than elsewhere; because in the East they live in common very much on vegetables, farinaceous food, oil, honey, &c.; but at Jerusalem vast quantities of flesh were consumed in the sacred feasts, as well as burnt upon the altar. Perhaps this circumstance will best explain the holy city's being called Ariel, or the Lion of God, Isaiah xxix. 1: an appellation which has occasioned a variety of speculation among the learned. Vitringia, in his celebrated commentary on Isaiah, supposes that David, according to the eastern custom, was called the Lion of God, and so this city was called by this name from him; a resolution by no means natural. The Arabs, indeed, in later ages, have often called their great men by this honourable term; D'Herbelot, I think, somewhere tells us, that Ali, Mohammed's son-in-law, was so called; and I am sure he affirms, that Mohammed gave this title to Hamzah, his uncle. It will be readily allowed that this was conformable to the taste of much more ancient times. "The modern Persians will have it," says D'Herbelot, in his account of Shiraz, a city of that country, "that this name was given to it, because this city consumes and devours like a lion, which is called Steer in Persian, all that is brought to it, by which they express the multitude, and it may be the good appetite, of its inhabitants."

The prophet then pronounces wo to Zion, perhaps as too ready to trust to the number of its inhabitants and sojourners, which may be insinuated by this term which he uses, Ariel.—HARMER.

Ver. 3. And I will camp against thee round about, and will lay siege against thee with a mount, and I will raise forts against thee.

Moveable towers of wood were usually placed upon the mount, which were driven on wheels fixed within the bottom planks, to secure them from the enemy. Their size was not always the same, but proportioned to the towers of the city they besieged. The front was usually covered with tiles, and in later times the sides were likewise guarded with the same materials; their tops were covered with raw hides, and other things, to preserve them from fire balls and missile weapons; they were formed into several stories, which were able to carry both soldiers and several kinds of engines." All these modes of attack were practised in the days of Isaiah, who threatens Jerusalem with a siege conducted according to this method: "And I will encamp against thee round about, and will lay siege against thee with a mount; and I will raise forts against thee." The prophet Ezekiel repeats the prediction in almost the same words, adding only the name of the engine which was to be employed in battering down the walls: "Thou also, son of man, take thee a tile, and lay it before thee, and portray upon it the city, even Jerusalem; and lay siege against it, and cast a mount against it; set the camp also against it; and set battering rams against it round about."—PAXTON.

Ver. 8. It shall even be as when a hungry man dreameth, and behold, he eateth; but he awaketh, and his soul is empty: or as when a thirsty man dreameth, and behold, he drinketh; but he awaketh, and behold, he is faint, and his soul hath appetite: so shall the multitude of all the nations be that fight against Mount Zion.

As the simile of the prophet is drawn from nature, an extract which describes the actual occurrence of such a circumstance will be agreeable. "The scarcity of water was greater here at Bubaker than at Benown. Day and night the wells were crowded with cattle lowing, and fighting with each other to come at the trough. Excessive thirst made many of them furious; others being too weak to contend for the water, endeavoured to quench their thirst by devouring the black mud from the guffers near the wells; which they did with great avidity, though it was commonly fatal to them. This great scarcity of water was felt by all the people of the camp; and by none more than myself. I begged water from the negro slaves that attended the camp, but with very indifferent success: for though I let no opportunity slip, and was very urgent in my solicitations both to the Moors and to the negroes, I was but ill supplied, and frequently passed the night in the situation of Tantalus. No sooner had I shut my eyes, than fancy would convey me to the streams and rivers of my native land; there, as I wandered along the verdant bank, I surveyed the clear stream with transport, and hastened to swallow the delightful draught; but, alas! disappointment awakened me, and I found myself a lonely captive, perishing of thirst amid the wilds of Africa." (Park.)—BURDER.

Ver. 17. Is it not yet a very little while, and Lebanon shall be turned into a fruitful field, and the fruitful field shall be esteemed as a forest?

The storms and tempests which, gathering on the highest peak of Lebanon, burst on the plains and valleys below, are often very severe. When De la Valle was travelling in the neighbourhood of that mountain, in the end of April, a wind blew from its summits so vehement and cold, with so great a profusion of snow, that though he and his company "were in a manner buried in their quilted corerlets, yet it was sensibly felt, and proved very disagreeable." It is not therefore without reason that Lebanon, or the white mountain, as the term signifies, is the name by which that lofty chain is distinguished; and that the sacred writers so frequently refer to the snow and the gelid waters of Lebanon. They sometimes allude to it as a wild and desolate region; and certainly no part of the earth is more dreary and barren than the Sannin, the region of perpetual snow. On that naked summit, the seat of storm and tempest, where the principles of vegetation are extinguished, the art and industry of man can make no impression; nothing but the creating power of God himself, can produce a favourable alteration. Thus, predicting a wonderful change, such as results from the signal manifestations of the divine favour to individuals or the church, the prophet demands, "Is it not yet a very little while, and Lebanon shall be turned into a fruitful field?" The contrast in this promise, between the naked, snowy, and tempestuous summits of Lebanon, and a field beautiful and enriched with the fairest and most useful productions of nature, expresses, with great force, the difference which the smiles of Heaven produce in the most wretched and hopeless circumstances of an individual or a nation.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XXX.

Ver. 14. And he shall break it as the breaking of the potter's vessel that is broken in pieces; he shall not spare: so that there shall not be found in the bursting of it a sherd to take fire from the hearth, or to take water withal out of the pit.

This solemn threatening refers to the Jews for their wicked reliance "in the shadow of Egypt;" they were to be reduced to the greatest straits for thus trusting in the heathen. It is proverbial to say of those who have been robbed, and left in destitute circumstances, "They have not even a potsherd, not a broken chatty in their possession." To appreciate this idea, it must be remembered that nearly all their cooking utensils, all their domestic vessels, are made of earthenware; so that not to have a potsherd, a fragment left, shows the greatest misery. Even Job, in all his poverty and wretchedness, was not so destitute, for he had "a potsherd to scrape himself withal."—"A sherd to take fire from the hearth." This allusion may be seen illustrated every morning in the East. Should the good woman's fire have been extinguished in the night, she takes a potsherd in the morning, and goes to her neighbour for a little fire to rekindle her own; and as she goes along, she may be seen every now and then blowing the burning ember, lest it should go out. They were not to have a sherd, out of which they could drink a little water. Not having pumps, they are obliged to have something to take water from the well or tank. Of a very poor country, it is said, "In those parts there is not a sherd out of which you can drink a little water." "The wretchedness of the people is so great, they have not a sherd with which to take water from the tank."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 24. The oxen likewise, and the young asses that ear the ground, shall eat clean provender which hath been winnowed with the shovel and with the fan.

See on 1 Kings 4. 24.

Those who form their opinion of the latter article by an English FAN, will entertain a very erroneous notion. That of the East is made of the fibrous part of the palmirah or cocoa-tree leaves, and measures about a yard each way. Thus may be seen the farmer wafting away the chaff from the corn, having the round part of the fan in his hand: and thus may be seen the females in the morning, tossing in the husk from their rice. (See on Jer. xv. 7.)—ROBERTS.

In these words, the prophet foretels a season of great plenty, when the cattle shall be fed with corn better in quality, separated from the chaff, and (as the term rendered clean in our version, properly signifies) acidulated, in order to render it more grateful to their taste. The evangelist clearly refers to the practice, which was common in every part of Syria, of ploughing with the ass, when he calls him, wood-yior, a creature subject to the yoke. In rice-grounds, which require to be flooded, the ass was employed to prepare them for the seed, by treading them with his feet. It is to this method of preparing the ground, that Chardin supposes the prophet to allude when he says, "Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters, that send forth thither the feet of the ox and the ass." They shall be blessed under the future reign of the promised Messiah. In times anterior to his appearing, their country was to be made a desolation; briars and thorns were to encumber their fields; their sumptuous dwellings were to be cast down; their cities and strongholds levelled with the dust. But when Messiah commences his reign times of unequalled prosperity shall begin their carecr. The goodness of Jehovah shall descend in fertilizing showers, to irrigate their fields, and to swell the streams which the skill and industry of the husbandman conducts among his plantations, or with which he covers his rice-grounds. Secure from the ruinous incursions of aliens, and in the sure hope of an abundant harvest, he shall scatter his rice on the face of the superincumbent water, and tread it into the miry soil with "the feet of the ox and the ass." Prosperous and happy himself, he will consider it his duty, and feel it his delight, "to do good and to communicate,"—to succour the widow and the fatherless, to open his doors to the stranger, to diffuse around him the light of truth, and to swell, by the diligent and prudent use of all the means that Providence has brought within his reach, the sum of human enjoyment.—PAXTON.

Ver. 20. Ye shall have a song, as in the night when a holy solemnity is kept; and gladness of heart, as when one goeth with a pipe to come into the mountain of the Lord, to the mighty One of Israel.

Music is considered far more enchanting at night than at any other period; "it gives cheerfulness to darkness, and pleasure to the heart." Their favourite proverb is, "the day song is like the flower of the gourd," i. e. devoid of smell. Nothing is more common than for adults to sing themselves to sleep: thus, as they recline, they beat a tabret and chant the praises of their gods, till through heaviness they can scarcely articulate a word. At other times the mother or wife gently taps the instrument, and in soft tones lulls the individual to repose. In the night, should they not be able to sleep, they have again recourse to the same charm, and not until they shall have fairly gone off in fresh slumbers, will their companions have any rest. Hence, in passing through a village or town at midnight, may be heard people at their nightly song, to grace the festive scene, to beguile away their time, to charm their fears, or to procure refreshing sleep. The Jews then were to be delivered from the proud Assyrian's yoke, and again to have their pleasant song in the night.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Ver. 2. And a man shall be as a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest; as rivers of water in a dry place; as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.

"Ah! that benevolent man, he has long been my shelter from the wind; he is a river to the dry country."—ROBERTS.

Well does the traveller remember a day in the wilds of Africa, where the country was chiefly covered with burning sand; when scorched with the powerful rays of an almost vertical sun, the thermometer in the shade standing at 100°. He remembers long looking hither and thither for something that would afford protection from the almost insupportable heat, and where the least motion of air felt like flame coming against the face. At length he espied a huge loose rock leaning against the front of a small cliff which faced the sun. At once he fled for refuge underneath its inviting shade. The coolness emitted from this rocky canopy he found exquisitely exhilarating. The wild beasts of the desert were all fled to their dens, and the feathered songsters were all roosting among the thickest foliage they could find of the evergreen-trees. The whole creation around seemed to groan, as if their vigour had been entirely exhausted. A small river was provisionally at hand, to the side of which, after a while, he ventured, and sipped a little of its cooling water, which tasted better than the best burgundy, or the finest old hock, in the world. During all this enjoyment, the above apropos text was the interesting subject of the traveller's meditation; though the allusion, as a figure, must fall infinitely short of that which is meant to be prefigured by it.—CAMPELL.

The shadow of a great projecting rock is the most refreshing that is possible in a hot country, not only as most perfectly excluding the rays of the sun, but also having in itself a natural coolness, which it reflects and communicates to every thing about it.—LOWTH.

Ver. 13. Upon the land of my people shall come up thorns and briers, yea, upon all the houses of joy in the joyous city: 14. Because the palaces shall be forsaken; and the multitude of the city shall be left; the forts and towers shall be for dens for ever, a joy of wild asses, a pasture of flocks.

See on Job 39. 5.

Ver. 20. Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters, that send forth thither the feet of the ox and the ass.

See on ch. 30. 21.

The various kinds of grain, which they commonly sow in the Holy Land, are frequently mentioned in the sacred volume; and the correctness of the statement is attested by modern historians. Oats are not cultivated near Aleppo; but Dr. Russel observed some fields of them about Antioch, and on the seacoast. The horses are fed universally with barley; but lucern is also cultivated for their use, in the spring. The earliest wheat is sown about the middle of October; other grain, among which are barley, rye, and Indian millet, continue to be sown till the end of January; and barley, even so late as the end of February. The Persian harrow consists of a large rake, which is fastened to a pole, and drawn by oxen. In Hindostan, it is like an ordinary rake with three or four teeth, and is drawn by two oxen. Similar to this was probably the Syrian harrow. But in Palestine, the harrow is seldom used, the grain being covered by re-passing the plough along the edge of the furrow; and in places where the soil is sandy, they first sow, and then plough the seed into the ground. It appears, from the prophecies of Isaiah, that besides the more valuable kinds of grain, several aromatic seeds were sown; as the sesamum, coriander, and cummin. These the Orientals sprinkled upon their bread, to give it a more agreeable flavour. Rice is trodden into the ground by the feet of oxen; a practice seemingly alluded to by the prophet, in these words: "Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters, that send forth thither the feet of the ox and the ass." This, according to Chardin, answers exactly the manner of planting rice: for they sow it upon the waters; and before sowing, while the earth is covered with water, they cause the ground to be trodden by oxen, horses, and asses, to prepare it for receiving the seed. As they sow the rice on the water, so they transplant in the water; for the roots of this plant must be kept continually moist, to bring the rice to maturity.

Two bushels and a half of wheat or barley are sufficient to sow as much ground as a pair of beeves will plough in one day; which is, a little more or less, equal to one of our acres. Dr. Shaw could never learn that Barbary afforded yearly more than one crop; one bushel yielding ordinarily from eight to twelve, though some districts may perhaps afford a much greater increase, for it is common to see one grain produce ten or fifteen stalks. Even some grains of the Murwany wheat, which he brought with him to Oxford, and sown in the physic garden, threw out each of them fifty. But Muzeratty, one of the kaleefas, or viceroys of the province of Tlemsan, brought once with him to Algiers, a root that yielded fourscore, telling Dr. Shaw and his party, that in consequence of a dispute concerning the respective fruitfulness of Egypt and Barbary, the Emir Hadge, or prince of the western pilgrims, sent once to the bashaw of Cairo, one that yielded sixscore. Pliny mentions some that bore three or four hundred. It likewise happens, that one of these stalks will sometimes bear two ears, while each of these ears will as often shoot out into a number of lesser ones, affording by that means a most plentiful increase. And may not these large prolific ears, when seven are said to come up upon one stalk, explain what is mentioned of the seven fruitful years in Egypt, that the earth brought them forth by handfuls?—PAXTON.

The emigrants that went from England some years ago to the colony of the Cape of Good Hope, were chiefly located in a district called Albany, on the confines of Caffra-ria. Many of them were ruined by not literally attending to the contents of this text. They were not sufficiently aware of the indispensable necessity of water, or at least moisture under ground, to render fields at all productive in a hot and dry climate. They ploughed land, and dug a deep ditch round each field, as they were accustomed to do in England; with the mould dug from it they formed a mud wall, which made all look very pretty and farmer-like. Dutch boors from a distance came to see what they were about. They told them their fields were too far from the river; that unless they could lead water upon them, they must not expect to have any harvest. Looking at the neat ditch that surrounded the field, they inquired what this was for? For defence, was the reply. "Yes," said the boors, "it will defend your field from receiving any moisture from the surrounding ground;" and, shaking their heads, said "That is a bad defence." From the high ideas they had of their own superior knowledge of agriculture, they only smiled at the remarks made by the African farmers. The rainy season came, when the grain sprang up, and made rapid progress while that season lasted; but lo the sun returned from its northern circuit, dispelled the clouds, and darted forth its unimpeded fiery rays, which soon caused the surface of the ground to become as hard as a brick, consequently the grain withered and died, and cleanness of teeth, for want of bread, was in all their hamlets that season! But had there been plenty of water to lead over their fields, the crops would probably have been most abundant. The expression, "sending forth the feet of the ox and the ass," seems to refer to the practice said still to prevail in the East, where these animals are employed to tread the thin mud when saturated with water, to fit it for receiving the seed. Should there be a river there, a fountain here, and a pool elsewhere, it is far wiser to have the fields near, than at a distance from any of these. Sometimes God gives peculiarly happy spiritual seasons to countries, or districts in countries, causing the river of life abundantly to flow, and streams from it extensively to spread its influence; then the wise husbandman will hasten to scatter his seed, in cities, towns, villages, hamlets, and among individual families, in expectation of a rich harvest, from the well watering of the garden of plants.—CAMPELLE.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Ver. 11. Ye shall conceive chaff; ye shall bring forth stubble: your breath as fire shall devour you.

When married females quarrel, they often say, "Yes, thy womb shall give children, but they shall all be as chaff." "Yes, barren one, you may have a child, but it will be blind and dumb." "True, true, you will bring forth a pambu-rette," i. e. a generation of serpents.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 21. But there the glorious LORD will be unto us a place of broad rivers and streams; wherein shall go no galley with oars, neither shall gallant ship pass thereby.

In such a highly cultivated country as England, and where great drought is almost unknown, we have not an opportunity to observe the fertilizing influence of a broad river; but in South Africa, where almost no human means are employed for improving the land, the benign influence of rivers is most evident. The Great, or Orange River, is a remarkable instance of this. I travelled on its banks, at one time, for five or six weeks; when, for several hundred miles, I found both sides of it delightfully covered with trees of various kinds, all in health and vigour, and abundance of the richest verdure; but all the country beyond the reach of its influence was complete desert. Every thing appeared struggling for mere existence; so that we might be said to have had the wilderness on one side, and a kind of paradise on the other.—CAMPELLE.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Ver. 7. And the unicorns shall come down with them, and the bullocks with the bulls; and their land shall be soaked with blood, and their dust made fat with fatness.

See on Ps. 22. 12, 15.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Ver. 6. Then shall the lame man leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb shall sing: for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert.

See on Ps. 18. 33.

Lameness and dumbness are the uniform effects of long walking in a desert; the sand and gravel produce the former, fatigue the latter. In such cases some of us have walked hours together without uttering a sentence; and all walked as if crippled, from the sand and gravel getting into the shoes; but the sight of water, especially if unexpected, unloosed every tongue, and gave agility to every limb; men, oxen, goats, sheep, and dogs, ran with speed and expressions of joy to the refreshing element.—CAMBELL.

Ver. 7. And the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water: in the habitation of dragons, where each lay, shall be grass, with reeds and rushes.

Instead of the parched ground, Bp. Lowth translates it, the glowing sand shall become a pool, and says in a note, that the word is Arabic as well as Hebrew, expressing in both languages the same thing, the glowing sandy plain, which in the hot countries at a distance has the appearance of water. It occurs in the Koran, (cap. xxiv.) "But as to the unbelievers, their works are like a vapour in a plain which the thirsty traveller thinketh to be water, until, when he cometh thereto, he findeth it to be nothing." Mr. Sale's note on this place is, the Arabic word scrab, signifies that false appearance, which in the eastern countries is often seen in sandy plains about noon, resembling a large lake of water in motion, and is occasioned by the reverberation of the sunbeams. It sometimes tempts thirsty travellers out of their way, but deceives them when they come near, either going forward, (for it always appears at the same distance,) or quite vanishes.—BURDEA.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Ver. 24. By thy servants hast thou reproached the LORD, and hast said, By the multitude of my chariots am I come up to the height of the mountains, to the sides of Lebanon; and I will cut down the tall cedars thereof, and the choice fir-trees thereof: and I will enter into the height of his border, and the forest of his Carmel.

At six o'clock we again set forward, and passing near the church, the priest, a venerable old man, with a flowing beard, was standing on the threshold, and courteously saluted us. Our road, somewhat better than yesterday, continued gradually to rise, and we were now fairly within that long elevated chain which has borne, from the earliest ages, the name of Lebanon. We had felt a great anxiety to see the celebrated cedars, which are supposed to be the remains of the ancient forests that once entirely clothed these heights. Hitherto we had been allured forward by our guides, with the promise of soon reaching them, but we now discovered that we had been purposely deceived, and ought to have taken another road, in which case the village of Eden, in their immediate vicinity, would have afforded us a more commodious halting-place. After leaving Balbec, and approaching Lebanon, lowering walnut-trees, either singly or in groups, and a rich carpet of verdure, the offspring of numerous streams, give to this charming district the air of an English park, majestically bounded with snow-tipped mountains. At Deir el Akmaer the ascent begins—windy among dwarf oaks, hawthorns, and a great variety of shrubs and flowers. After some hours of laborious toil, a loaded horse slipped near the edge of a precipice, and must inevitably have perished, if a servant, with great presence of mind, had not cut the girths, and saved the animal, at the expense of most of the stores, and the whole of the crockery. Vain were the lamentations over fragments of plates and glasses, broken bottles, and spilt brandy and wine, in an impoverished country, where nothing that contributes to comfort can be replaced. Seven hours were spent in attaining the summit of the mountain after leaving the village. The view on both sides was splendid.—A deep bed of snow had now to be crossed, and the horses sunk or slipped at every moment. To ride was impracticable, and to walk dangerous, for the melting snow penetrated our boots, and our feet were nearly frozen. An hour and a half brought us to the cedars. Seven of the most ancient still remain. They are considered to be coeval with Solomon, and therefore held sacred. Rude altars have been erected near them, and an annual Christian festival is held, when worship is performed beneath their venerable branches. Other cedars, varying in age and size, form around them a protecting grove. We reckoned every tree with scrupulous care. Many, indeed, have sprung up from ancient roots, but enumerating all that present independent trunks, including the patriarchal trees, they amount to three hundred and forty-three. At a quarter of an hour from the cedars is the village of Beesharry, a lovely, romantic spot, on the brink of a deep glen.—HOAG.

See on Ruth 2. 4.

Ver. 29. Because thy rage against me, and thy tumult, is come up into mine ears; therefore will I put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way by which thou camest.

It is usual in the East to fasten an iron ring in the nose of their camels and buffaloes, to which they tie a rope, by means of which they manage these beasts. God is here speaking of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, under the image of a furious refractory beast, and accordingly, in allusion to this circumstance, says, I will put my hook in thy nose.—BURDEA.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Ver. 12. Mine age is departed, and is removed from me as a shepherd's tent: I have cut off like a weaver my life: he will cut me off with pining sickness: from day even to night wilt thou make an end of me.

Hezekiah makes use of a simile, in that hymn of his which Isaiah has preserved, that appeared, many years ago, very perplexing to a gentleman of good sense and learning, who resided in one of the most noted towns of the kingdom for weaving. He could not conceive, why the cutting short the life of that prince, should be compared to a weaver's cutting off a piece from his loom when he had finished it, and he and everybody that saw it in that state expected it as a thing of course. He consulted those that were acquainted with the manufactory, but could gain no satisfaction. Perhaps it may appear more easy to the mind, if the simile is understood to refer to the weaving of a carpet, filled with flowers and other ingenious devices: just as a weaver, after having wrought many decorations into a piece of carpeting, suddenly cuts it off, while the figures were rising into view as fresh and as beautiful as ever, and the spectator is expecting the weaver would proceed in his work; so, after a variety of pleasing and amusing transactions in the course of my life, suddenly and unexpectedly it seemed to me that it was come to its period, and was just going to be cut off. Unexpectedness must certainly be intended here.—HARMER.

The shepherds of the East are often obliged to remove their flocks to distant places to find pasturage; hence their habitations are exceedingly light, in order to be the more easily removed. The "lodge in a garden of cucumbers," and the frail resting-place of the shepherd, greatly resemble each other.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 14. Like a crane or a swallow, so did I chatter: I did mourn as a dove: mine eyes fail with looking upward: O LORD, I am oppressed; undertake for me.

No bird is more noisy than the crane; and none utters a harsher note. The prophet, however, applies the verb (שָׁפְטָה tsaphsaph, which signifies to chatter, to the loud and screaming cry of this bird; for which Mr. Harmer professes himself unable to account. "The word tsaphsaph," says he, "translated chatter, appears to signify the low, melancholy, interrupted voice of the complaining sick, rather than a chattering noise, if we consult the other places in which it is used: as for the chattering of the crane, it seems quite inexplicable." But the difficulty had not, perhaps, appeared so great, if this respectable writer had observed that the connective vau is wanting in the original text, which may be thus considered: "As a crane, a swallow, so did I chatter." The two nouns are not, therefore, necessarily connected with the verb tsaphsaph, but admit the insertion of another verb suitable to the nature of the first nominative. The ellipsis may be supplied in this manner: "As a crane, so did I scream, as a swallow, so did I chatter." Such a supplement is not, in this instance, forced and unnatural; for it is evidently the design of Hezekiah to say, that he expressed his grief after the manner of these two birds, and therefore suitably to each; and he uses the verb tsaphsaph, which properly corresponds only with the last noun, to indicate this design, leaving the reader to supply the verb which corresponds with the other. It is also perfectly agreeable to the manners of the East, where sorrow is expressed sometimes in a low interrupted voice, and anon in loud continued exclamations. The afflicted monarch, therefore, expressed his extreme grief after the manner of the Orientals, in loud screams like the crane, or in low interrupted murmurings like the swallow. According to some writers, the verb under consideration signifies the note of any bird, and by consequence may with equal propriety be employed to denote the loud scream of the crane, or the melancholy twitter of the swallow; if this be so, the difficulty admits of an easy solution.—PAXTON.

Ver. 17. Behold, for peace I had great bitterness: but thou hast in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption: for thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back.

Jeroboam preferred "molten images" to the true God, and therefore the Lord said unto him by Ahijah, thou "hast cast me behind thy back." The Levites said of the children of Israel, they "rebelled against thee, and cast thy law behind their backs." The Lord said of the wicked cities of Samaria and Jerusalem, "Thou hast forgotten me, and cast me behind thy back." This metaphor, to cast behind the back, is in common use, and has sometimes a very offensive signification. The expression is used to denote the most complete and contemptuous rejection of a person or thing. "The king has cast his minister behind his back," i. e. fully removed him, treated him with sovereign contempt. "Alas! alas! he has thrown my petition behind his back; all my efforts are defeated." "Yes, man, I have forgiven you; all your crimes are behind my back; but take care not to offend me again."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XL.

Ver. 3. The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the LORD, make straight in the desert a highway for our God. 4. Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low: and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain.

When a great prince in the East sets out on a journey, it is usual to send a party of men before him, to clear the way. The state of those countries in every age, where roads are almost unknown, and from the want of cultivation in many parts overgrown with brambles, and other thorny plants, which renders travelling, especially with a large retinue, very incommodious, requires this precaution. The emperor of Hindostan, in his progress through his dominions, as described in the narrative of Sir Thomas Roe's embassy to the court of Delhi, was preceded by a very great company, sent before him to cut up the trees and bushes, to level and smooth the road, and prepare their place of encampment. Balin, who swayed the imperial sceptre of India, had five hundred chosen men, in rich livery, with their drawn sabres, who ran before him, proclaiming his approach, and clearing the way. Nor was this honour reserved exclusively for the reigning emperor; it was often shown to persons of royal birth. When an Indian princess made a visit to her father, the roads were directed to be repaired, and made clear for her journey; fruit-trees were planted, water-vessels placed in the road-side, and great illuminations prepared for the occasion. Mr. Bruce gives nearly the same account of a journey, which the king of Abyssinia made through a part of his dominions. The chief magistrate of every district through which he had to pass, was, by his office, obliged to have the roads cleared, levelled, and smoothed; and he mentions, that a magistrate of one of the districts having failed in this part of his duty, was, together with his son, immediately put to death on the spot, where a thorn happened to catch the garment, and interrupt for a moment the progress of his majesty. This custom is easily recognised in that beautiful prediction: "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God. Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be brought low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain; and the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." We shall be able, perhaps, to form a more clear and precise idea, from the account which Diodorus gives of the marches of Semiramis, the celebrated queen of Babylon, into Media and Persia. In her march to Ecbatane, says the historian, she came to the Zarcean mountain, which extending many furlongs, and being full of craggy precipices and deep hollows, could not be passed without taking a great compass. Being therefore desirous of leaving an everlasting memorial of herself, as well as of shortening the way, she ordered the precipices to be digged down, and the hollows to be filled up; and at a great expense she made a shorter and more expeditious road; which to this day is called from her, the road of Semiramis. Afterward she went into Persia, and all the other countries of Asia subjected to her dominion; and wherever she went, she ordered the mountains and the precipices to be levelled, raised canseys in the plain country, and at a great expense made the ways passable. Whatever may be in this story, the following statement is entitled to the fullest credit: "All eastern potentates have their precursors and a number of pioneers to clear the road, by removing obstacles, and filling up the ravines, and the hollow ways in their routs. In the days of Mogul splendour, the emperor caused the hills and mountains to be levelled, and the valleys to be filled up for his convenience. This beautifully illustrates the figurative language in the approach of the Prince of Peace, when every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low, and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain."—PAXTON.

Ver. 11. He shall feed his flock like a shepherd: he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young.

See on Ezek. 25. 5.

One of the great delights in travelling through a pastoral country, is to see and feel the force of the beautiful imagery in the scriptures, borrowed from pastoral life. All day long the shepherd attends his flock, leading them into "green pastures" near fountains of water, and chooses a convenient place for them to "rest at noon." At night he drives them near his tent, and if there is danger, encloses them in the fold. They know his voice and follow him. When travelling, he tenderly watches over them, and carries such as are exhausted in his arms. Such a shepherd is the Lord Jesus Christ. See John x.—REV. R. ANDERSON'S TOUR THROUGH GREECE.

The shepherds of antiquity were "an abomination unto the Egyptians," and so they are among the Hindoos; and as the Egyptians would not eat with the Hebrews, so neither will the various castes of India eat with their shepherds. The pastoral office in the East is far more responsible than in England, and it is only by looking at it in its various relations and peculiarities, as it exists there, that we gain a correct view of many passages of scripture. Flocks at home are generally in fine fields, surrounded by hedges or fences; but there they are generally in the wilderness, and were it not for the shepherds, would go astray, and be exposed to the wild beasts. As the sons of Jacob had to go to a great distance to feed their flocks, so still they are often absent for one and two months together, in the place where there is plenty of pasturage. In their removals, it is an interesting sight to see the shepherds carrying the lambs in their bosoms, and also to witness how gently they "lead those that are with young." Another interesting fact is the relationship which exists betwixt the pastor and his flock; for being so much together, they acquire a friendly feeling: hence the sheep "know his voice, and a stranger will they not follow." Does he wish to remove to another place, he goes to such a distance as that they can hear his voice, and then he imitates the noise made by a sheep, and immediately they may be seen bounding along to the spot where he is. Thus "he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him, for they know his voice." But another way of leading a flock, especially where there are goats, is to take the branch of a tree, and keep showing it to them, which causes them to run along more cheerfully. He also calleth "his own sheep by name," and it is interesting to notice how appropriate the names are to the animals. Thus, should a sheep or a cow have a bad temper, (or any other failing,) it will be called the angry one, the malicious, or sulky, or wandering one; the killer of his young, the fiend; the mad one, the jumper, the limper, the dwarf, the barren, the fruitful, the short, the fat, the long, the tricky one. The cows also are named after some of their goddesses, particularly after the wives of Siva, Vishnoo, and Scandan; thus Lechymy, Parvati, and Valle, may be heard in every herd. To bulls are given the names of men and devils; as, Vyvren, Pulliar, Mathaa, &c. Before the sun shall have gained his meridian, the shepherds seek out a shady place, where they may make their flocks "o rest at noon." As the shepherd who mounted the throne of Israel carried his sling and his stone, so these generally have the same missiles by which they correct the wanderers, and keep off their foes: hence the dog is scarcely ever used in the tending or guiding of flocks. As was Jacob, so here the shepherds are often remunerated in kind, and therefore have not any other wages, (except now and then a little cloth or rice;) hence, often, a certain number of the rams are given as pay, and to this also the patriarch may allude: "The rams of thy flocks have I not eaten." In most of these particulars we see illustrations of Him who "is the Shepherd, the Stone of Israel," who laid prostrate the "roaring lion" of hell, and who keeps us in safety, so that the foe cannot pluck us out of his hand.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 12. Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance?

Here we have a vivid illustration of the dignified and gorgeous imagery of the East. "What man can take up the waters of the unknown dark ocean in his hands?" "Whose fingers are long enough to span the arch of heaven?" "Who can bring together all the dust of the earth in a measure?" "Who can weigh the hills and mountains in scales?" These figures largely show the insignificance of man.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 16. And Lebanon is not sufficient to burn, nor the beasts thereof sufficient for a burnt-offering.

The stupendous size, the extensive range, and great elevation of Libanus; its towering summits, capped with perpetual snow, or crowned with fragrant cedars; its olive plantations; its vineyards, producing the most delicious wines; its clear fountains and cold-flowing brooks; its fertile vales and odoriferous shrubberies,—combine to form in Scripture language, "the glory of Lebanon." But that glory, liable to change, has, by the unanimous consent of modern travellers, suffered a sensible decline. The extensive forests of cedar, which adorned and perfumed the summits and declivities of those mountains, have almost disappeared. Only a small number of these "trees of God, planted by his almighty hand," which, according to the usual import of the phrase, signally displayed the divine power, wisdom, and goodness, now remain. Their countless number in the days of Solomon, and their prodigious bulk, must be recollected, in order to feel the force of that sublime declaration of the prophet: "Lebanon is not sufficient to burn, nor the beasts thereof sufficient for a burnt-offering."—PAXTON.

Ver. 24. Yea, they shall not be planted: yea, they shall not be sown: yea, their stock shall not take root in the earth: and he shall also blow upon them, and they shall wither, and the whirlwind shall take them away as stubble.

Whirlwinds occasionally sweep along the country in an extremely frightful manner, carrying away in their vortex, sand, branches, and stubble, and raising them to an immense height in the air. Very striking is the allusion which the prophet makes to this phenomenon: "He shall also blow upon them, and they shall wither, and the whirlwind shall take them away as stubble." With equal force and beauty, the Psalmist refers to the rotatory action of the whirlwind, which frequently impels a bit of straw, over the waste, like a wheel set in rapid motion: "O my God, make them like a wheel, as the stubble before the wind." Sometimes it comes from no particular point, but moves about in every direction. Mr. Bruce, in his journey through the desert of Senaar, had the singular felicity to contemplate this wonderful phenomenon in all its terrific majesty, without injury, although with considerable danger and alarm. In that vast expanse of desert, from west and to northwest of him, he saw a number of prodigious pillars of sand at different distances, moving at times with great celerity, at others, stalking on with majestic slowness; at intervals he thought they were coming in a very few minutes to overwhelm him and his companions. Again they would retreat so as to be almost out of sight, their tops reaching to the very clouds. There the tops often separated from the bodies; and these, once disjoined, dispersed in the air, and appeared no more. Sometimes they were broken near the middle, as if struck with a large cannon-shot. About noon they began to advance with considerable swiftness upon them, the wind being very strong at north. Eleven of these awful visitors ranged alongside of them about the distance of three miles. The greatest diameter of the largest appeared to him, at that distance, as if it would measure ten feet. They retired from them with a wind at southeast, leaving an impression upon the mind of our intrepid traveller to which he could give no name, though he candidly admits that one ingredient in it was fear, with a considerable deal of wonder and astonishment. He declares it was in vain to think of flying; the swiftest horse, or fastest sailing ship, could be of no use to carry them out of this danger; and the full persuasion of this riveted him to the spot where he stood. Next day they were gratified with a similar display of moving pillars, in form and disposition like those already described, only they seemed to be more in number and less in size. They came several times in a direction close upon them; that is, according to Mr. Bruce's computation, within less than two miles. They became, immediately after sunrise, like a thick wood, and almost darkened the sun; his rays shining through them for near an hour, gave them an appearance of pillars of fire. At another time they were terrified by an army (as it seemed) of these sand pillars, whose march was constantly south; a number of which seemed once to be coming directly upon them; and though they were little nearer than two miles, a considerable quantity of sand fell around them. On the twenty-first of November, about eight in the morning, he had a view of the desert to the westward as before, and the sands had already begun to rise in immense twisted pillars, which darkened the heavens, and moved over the desert with more magnificence than ever. The sun shining through the pillars, which were thicker, and contained more sand apparently than any of the preceding days, seemed to give those nearest them an appearance as if spotted with stars of gold. A little before twelve, the wind at north ceased, and a considerable quantity of fine sand rained upon them for an hour afterward. To this species of rain, Moses was no stranger; he had seen it, and felt its effects in the sandy deserts of Arabia, and he places it among the curses that were, in future ages, to punish the rebellion of his people; "The Lord shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust: from heaven shall it come down upon thee, until thou be destroyed."—PAXTON.

CHAPTER XLI.

Ver. 15. Behold, I will make thee a new sharp thrashing instrument having teeth: thou shalt thrash the mountains, and beat them small, and shalt make the hills as chaff.

The manner of thrashing corn in the East differs essentially from the method practised in western countries. It has been fully described by travellers, from whose writings such extracts are here made, and connected together, as will convey a tolerable idea of this subject. In Isaiah xxviii. 27, 28, four methods of thrashing are mentioned, as effected by different instruments: the flail, the drag, the wain, and the treading of the cattle. The staff, or flail, was used for the inferiora semina, says Hieron, the grain that was too tender to be treated in the other methods. The drag consisted of a sort of frame of strong planks, made rough at the bottom with hard stones or iron; it was drawn by horses or oxen over the corn-sheaves spread on the floor, the driver sitting upon it. The wain was much like the former, but had wheels with iron teeth, or edges like a saw. The axle was armed with iron teeth, or serrated wheels throughout: it moves upon three rollers, armed with iron teeth or wheels, to cut the straw. In Syria they make use of the drag, constructed in the very same manner as above described. This not only forced out the grain, but cut the straw in pieces for fodder for the cattle, for in the eastern countries they have no hay. The last method is well known from the law of Moses, which forbids the ox to be muzzled when he treadeth out the corn. Deut. xxv. 4. (Lowth.) "In thrashing their corn, the Arabians lay the sheaves down in a certain order, and then lead over them two oxen, dragging a large stone. This mode of separating the ears from the straw is not unlike that of Egypt." (Niebuhr.) "They use oxen, as the ancients did, to beat out their corn, by trampling upon the sheaves, and dragging after them a clumsy machine. This machine is not, as in Arabia, a stone cylinder, nor a plank with sharp stones, as in Syria, but a sort of sledge, consisting of three rollers, fitted with iron, which turn upon axles. A farmer chooses out a level spot in his fields, and has his corn carried thither in sheaves, upon asses or dromedaries. Two oxen are then yoke<sup>d</sup> in a sledge, a driver gets upon it, and drives them backwards and forwards (rather in a circle) upon the sheaves, and fresh oxen succeed in the yoke from time to time. By this operation the chaff is very much cut down; the whole is then warrowed, and the pure grain thus separated. This mode of thrashing out the corn is tedious and inconvenient: it destroys the chaff, and injures the quality of the grain." (Ibid.) In another place, Niebuhr tells us that "two parcels or layers of corn are thrashed out in a day; and they move each of them as many as eight times with a wooden fork of five prongs, which they call med-dre. Afterward they throw the straw into the middle of the ring, where it forms a heap, which grows bigger and bigger; when the first layer is thrashed, they replace the straw in the ring, and thrash it as before. Thus the straw becomes every time smaller, till at last it resembles chopped straw. After this, with the fork just described, they cast the whole some yards from thence, and against the wind, which drives back the straw, the corn and the ears not thrashed out fall apart from it, and make another heap. A man collects the clods of dirt, and other impurities, to which any corn adheres, and throws them into a sieve. They afterward place in a ring the heaps, in which a good many entire ears are still found, and drive over them for four or five hours together a dozen couple of oxen, joined two and two, till by absolute trampling they have separated the grains, which they throw into the air with a shovel to cleanse them."

"The Moors and Arabs continue to tread out their corn after the primitive custom of the East. Instead of beaves, they frequently make use of mules and horses, by tying in the like manner by the neck three or four of them together, and whipping them afterward round about the neadders, (as they call the thrashing floors, the Lybica area of Horace,) where the sheaves lie open and expanded in the same manner as they are placed and prepared with us for thrashing. This, indeed, is a much quicker way than ours, but less cleanly; for, as it is performed in the open air, (Hos. xiii. 3.) upon any round level plat of ground, daubed over with cow's dung, to prevent as much as possible the earth, sand, or gravel, from rising, a great quantity of them all, notwithstanding this precaution, must unavoidably be taken up with the grain; at the same time the straw, which is their only fodder, is hereby shattered to pieces, a circumstance very pertinently alluded to 2 Kings xiii. 7, where the king of Syria is said to have made the Israelites like dust by thrashing." (Shaw.)—BURNES.

Ver. 18. I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys; I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water.

A most important pastoral duty in the eastern regions, is to provide water for the flock. The living fountain and the flowing stream, generally furnish a sure and abundant supply; but these are seldom to be found in the burning desert, where the oriental shepherd is often compelled to feed his cattle. In such circumstances, happy is he who finds a pool where his flocks may quench their thirst. Often, as he pursues his journey, a broad expanse of water, clear as crystal, seems to open to his view; and faint and weary under the fierce sunbeam, he gazes on the unexpected relief with ineffable delight, and fondly anticipates a speedy termination to his present distress. He sees the foremost camels enter the lake, and the water dashed about by their feet. He quickens his pace, and hastens to the spot; but to his utter disappointment the vision disappears, and nothing remains but the dry and thirsty wilderness. To such deceitful appearances, the prophet opposes, with admirable effect, the real pool, the overflowing fountain, and the running stream; the appropriate symbols of those substantial blessings of grace and mercy, that were laid up in store for the church of Christ in the last days: "And the parched ground (or the scorching heat) shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water." "I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys; I will make the wilderness a pool of water."—PAXTON.

Ver. 19. I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah-tree, and the myrtle, and the oil-tree; I will set in the desert the fir-tree, and the pine, and the box-tree together.

See on Ex. 25. 10.

CHAPTER XLII.

Ver. 2. He shall not cry, nor lift up, nor cause his voice to be heard in the street.

When two or more people go along the streets, they speak in such a loud voice, that all who pass may hear. Has a person gained or lost a cause in a court of justice, he vociferates his story again and again to his companions, as he goes along the road. This practice may have arisen from the custom of the superior walking the first, which makes it necessary for him to speak in a loud voice, that those who are in the rear may hear his observations. Men of a boisterous temper, who wish to raise a clamour, or those who are leaders in any exploit, always bawl aloud when they talk to their companions, as they go along the road.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 11. Let the wilderness and the cities thereof lift up their voice, the villages that Kedar doth inhabit: let the inhabitants of the rock sing, let them shout from the top of the mountains.

“By desert, or wilderness, the reader is not always to understand a country altogether barren and unfruitful, but such only as is rarely or never sown or cultivated; which, though it yields no crops of corn or fruit, yet affords herbage, more or less, for the grazing of cattle, with fountains or rills of water, though more sparingly interspersed than in other places.” (Shaw.) Agreeable to this account, we find that Nabul, who was possessed of three thousand sheep, and a thousand goats, dwelt in the wilderness, 1 Sam. xxv. 2. This it would have been impossible for him to have done, had there not been sufficient pasturage for his flocks and herds.—BURDER.

Not satisfied with cultivating the rich plains and fertile valleys of his native land, the Jewish farmer reduced, the barren rocks and rugged mountains under his domain, and compelled them to minister to his necessities. For this purpose he covered them with earth; or, where this was impracticable, he constructed walls of loose stones, in parallel rows along their sides, to support the mould, and prevent it from being washed down by the rains. On these circular plots of excellent soil, which gradually rose one above another, from the base to the very summits of the mountains, he raised abundant crops of corn and other esculent vegetables; or, where the declivity was too rocky, he planted the vine and the olive, which delight in such situations, and which rewarded his toil with the most picturesque scenery, and the richest products. Thus, the places where only the wild goat wandered and the eagle screamed, which appeared to be doomed to perpetual nakedness and sterility, were converted by the bold and persevering industry of the Syrian husbandman into corn-fields and gardens, vineyards and olive plantations, the manifest traces of which, in all the mountains of Palestine, remain to this day. The inhabitants of that “good land,” literally sang from the top of the rock when it flowed with the blood of the grape, and poured them out “rivers of oil.”—PAXTON.

Ver. 14. I have long time holden my peace; I have been still, and refrained myself: now will I cry like a travelling woman; I will destroy and devour at once.

The words devour, swallow, or sup, as used by Isaiah, and Habakkuk, evidently allude to the same thing. Jehovah had refrained himself, but now he was about to come forth and utterly destroy his enemies. When a king wishes to convey an idea that he will completely destroy his foes, he says, I will MULLUNGA-YAIN, i. e., “swallow them up.” Habakkuk says of the Chaldeans, “Their faces shall sup up, as the East wind.” Of a man who has a savage face, it is said, “He has a MULLUNGERA-MUGGAN, a devouring face.” “Look at that fellow’s face, you may see he could swallow you.” But the Chaldeans are compared to the destructive EAST wind; and it is a fact, that the same wind is spoken of in similar terms in all parts of the East. Its name is ALLIKKERA-KATTU, i. e., the destroying wind, and so sure as it shall blow for any length of time, will vegetation be destroyed. How this is produced is, perhaps, among the inexplicable mysteries of nature. Its destructive qualities on vegetable nature in England are well known, and yet it would appear that not one time in a thousand can it blow in an uninterrupted current from the distant East, because there are always, so far as I have been able to observe, counter currents. Another fact is, that, however far east you may travel, it is still the same wind which brings destruction. The allusion, therefore, in Genesis, (and other places,) is illustrated by the continued malignity of that wind.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 19. Who is blind, but my servant; or deaf, as my messenger that I sent? who is blind as he that is perfect, and blind as the Lord’s servant?

I think we are to understand this as alluding to the AGENT employed by the Lord, i. e., he was so absorbed with his message as to be blind and deaf to all other attractions. When the Yogee affects to deliver a message from the gods, or when he speaks of futurity, he is as one who is blind and deaf; and so insensible he to external things, that whatever sights may pass before his vision, and whatever sounds may fall upon his ear, he appears to be altogether insensible to their power. The people say he is so full of the deity as to be unconscious of passing scenes.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Ver. 19. Behold, I will do a new thing: now it shall spring forth; shall ye not know it? I will even make a way in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert.

From Lattakoo to Kurree-chans, which is about three hundred miles, might, when I travelled it, be justly called a wilderness, for there was not a single mile of any visible path or road. The ruts made by the wheels of my wagons on going up the country, were so visible, that on returning I was delighted to find natives travelling with loaded oxen along those ruts; and as other natives would probably do the same, it would soon become a beaten visible highway, which most likely was the manner of the formation of all original roads.

A visible road in a wilderness saves much trouble and anxiety to travellers, even when they have travelled over the same ground before. In general they must be guided by landmarks such as hill, clumps of trees, fords, &c.; but in plains or across forests, where no hills can be seen, they must often be puzzled what course to follow. But where there is a visible path, however bad, travellers are relieved from all this trouble, anxiety, and uncertainty, as if they constantly heard a voice behind them saying, “This is the way, walk ye in it.”

In a heathen land the inhabitants are ignorant of the way to true happiness either here or hereafter; but when gospel light enters, publishing what the Son of God has done and suffered for sinners, then a highway may be said to be in that land, which, by the blessing of God, will greatly increase the comfort of the population.—CAMPBELL.

Ver. 21. Thou hast brought me no sweet cane with money, neither hast thou filled me with the fat of thy sacrifices; but thou hast made me to serve with thy sins, thou hast wearied me with thine iniquities.

See on Jer. 6, 20.

Dr. Boothroyd has “sweet reed.” Tamal, “sweet bark!” This probably means cinnamon, as we know that “sweet bark” was used by Moses in the service of the sanctuary; and it is in connexion with the sacrifices of the Most High that it is here mentioned by the prophet.—ROBERTS.

On approaching and entering first the city of Mashow, and afterward that of Kurree-chans, the two highest up towns which I visited in Africa, various of the inhabitants who, like all the rest of their countrymen, had never seen wagons or white men before, were charmed with the sight, and, as a proof of it, they presented me with pieces of sugar, or sweet cane, about a foot in length, and in such numbers, that the bottom of that part of the wagon where I sat was covered with sweet cane. It was an act of kindness. This occurrence explained to me this passage in Isaiah, where God is evidently charging his ancient people with want of affection, or unkindness; which expression they would understand, having probably the same custom which I found in Africa, which the Hebrews may have learned while they resided in Africa, viz., in Egypt.—CAMPBELL.

CHAPTER XLIV.

Ver. 3. For I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground; I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring.

This probably alludes to the way in which people bathe. They do not in general, as in England, plunge into a stream or river, but go near a well or tank; and then, with a little vessel, pour water on their heads and bodies.

See the man who is weary, he calls for his neighbour, or servant, or wife, to accompany him to the well; he then takes off his clothes, (except a small strip round his loins,) sits on his hams, and the individual who assists begins to "POUR WATER" upon him, till he be refreshed, and exclaims, POTHAM, l. c. sufficient. In this way his body is invigorated, his thirst quenched, and he is made ready for his food.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 4. And they shall spring up as among the grass, as willows by the water-courses.

In many parts of South Africa, no trees are to be found but near rivers. The trees are of various kinds; the most plentiful was the lovely mimosa; but willows, when there were any, always stood in front of the others, on the very margin of the water, which was truly a river of life to them. Like those in Isaiah's days, they required much water—could not prosper without it, therefore near it they were alone found;—a loud call, by a silent example, to Christians to live near the throne of grace, word of grace, and ordinances of grace, if they wish to grow in wisdom, knowledge, faith, and holiness.—CAMPBELL.

Ver. 5. One shall say, I am the LORD'S; and another shall call himself by the name of Jacob; and another shall subscribe with his hand unto the LORD, and surname himself by the name of Israel.

This is an allusion to the marks which were made by punctures, rendered indelible by fire or by staining, upon the hand, or some other part of the body, signifying the state or character of the person, and to whom he belonged. The slave was marked with the name of his master; the soldier of his commander; the idolater with the name or ensign of his god; and the Christians seem to have imitated this practice by what Procopius says upon this place of Isaiah. "Many marked their wrists or their arms with the sign of the cross, or with the name of Christ." (Louth.) To this explanation I shall subjoin the following extract from Dr. Doddridge's Sermons to Young People, p. 79, both as it corroborates and still further elucidates this transaction. "Some very celebrated translators and critics understand the words which we render, subscribe with his hand unto the Lord, in a sense a little different from that which our English version has given them. They would rather render them, another shall write upon his hand, I am the Lord's; and they suppose it refers to a custom which formerly prevailed in the East, of stamping the name of the general on the soldier, or that of the master on the slave. As this name was sometimes borne on the forehead, so at other times on the hand; and it is certain that several scriptures, which may easily be recollected, are to be explained as alluding to this: Rev. iii. 12. vii. 2, 3. xiii. 16, 17. Now from hence it seems to have grown into a custom among some idolatrous nations, when solemnly devoting themselves to the service of any deity, to be initiated into it by receiving some marks in their flesh, which might never wear out. This interpretation the original will certainly bear; and it here makes a very strong and beautiful sense, since every true Christian has a sacred and indelible character upon him, which shall never be erased. But if we retain our own version it will come to nearly the same, and evidently refers to a practice which was sometimes used among the Jews. (Nehem. ix. 34. x. 29.) and which is indeed exceedingly natural, of obliging themselves to the service of God, by setting their hands to some written articles, emphatically expressing such a resolution."—BURNER.

Ver. 18. They have not known nor understood: for he hath shut their eyes, that they cannot see: and their hearts, that they cannot understand.

The Orientals, in some cases, deprive the criminal of the light of day, by sealing up his eyes. A son of the great Mogul was actually suffering this punishment when Sir Thomas Roe visited the court of Delhi. The hapless youth was cast into prison, and deprived of the light by some adhesive plaster put upon his eyes, for the space of three years; after which the seal was taken away, that he might with freedom enjoy the light; but he was still detained in prison. Other princes have been treated in a different manner, to prevent them from conspiring against the reigning monarch, or meddling with affairs of state: they have been compelled to swallow opium, and other stupefying drugs, to weaken or benumb their faculties, and render them unfit for business. Influenced by such absurd and cruel policy, Shah Abbas, the celebrated Persian monarch, who died in 1629, ordered a certain quantity of opium to be given every day to his grandson, who was to be his successor, to stupefy him, and prevent him from disturbing his government. Such are probably the circumstances alluded to by the prophet: "They have not known, nor understood; for he hath shut their eyes that they cannot see; and their hearts that they cannot understand." The verb ( $\pi\epsilon\lambda$ ) talh, rendered in our version, to shut, signifies to overlay, to cover over the surface; thus the king of Israel prepared three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand talents of refined silver ( $\pi\epsilon\lambda$ ) to overlay the walls of the temple. But it generally signifies to overspread, or daub over, as with mortar or plaster, of which Parkhurst quotes a number of examples; a sense which entirely corresponds with the manner in which the eyes of a criminal are sealed up in some parts of the East. The practice of sealing up the eyes, and stupefying a criminal with drugs, seems to have been contemplated by the same prophet in another passage of his book: "Make the heart of this people fat, and make their cars heavy, and shut their eyes, lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert and be healed."—PAXTON.

Ver. 20. He feedeth on ashes: a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lip in my right hand?

"That wicked fellow has now to eat dust or ashes." "Begone, wretch! for soon wilt thou have to feed on ashes." The man who is accused of a great crime, takes dust, or ashes, in his mouth, and thus swears that he is innocent. The idea seems to be, if I am guilty, may my mouth soon be filled with earth as in death. "A lie in my right hand." "The right hand is the abode of truth." The idols are often made with the anum hand lifted up, to show that they are truth; and men thus swear, by lifting up the anum hand. In the ninth and twentieth verses (inclusive) of this chapter, we have an admirable disquisition on the absurdity of idolatry; and neither can the maker of idols nor their worshippers say, there is "not a lie in my right hand."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XLV.

Ver. 2. I will go before thee, and make the crooked places straight; I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron.

See on Acts 12. 10.

Ver. 3. And I will give thee the treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places, that thou mayest know that I the LORD which call thee by thy name, am the God of Israel.

As treasures are frequently hidden under ground in the East, by those that are apprehensive of revolutions; so the finding them is one great object, in their apprehension, of sorcery. We are told by travellers into the East, that they have met with great difficulties very often, from a notion universally disseminated among them, that all Europeans are magicians, and that their visits to those eastern countries are not to satisfy curiosity, but to find out, and get possession of those vast treasures they believe to be buried there in great quantities. These representations are very common; but Sir J. Chardin gives us a more particular and amusing account of affairs of this kind. "It is common in the Indies, for those sorcerers that accompany conquerors, every where to point out the place where treasures are hid. Thus at Surat, when Siragi came thither, there were people who, with a stick striking on the ground, or against walls, found out those that had been hollowed or dug up, and ordered such places to be opened." He then intimates, that something of this nature had happened to him in Mingrelia.

Among the various contradictions that agitate the human breast, this appears to be a remarkable one: they firmly believe the power of magicians to discover hidden treasures, and yet they continue to hide them. Dr. Perry has given us an account of some mighty treasures hidden in the ground by some of the principal people of the Turkish empire, which upon a revolution were discovered by domestics, privy to the secret. D'Herbelot has given us accounts of treasures concealed in the same manner, some of them of great princes, discovered by accidents extremely remarkable; but this account of Chardin's, of conquerors pretending to find out hidden treasures by means of sorcerers, is very extraordinary. As, however, people of this cast have made great pretences to mighty things in all ages, and were not unfrequently confided in by princes, there is reason to believe they pretended sometimes, by their art, to discover treasures anciently to princes, of which they had gained intelligence by other methods; and as God opposed his prophets, at various times, to pretended sorcerers, it is not unlikely that the prophet Isaiah points at some such prophetic discoveries in those remarkable words, Is. xlv. 3: "And I will give thee the treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places, that thou mayest know, that I the Lord which call thee by thy name, am the God of Israel." I will give them, by enabling some prophet of mine to tell thee where they are concealed. Such a supposition throws a great energy into those words.—HARNER.

Ver. 10. Wo unto him that saith unto his father, What begettest thou? or to the woman, What hast thou brought forth?

Dr. Boothroyd has, "to a mother, what dost thou bring forth?" Unnatural as is this language, yet children often use it to their parents. Listen to a son who has been chided by his father for bad conduct—"Why did you beget me? Did I ask you? Why reprove me for evil? Whose fault is it? Had you not begotten me, should I have been here?" The father replies, "Alas! for the day in which I became thy parent." The mother says, "Why did I bear this dog? Have I given birth to a monkey? Yes! I am the mother of this ass."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XLVI.

Ver. 3. Hearken unto me, O house of Jacob, and all the remnant of the house of Israel, which are borne by me from the belly, which are carried from the womb.

"True, this fendish son was borne from my belly. Ten long moons did I carry him in my womb." "Is it for this I have carried him so long in my womb? My fate! my fate! alas! my fate!"—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER XLVII.

Ver. 1. Come down, and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon, sit on the ground: there is no throne, O daughter of the Chaldeans: for thou shalt no more be called tender and delicate. 7. And thou saidst, I shall be a lady for ever: so that thou didst not lay these things to thy heart, neither didst remember the latter end of it.

See on Ezek. 13. 18.

Ver. 2. Take the millstones, and grind meal: uncover thy locks, make bare the leg, uncover the thigh, pass over the rivers.

To grind flour in the East is the work of servants or slaves, and to make it by pounding with a pestle and mortar is the office of female servants or slaves. There being but few bridges, those who are in a low condition are obliged to ford the rivers; hence may be seen large companies going to the opposite banks, who have been obliged to "make bare the leg" and to "uncover the thigh." Thus were the "tender and delicate" daughters of Babylon, who had been nurtured on a throne, to be reduced to the condition of menials, and to cross the rivers as people of the lowest degree.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 14. Behold, they shall be as stubble; the fire shall burn them; they shall not deliver themselves from the power of the flame: there shall not be a coal to warm at, nor fire to sit before it.

It is very usual in the East to burn the stubble and the grass, in order to destroy the vermin. Thus Hanway, speaking of the inhabitants of the deserts of Tartary, says, "that they arrived in the desert in the first winter month, and that the inhabitants who live nearest to it, often manure tracts of land by burning the grass, which grows very high." The words of our Saviour also allude to this, when he says, "Wherefore if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven," Matt. vi. 30.—ROSENEMULLER.

CHAPTER XLIX.

Ver. 9. That thou mayest say to the prisoners, Go forth; to them that are in darkness, Show yourselves. They shall feed in the ways, and their pastures shall be in all high places.

10. They shall not hunger nor thirst, neither shall the heat nor sun smite them: for he that hath mercy on them shall lead them, even by the springs of water shall he guide them.

11. And I will make all my mountains a way, and my highways shall be exalted.

See on Ps. 23. 1—3.

Ver. 15. Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee.

This question is asked when a person doubts of finding mercy, where there is every reason to expect it. Does an individual express surprise at seeing a mother pay attention to an infant which is deformed, or supposed to be possessed by a devil; it is asked, Can a woman forget her sucking child? Is a woman in great haste to return home, it is inquired, "What, have you a sucking child in the house?" The cub of the monkey is as dear to its dam, as gold is to us.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 16. Behold, I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands; thy walls are continually before me.

It is common to make punctures on the arms and wrists, in memory of visiting any holy place, or to represent the deity to whom the individual is consecrated: thus, a god, a temple, a peacock, or some indecent object, is described; but I never saw or heard of any thing of the kind being engraved on the PALMS OF THE HANDS. The palms of the hands are, however, believed to have written on them the fate of the individual; and, from this, it is common to say, in reference to men or things, they are written on the palms of his hands. "I wonder why Ramoa has taken Seebe for his wife?" "Why wonder? She was written on the palms of his hands." "Fear not," says the old soothsayer, looking into the hands of the anxious youth, "she is written here, thou shalt have her." "Alas! alas! the old deceiver told me her name was written on my palms, but she has gone, and the writing is erased." "Give up that pursuit! Never! it is written on the palms of my hands." "Ah! my friend, you have long since forgotten me." "Forgotten you! Never, for your walls are ever before me." "Ah! my father, I am now in the distant country, but your walls are always in my sight." "Ah! when shall I again visit my favourite temple; the walls are continually before me."

—ROBERTS.

This is an allusion to the eastern custom of tracing out on their hands, not the names, but the sketches of certain eminent cities or places, and then rubbing them with the powder of the hennah or cypress, and thereby making the marks perpetual. This custom Maundrell thus describes: "The next morning nothing extraordinary passed, which gave many of the pilgrims leisure to have their arms marked with the usual ensigns of Jerusalem. The artists, who undertake the operation, do it in this manner: they have stamps in wood of any figure that you desire, which they first print off upon your arm, with powder or charcoal; then taking two very fine needles tied close together, and dipping them often, like a pen, in certain ink, compounded, as I was informed, of gunpowder and ox gall, they make with them small punctures all along the lines of the figure which they have printed, and then washing the part in wine, conclude the work. These punctures they make with great quickness and dexterity, and with scarce any smart, seldom piercing so deep as to draw blood.—BUONDI.

Ver. 22. Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will lift up my hand to the Gentiles, and set up my standard to the people: and they shall bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders.

It is a custom, in many parts of the East, to carry their children astride upon the hip, with the arm around the body. In the kingdom of Algiers, when the slaves take the children out, the boys ride upon their shoulders; and in a religious procession, which Symes had an opportunity of seeing at Ava, the capital of the Burman empire, the first personages of rank that passed by, were three children borne astride on men's shoulders. It is evident from these facts, that the oriental children are carried sometimes the one way, sometimes the other. Nor was the custom in reality different in Judea, though the prophet expresses himself in these terms: "They shall bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders; for according to Dr. Russel, the children able to support themselves, are usually carried astride on the shoulder; but in infancy they are carried in the arms, or awkwardly on one haunch. Dandini tells us, that on horseback the Asiatics "carry their young children upon their shoulders with great dexterity. These children hold by the head of him who carries them, whether he be on horseback or on foot, and do not hinder him from walking, nor doing what he pleases." "This augments the import of the passage in Isaiah, who speaks of the Gentiles bringing children thus; so that distance is no objection to this mode of conveyance, since they may thus be brought on horseback from 'among the peoples,' however remote."—PAXTON.

Children of both sexes are carried on the shoulders. Thus may be seen the father carrying his son, the little fellow being astride on the shoulder, having, with his hands, hold of his father's head. Girls, however, sit on the shoulder, as if on a chair, their legs hanging in front, while they also with their hands lay hold of the head. In going to, or returning from, heathen festivals, thousands of parents and their children may be thus seen marching along with joy. In this way shall the Gentiles bring their sons and their daughters to Jehovah: kings shall then be "nursing fathers," and queens "nursing mothers."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 23. And kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and their queens thy nursing mothers: they shall bow down to thee with their face towards the earth, and lick up the dust of thy feet; and thou shalt know that I am the LORD: for they shall not be ashamed that wait for me.

The accomplishment of this prediction is often the subject of the prayers of Christians. They regard it as one of the illustrious features of the times of the millennium, that kings and potentates shall, as foster-fathers, take the church under their special protection and patronage, and instead of opposing and oppressing it, exercise towards it all the kind and tutelary offices of a devoted nurse or mother towards the children of her care. In this view of the passage, it has perhaps been forgotten that the prophetic scriptures are not lacking in intimations, that in that bright and blissful period, the ancient institutions of the world will be so modified, and the different fabrics of government, civil and ecclesiastical, so revolutionized, that it is, to say the least, doubtful whether there will then be any such rulers as kings and queens to bestow their regal regards upon the spouse of Christ. At any rate, it is certain that the text will not then be applied, as it now is, as authorizing a religious establishment subject to the control of a civil power, or in other words, as sanctioning the union of church and state. To the abettors of this pernicious alliance, the present passage has ever been a "pillar of strength" in the way of proof. Let us endeavour, then, to collect the true sense of the prediction from its various connexions. It may be remarked, that the prophecy of which it forms a part, abounds with metaphor; as for instance, v. 22, "the lifting up of the Lord's hand;" "the setting up of his standard to the Gentiles and people;" "their bringing Zion's sons in their arms, and carrying her daughters upon their shoulders;" and v. 23, "the kings and queens of the Gentiles bowing down to the church, with their faces towards the earth, and licking up the dust of her feet." Here is scarce an expression but is highly figurative, and shall we suppose that in the phrase "kings nursing fathers" there is nothing of the same character? For what is the office of the nurse? Is it not to nourish the child? But do kings, as human rulers, in the true sense, nourish the church? Do they afford to it that spiritual pabulum on which it lives and thrives? Do they administer the word and sacraments? Is not this the peculiar and distinguishing office of the ministry of the gospel, set apart to this very work, and acting as the only pastors, i. e. feeders, of the flock of Christ? Is not this the office which they claim as their privilege, which the New Testament gives them, and with which neither kings nor magistrates are to intermeddle? It is easy enough to understand how kings are nursing fathers to the subjects of the nations over which they rule; and as it is the duty of their subjects to regard them in this character, so it is their duty to act towards their subjects consistently with this designation, especially in protecting them in the peaceful enjoyment of their natural and civil rights. But it is not so easy to perceive how kings and queens, as such, are nurses to any but their people, in the capacity of subjects. If indeed the nations of Christendom be churches, then the king of the nation is the king of the church, and so is the nurse of the church. But this is not the kind of church spoken of in the New Testament, nor does the prophetic promise in question speak of any such church. It is evident then, that it is at best only in a metaphorical sense that the words of the promise legitimately hold good. What that sense is precisely, when stripped of its figurative dress, we shall endeavour to show in the sequel.

At present, we call attention to the immediate connexion of the words under review. They are introduced as an answer to the question, v. 21, (following the promise of a numerous church upon the rejection of the Jews, v. 19, 20.) "Then shalt thou say in thy heart, Who hath begotten me these, seeing I lost my children, and am desolate, a captive, and removing to and fro? And who hath brought up these? Behold, I was left alone; these, where had they been?" Upon the rejection of the Jews, it is supposed to be matter of wonder, from whence so many children should still be found clustering about this bereaved and desolate mother. From the New Testament narrative, we learn the difficulty there was in regard to this, in the minds of the Apostles, and the early Jewish believers, and how astonishing it was to them, when it came to pass. The prophecy may be considered as expressing, in a striking manner, the perplexed ruminations of the church in regard to an event so strange and mysterious. It was a problem she knew not how to solve. "Who brought up these? Where had they been?" This is her anxious interrogatory, and the Lord answers, "The kings of the Gentiles shall be thy nursing fathers, and their queens thy nursing mothers;" i. e. they shall have been such; when this multitude is gathered in, they shall have been reared and brought up as the subjects and servants of worldly kings, who little thought of the service they were rendering to the church. They were unconsciously acting the part of nurses to those who were destined in the purpose of God to be the children of Zion just as the teachers of a literary seminary are often unwittingly employed in training their pupils for higher service in the church of God, when subsequently his grace subdues their hearts, and makes them his devoted servants. In this sense, how large a portion of the colleges in our land are nurseries of the church? In like manner, it is here predicted that earthly governments shall be nurseries for the spiritual dominion of Jesus Christ. Out of their subjects shall his subjects be gathered. The agency of kings and queens and all worldly potentates in nursing the people of their rule shall be so controlled by a directing providence, as to be made subservient to the measureless enlargement of his kingdom. This is the grand drift of the prophecy before us. It speaks not of the defence or upholding of the church by the powers of the earth, or the bestowing of worldly possessions and distinctions upon it. Rich and satisfied in the covenant, favour, and spiritual glory of her Head and Husband, what can she ask or expect at the hands of earthly princes? What can they do for her sublime interest, of whom it is said, "They shall bow down to thee with their faces towards the earth, and lick up the dust of thy feet." The Zion of our God has boons to bestow upon worldly sovereigns, but none to ask of them. Thus interpreted, the passage is throughout consistent. The answer is suitable to the question, and both, to the scope of the prophecy, which is, to pre-intimate the calling of the Gentiles, and the increase of the church, upon the casting away of the Jews, by the bringing of the elect of all nations into that new Jerusalem which is from above, and is the mother of them all.—BUSH.

Thus were those who had been enemies to Jehovah to bow down and acknowledge his majesty. They were to "lick up the dust," which is a figurative expression to denote submission and adoration. "Boasting vain fellow! the king your friend! he your companion! You will not have even the dust of his feet given you for food." "The minister give you that office! he will not give you the dust of his feet." "Alas! alas! for me, I expected his favour; I depended on his word; but I have not gained the dust of his feet." "I will not remain longer in this country; I will leave you, and go to reside with the king." "With the king! Why, the dust of his feet will not be given you for a reward." "Could I but see that holy man! I would eat the dust of his feet." So great then is to be the humility and veneration of kings and queens, in reference to the Most High, that they will bow down before him, and lick up the dust of his feet.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER L.

Ver. 2. Wherefore, when I came, was there no man? when I called, was there none to answer? Is my hand shortened at all, that it cannot redeem? or have I no power to deliver? behold, at my rebuke I dry up the sea, I make the rivers a wilderness: their fish stinketh, because there is no water, and dieth for thirst.

The Krooman (or Koorooman) river, in Africa, which is a considerable stream, used to run in an oblique direction across the great southern Zahara desert, till it emptied itself into the Great Orange River. Now it sinks out of sight into the sand almost immediately on entering the desert, only a few miles after the junction of the Macklaren river with its waters. As a proof that it had once run in the desert, I travelled ten or fifteen miles on its hard dry channel along which it had run after entering the desert, having a steep bank on both sides, beyond which there was nothing but deep sand. The aged natives told me that in their young days there was a considerable river in that channel, and sometimes rose so high that it could not be crossed for a long time. They first blamed the Matslaroo people for drying it up by means of witchcraft, but afterward acknowledged it must have been done by the hand of God.—CAMPELL.

Ver. 6. I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: I hid not my face from shame and spitting.

Mr. Hanway has recorded a scene differing little, if at all, from that alluded to by the prophet. "A prisoner was brought, who had two large logs of wood fitted to the smalk of his leg, and riveted together; there was also a heavy triangular collar of wood about his neck. The general asked me, if that man had taken my goods. I told him, I did not remember to have seen him before. He was questioned some time, and at length ordered to be beaten with sticks, which was performed by two soldiers with such severity as if they meant to kill him. The soldiers were then ordered to spit in his face, an indignity of great antiquity in the East. This, and the cutting off beards, which I shall have occasion to mention, brought to my mind the sufferings recorded in the prophetic history of our Saviour. Isaiah 1. 6. "Sadoc Aga sent prisoner to Astrabad—his beard was cut off; his face was rubbed with dirt, and his eyes cut out. Upon his speaking in pathetic terms with that emotion natural to a daring spirit, the general ordered him to be struck across the mouth to silence him; which was done with such violence that the blood issued forth."—BUADER.

CHAPTER LI.

Ver. 6. Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath; for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner: but my salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished. 7. Hearken unto me, ye that know righteousness, the people in whose heart is my law; fear ye not the reproach of men, neither be ye afraid of their revilings.

See on Job 4. 9.

Ver. 8. For the moth shall eat them up like a garment, and the worm shall eat them like wool: but my righteousness shall be for ever, and my salvation from generation to generation.

As the fashions of the garments of the Orientals never change, they have large stores of them; but they have no little difficulty in preserving them from moths: which circumstance may have occasioned their profuse use of perfumes.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 11. Therefore the redeemed of the LORD shall return, and come with singing unto Zion; and everlasting joy shall be upon their head: they shall obtain gladness and joy; and sorrow and mourning shall flee away.

Is there not here an allusion to the custom so common in the East, of singing upon a journey, particularly with a view to quicken the pace of the camels? "We should not have passed this plain so rapidly, but for the common custom of the Arabs of urging on their camels by singing: the effect is very extraordinary: this musical excitement increases their pace at least one fourth. First one camel-driver sings a verse, then the others answer in chorus. It reminded me somewhat of the Venetian gondoliers. I often asked the camel-drivers to sing, not only to hasten our progress, but also for the pleasure of hearing their simple melodies. Some of their best songs possess a plaintive sweetness that is almost as touching as the most exquisite European airs. The words are often beautiful, generally simple and natural, being improvisatory effusions. The following is a very imperfect specimen. One takes up the song:—Ah, when shall I see my family again? the rain has fallen and made a canal between me and my home. Oh, shall I never see it more? The reply to this and similar verses was always made by the chorus, in words such as these:—'Oh, what pleasure, what delight, to see my family again; when I see my father, mother, brothers, sisters, I will hoist a flag on the head of my camel for joy.'" (Hoskins' Trav. in Ethiopia, p. 26.)—BUSH.

In describing the order of the caravans, Pitts informs us, "that some of the camels have bells about their necks, an d some about their legs, like those which our carriers put about their fore-horses' necks, which, together with the servants (who belong to the camels and travel on foot) singing all night, make a pleasant noise, and the journey passes away delightfully." This circumstance is explanatory of the singing of the Israelites in their return to Jerusalem.—HARMEA.

Ver. 14. The captive exile hasteneth that he may be loosed, and that he should not die in the pit, nor that his bread should fail.

See on Job 33, 18, 24.

Ver. 17. Awake, awake, stand up, O Jerusalem, which hast drunk at the hand of the Lord the cup of his fury; thou hast drunken the dregs of the cup of trembling, and wrung them out.

Artificial liquors, or mixed wines, were very common in ancient Italy, and the Levant. The Romans lined their vessels with odorous gums, to give their wines a warm bitter flavour; and it is said, that several nations of modern times communicate to their wines a favourite relish by similar means. In Greece this is accomplished by infusing the cones of the pine in the wine vats. Hasselquist says they use the sweet-scented violet in their sherbet, which they make of violet sugar dissolved in water; the grandees sometimes add ambergris, as the highest luxury and indulgence of their appetite. The prophet Isaiah mentions a mixture of wine and water; but it is evident from the context, that he means to express by that phrase the degenerate state of his nation; and consequently, we cannot infer from it, the use of diluted wine in those countries. It is observed by Thevenot, that the people of the Levant never mingle water with their wine at meals, but drink by itself what water they think proper, for abating the strength of the wine. While the Greeks and Romans by mixed wine always understood wine diluted and lowered with water, the Hebrews, on the contrary, meant by it wine made stronger, and more inebriating, by the addition of powerful ingredients, as honey, spices, defrutum, or wine inspissated, by boiling it down to two-thirds or one half of the quantity, myrrh, opiates, and other strong drugs. The Greeks were no strangers to perfumed and medicated wines; for in Homer, the far-famed Helen mixed a number of stupefying ingredients in the bowl, to exhilarate the spirits of her guests that were oppressed with grief; the composition of which, the poet says, she learnt in Egypt. Of the same kind was the spiced wine mentioned in the Song of Solomon; and to this day, such wines are eagerly sought by the people of Syria and Palestine. The drunkards in Israel preferred these medicated wines to all others: "Who hath wo?" said the wise man, "who hath contentions? who hath sorrow? who hath habbling? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine; they that go to seek mixed wine." Nor were the manners of that people more correct in the days of Isaiah; for he was directed to pronounce a "wo unto them that rose up early in the morning, that they might follow strong drink; that continued until night, till wine inflamed them." This ancient custom furnished the holy Psalmist with a highly poetical and sublime image of divine wrath: "For in the hand of the Lord . . . a cup; and the wine is red; it is full of mixture." The prophet Isaiah uses the same figure in one of his exhortations: "Awake, awake, stand up, O Jerusalem, which hast drunk at the hand of the Lord the cup of his fury; thou hast drunken the dregs of the cup of trembling, and wrung them out." The worshippers of the beast and his image, are threatened with the same fearful punishment: "The same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation." The Jews sometimes acidulated their wine with the juice of the pomegranate; a custom to which the spouse thus alludes: "I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine, of the juice of my pomegranate;" or of wine mixed with the juice of that fruit. Prepared in this way, it proves a cooling and refreshing draught in the heat of summer, and by consequence, highly acceptable to an Oriental.—PAXTON.

Ver. 20. Thy sons have fainted, they lie at the head of all the streets, as a wild bull in a net: they are full of the fury of the Lord, the rebuke of thy God.

What a graphic picture we have here of an eastern city or town in time of famine! See the squalid objects: in their despair, they rush forth, throw themselves down in the streets, and there remain till they die, or are relieved. They have scarcely a rag left to defend them from the heat of the sun, or the dew of the night; and they court death as a blessing. Ask them why they lie there, they reply, to die: tell them to get out of the way, and they answer not again; and so great is their indifference, that many of them would literally be crushed to death, rather than make the least effort to preserve life.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER LII.

Ver. 1. Awake, awake; put on thy strength, O Zion; put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem, the holy city: for henceforth there shall no more come unto thee the uncircumcised and the unclean.

Jerusalem had long been afflicted by her foes, but the time of her deliverance was at hand, and in token of that she was to deck herself in her glorious attire. At the time of famine, sickness, or sorrow, the people clothe themselves in their meanest apparel, and their ornaments are laid aside; but on the return of prosperity, they array themselves in their most "beautiful garments."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 2. Shake thyself from the dust; arise, and sit down, O Jerusalem: loose thyself from the bands of thy neck, O captive daughter of Zion.

See the poor prisoners; see mothers bereft of their children, or wives of their husbands; they roll themselves in the dust, and there make their bitter lamentations. The holy city had figuratively been in the dust, but she was now to arise, to take the shackles from her neck, and to sit down in the place prepared for her.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 2. Shake thyself from the dust; arise, and sit down, O Jerusalem: loose thyself from the bands of thy neck, O captive daughter of Zion.

10. The Lord hath made bare his holy arm in the eyes of all the nations; and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God.

The use of the oriental dress, which I now wear, brings to the mind various scriptural illustrations, of which I will only mention two. The figure in Isaiah lii. 10, "The Lord hath made bare his holy arm," is most lively: for the loose sleeve of the Arab shirt, as well as that of the outer garment, leaves the arm so completely free, that, in an instant, the left hand passing up the right arm, makes it bare; and this is done when a person, a soldier, for example, about to strike with the sword, intends to give his right arm full play. The image represents Jehovah as suddenly prepared to inflict some tremendous, yet righteous judgment, so effectual, "that all the ends of the world shall see the salvation of God."

The other point illustrated occurs in the second verse of the same chapter, where the sense of the last expression is, to an Oriental, extremely natural: "Shake thyself from the dust, arise, sit down, O Jerusalem." It is no uncommon thing to see an individual, or a group of persons, even when very well-dressed, sitting with their feet drawn under them, upon the bare earth, passing whole hours in idle conversation. Europeans would require a chair; but the natives here prefer the ground. In the heat of summer and autumn, it is pleasant to them to while away their time in this manner, under the shade of a tree. Richly-adorned females, as well as men, may often be seen thus amusing themselves. As may naturally be expected, with whatever care they may, at first sitting down, choose their place, yet the flowing dress by degrees gathers up the dust; as this occurs, they, from time to time, arise, adjust themselves, shake off the dust, and then sit down again. The captive daughter of Zion, therefore, brought down to the dust of suffering and oppression, is commanded to arise and shake herself from that dust; and then, with grace, and dignity, and composure, and security, to sit down; to take, as it were, again, her seat and her rank, amid the company of the nations of the earth, which had before afflicted her, and trampled her to the earth.

It may be proper to notice, that Bishop Lowth gives another rendering, "Arise, ascend thy lofty seat," and quotes eastern customs, to justify the version: but I see no necessity for the alteration, although to English ears it may sound more appropriate. A person of rank in the East often sits down upon the ground, with his attendants about him.—JOWETT.

Ver. 7. How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace; that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation; that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth!

Small feet are considered beautiful in all parts of the East. The feet of kings and holy people are spoken of in preference to the other parts of the body. His majesty of the Burmese empire is always mentioned as the "golden feet." "My messenger will soon return, he will bring me good tidings; his feet will be glorious." "Ah! when will the feet of my priest return this way; how glorious is their place!" "Are you in health?" asks the holy man. "Yes; by the glory of your feet," is the reply. "Ah! Swamy, it is a happy circumstance for me that your feet have entered my house."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 8. Thy watchmen shall lift up the voice; with the voice together shall they sing: for they shall see eye to eye, when the Lord shall bring again Zion.

The phrase, "see eye to eye," is that which we propose to explain, and the preceding verse should be read in order to show more clearly the connexion. The whole passage is a prediction of gospel times; it points to the proclamation of the joyful and welcome tidings which constituted the burden of our Saviour's preaching, and that of his apostles. In the poetical style of the East, the watchmen are represented as standing upon their watch-tower, or post of observation, and stretching their vision to the utmost point of the horizon, as if in eager expectation of the appearance of a news-bearing messenger. On a sudden the wished-for object appears in sight, on the summit of the distant mountain, speeding his rapid way to the city, while the watchmen, anticipating the tenor of his tidings, burst forth in a shout of gratulation and triumph. "Thy watchmen shall lift up the voice; with the voice together shall they sing." The imagery strikingly represents the expectant attitude and heedful vigilance of the believing part of the teachers and pastors of the nation of Israel on the eve of the Messiah's manifestation. The reason of the outbreak of their holy joy is immediately given: "For they shall see eye to eye, when the Lord shall bring again Zion," i. e. they shall have a clear and unclouded discernment of the actual execution of the divine purposes. As faithful watchmen, intent upon their duty, and earnestly looking out for the signs of promise, they shall be favoured with a clear, distinct, luminous perception of the objects of their gaze, in which they shall be honourably distinguished from a class of watchmen spoken of by the same prophet, ch. lvi. 10, of whom it is said, "His watchmen are blind;" instead of seeing clearly, they see nothing. That this is the genuine force of the expression, "they shall see eye to eye," is to be inferred from the parallel usage, Num. xiv. 14, "For they have heard that thou, Lord, art among this people, that thou, Lord, art seen face to face," (Heb. eye to eye); i. e. in the most open, evident manner. Of equivalent import are the expressions, Ex. xxx. 11, "And the Lord spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend." Num. xii. 8, "With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches;" where the latter part of the verse is exegetical of the former. We conclude, therefore, that the words do not in their primary and most legitimate sense imply a perfect unanimity of religious or doctrinal belief in the watchmen, or spiritual guides, of the Christian church. At the same time, though not expressly taught in this passage, it is but reasonable to expect, that in proportion as the prosperity of the church advances, truth will be more clearly discerned, and there will be a constant approximation among the pious, to a uniform standard of theological faith.—BURN.

Ver. 10. The Lord hath made bare his holy arm in the eyes of all the nations.

The right arm or shoulder is always alluded to as the place of strength: with that the warrior wields his sword, and slays his foes. The metaphor appears to allude to a man who is preparing for the battle: he takes the robe from his right arm, that being thus uncovered, "made bare," it may the more easily perform its office. "Tell your boasting master to get ready his army, for our king has shown his shoulder," i. e. uncovered it. "Alas! I have heard that the mighty sovereign of the neighbouring kingdom has pointed to his shoulder," i. e. he is ready to come against us. See two men disputing; should one of them point to his right arm and shoulder, the other will immediately fall into a rage, as he knows it amounts to a challenge, and says, in effect, "I am thy superior." Thus may be seen men at a distance, when defying each other, slapping each his right hand or shoulder. Jehovah, in reference to the nations of the earth, "hath made bare his holy arm." "And all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 15. So shall he sprinkle many nations; the kings shall shut their mouths at him; for that which had not been told them shall they see, and that which they had not heard shall they consider.

At an eastern feast a person stands near the entrance with a silver vessel, which is full of rose-water, or some other perfumed liquid, with which he sprinkles the guests as they approach, as if from a watering-pan. The object is to show they are now the king's, or the great man's guests: they are in his favour and under his protection. So shall the eternal Son of God sprinkle many nations, and admit them into his presence in token of their purification, and of his protection and favour. The kings of the earth shall no longer rebel against him; but "shall shut their mouths" to denote their submission and respect.—ROBERTS.

When the company were ready to separate, a servant entered and sprinkled them profusely with rose-water, as a valedictory mark of his master's regard. In some places, this was done at the beginning of the entertainment, and was considered as a cordial welcome. Mr. Bruce informs us, that when he rose to take his leave of an eastern family, he "was presently wet to the skin, by deluges of orange-flower water." "The first time," says Niebuhr, "we were received with all the eastern ceremonies, (it was at Rosetta, at a Greek merchant's house,) there was one of our company who was excessively surprised, when a domestic placed himself before him, and threw water over him, as well on his face, as over his clothes." It appears from the testimony of both these authors, that this is the customary mode of showing respect and kindness to a guest in the East. The prophet Isaiah seems to refer to this custom, in a passage where he describes the character and functions of the Messiah: "So shall he sprinkle many nations, the kings shall shut their mouths at him."—PAXTON.

CHAPTER LIIII.

Ver. 1. Who hath believed our report; and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?

In these parts of the world, the fashion is in a state of almost daily fluctuation, and different fashions are not unfrequently seen contending for the superiority; but in the East, where the people are by no means given to change, the form of their garments continues nearly the same from one age to another. The greater part of their clothes are long and flowing, loosely cast about the body, consisting only of a large piece of cloth, in the cutting and sewing of which, very little art or industry is employed. They have more dignity and gracetulness than ours, and are better adapted to the burning climates of Asia. From the simplicity of their form, and their loose adaptation to the body, the same clothes might be worn with equal ease and convenience by many different persons. The clothes of those Philistines whom Samson slew at Ashkelon, required no altering to fit his companions; nor the robe of Jonathan to answer his friend. "The arts of weaving and fulling seemed to have been distinct occupations in Israel, from a very remote period, in consequence of the various and skilful operations which were necessary to bring their stuffs to a suitable degree of perfection; but when the weaver and the fuller had finished their part, the labour was nearly at an end; no distinct artisan was necessary to make them into clothes; every family seems to have made their own. Sometimes, however, this part of the work was performed in the loom; for they had the art of weaving robes, with sleeves all of one piece: of this kind was the coat which our Saviour wore during his abode with men. These loose dresses, when the arm is lifted up, expose its whole length. To this circumstance the prophet Isaiah refers. "To whom is the arm of the Lord revealed"—uncovered—Who observes that he is about to exert the arm of his power?—PAXTON.

Ver. 7. He was oppressed, and he was afflicted; yet he opened not his mouth: he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth.

This image was designed by the prophet to represent the meek, uncomplaining manner in which Christ stood before his judge, and submitted even to death for the salvation of mankind. Philo-Judæus, a philosopher and a Jew, born and bred in Egypt, and well acquainted with their customs, has a passage, by which it appears that the figurative language of Isaiah was founded upon the practice of the eastern shepherds. "Woolly rams, laden with thick fleeces, in spring season, being ordered by their shepherd, stand without moving, and silently stooping a little, put themselves into his hand, to have their wool shorn; being accustomed, as cities are, to pay their yearly tribute to man, their king by nature."—BURDER.

CHAPTER LIV.

Ver. 2. Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thy habitation: spare not, lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes.

In Africa, when we expected an increase of hearers, the Tottentots moved the pins all round, a yard or a yard and a half, farther from the tent, towards which they stretched the canvass, and fastened it, which considerably increased the room inside.—CAMPELLE.

Ver. 11. O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted, behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colours, and lay thy foundations with sapphires. 12. And I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones.

This figurative way of speaking is in exact keeping with the eastern notions of magnificence: thus the abodes of the gods, or distant kings, are described as having pillars of red coral; rooms made of crystal; ruby doors; thrones of the nine precious stones; walls of gold, surrounded by emerald rivers. Such passages, therefore, are not to be received literally, but as being indicative of great splendour and unrivalled prosperity.—ROBERTS.

Many of the oriental buildings, however, have displayed unrivalled magnificence and splendour. The walls, columns, floors, and minarets of the mosques, were of the choicest marble, granite, and porphyry, inlaid with agates and precious stones. The ornamental parts were of gold and silver, or consisted of the most elegant borders, with festoons of fruit and flowers, in their natural colours, composed entirely of agates, cornelians, turquoises, lapis-lazuli, and other valuable gems. The hangings and carpets were of the richest manufacture: and the splendid edifice was illumined with chandeliers of massive gold. "How forcibly," says Forbes, "do these remind us of the truth and beauty of the metaphorical language in the sacred page, promising sublime and spiritual joys, in allusion to these subjects in eastern palaces!"—PAXTON.

CHAPTER LV.

Ver. 12. For ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace: the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands.

13. Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle-tree: and it shall be to the Lord for a name, and for an everlasting sign, that shall not be cut off.

Here we have another specimen of the fervid and splendid imagery of eastern language. Some people affect to despise the hyperboles, the parables, and high-toned allusions of such a style; but they ought to recollect they arise as much from the climate, the genius, and customs of the people, as do our more plain and sober effusions from opposite circumstances. When the god Ramar was going to the desert, it was said to him, "The trees will watch for you; they will say, He is come, he is come; and the white flowers will clap their hands. The leaves, as they shake, will say, Come, come; and the thorny places will be changed into gardens of flowers."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER LVI.

Ver. 3. Neither let the son of the stranger, that hath joined himself to the Lord, speak, saying, The Lord hath utterly separated me from his people: neither let the eunuch say, Behold, I am a dry tree.

People without posterity, of both sexes, are called dry trees; which, strictly speaking, means they are dead, having neither sap, nor leaves, nor fruit.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER LVII.

Ver. 6. Among the smooth stones of the stream is thy portion; they, they are thy lot; even to them hast thou poured a drink-offering, thou hast offered a meat-offering. Should I receive comfort in these?

This refers to stones made smooth by oil poured on them, as was frequently done by the heathen. Theophrastus has marked this as one strong feature in the character of the superstitious man: "Passing by the anointed stones in the streets, he takes out his vial of oil, and pours it on them; and having fallen on his knees, and made his adorations, he departs."—LOWTH.

CHAPTER LVIII.

Ver. 5. Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a day for a man to afflict his soul? is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord?

The eastern people spread mats or small carpets under them when they pray, and even suppose it unlawful to pray on the bare ground; is it not natural to suppose the Jews had something under them when they prayed, and that this was a piece of sackcloth in times of peculiar humiliation? When they wore sackcloth in the day, it is not perhaps natural to suppose they slept in fine linen; but I should suppose some passages of scripture, which, in our translation, speak of lying in sackcloth, are rather to be understood of lying prostrate before God on sackcloth, than taking their repose on that coarse and harsh kind of stuff.

The learned and exact Vitrina makes no remark of this kind on that passage of Isaiah, "Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a day for a man to afflict his soul? is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him?" He only quotes what is said of Ahab, 1 Kings xxi. 27, and the Jews in Shushan, Esther iv. 2, as of a similar nature, and seems to understand this piece of humiliation before God of lodging on sackcloth. But, surely, it must be much more natural to understand the solemnity of prostration on sackcloth before God, which follows the mention of hanging down the head, used in kneeling, or in standing as suppliants before him, rather than of sleeping in sackcloth, the night before or the night after the day of fasting. It seems to me, in like manner, to express the humiliation of Ahab with more energy, than as commonly understood: "And it came to pass, when Ahab heard those words, that he rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his flesh, and fasted, and prostrated himself on sackcloth," &c. The like may be said of the lying of the Jews in Shushan in sackcloth.

A passage in Josephus strongly confirms this, in which he describes the deep concern of the Jews for the danger of Herod Agrippa, after having been stricken suddenly with a violent disorder in the theatre of Cesarea. Upon the news of his danger, "immediately the multitude, with their wives and children, sitting upon sackcloth, according to their country rites, prayed for the king: all places were filled with wailing and lamentation: while the king, who lay in an upper room, beholding the people thus below falling prostrate on the ground, could not himself refrain from tears." Antiq. lib. xix. cap. 8, § 2, p. 951. Here we see the sitting on sackcloth, resting on their hams, in prayer, and falling prostrate at times on the sackcloth, was a Jewish observance in times of humiliation and distress.—HARMER.

Ver. 9. Then shalt thou call, and the LORD shall answer: thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am. If thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke, the putting forth of the finger, and speaking vanity.

This chapter commences with, "Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and show my people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sins." After this, the people are severely reprov'd for their hypocrisy, "ye fast for strife and debate, and smite with the fist of wickedness," and then they are exhorted to cease from their oppressions, "to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke." It appears they were tyrants under the garb of sanctity, and in contempt for the injured, they took delight in "putting forth of the finger, and speaking vanity." See that boasting tyrant, when addressing his humbled antagonist, he scowls and storms "like the raging sea," and then lifts up the fore-finger of the right hand to the height of his head, and moves it up and down, to show that punishment of a still higher nature shall be the award of the victim of his wrath.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 10. And if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul; then shall thy light rise in obscurity, and thy darkness be as the noonday.

Has a person in reference to temporal circumstances been in great difficulty, has he been delivered, then is he compared to a man in a dark place who suddenly finds a light, which enables him to walk with pleasure and safety in his appointed way. "True, true, I was in darkness, but the light has come; it shines around me; there is no shade."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 11. And the LORD shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make fat thy bones: and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not.

In a hot climate where showers seldom fall, except in what is called the rainy season, the difference between a well and ill watered garden is most striking. I remember some gardens in Africa where they could lead no water up them; the plants were all sunned, sickly, or others completely gone, only the hole left where the faded plant had been. The sight was unpleasant, and caused gloom to appear in every countenance; they were pictures of desolation. But in other gardens, to which the owners could bring daily supplies of water from an everflowing fountain, causing it to traverse the garden, every plant had a green, healthy appearance, loaded with fruit, in different stages towards maturity, with fragrant scent proceeding from beds of lovely flowers; and all this produced by the virtue God hath put into the single article of water.—CAMPELLE.

CHAPTER LIX.

Ver. 4. None calleth for justice, nor any pleadeth for truth: they trust in vanity, and speak lies; they conceive mischief, and bring forth iniquity.

See on Ps. 14. 29.

Ver. 5. They hatch cockatrices' eggs, and weave the spider's web: he that catcheth of their eggs dieth, and that which is crushed breaketh out into a viper.

See on ch. II. 8.

The margin has, instead of cockatrice, "or adders." So far as the strength of the poison is concerned, I believe there is scarcely any difference betwixt the oviparous and the viviparous serpents. The eggs of the former are generally deposited in heaps of stones, in old walls, or holes in dry places; and under some circumstances, (like those of the large lizard,) are soft and yielding to the touch. The pliability of the shell may be the result of being newly laid, as I have seen some shells as hard as those of other eggs. It is said of the plans of a decidedly wicked and talented man, "That wretch! he hatches serpents' eggs." "Beware of the fellow, his eggs are nearly hatched." "Ah! my friend, touch not that affair, meddle not with that matter; there is a serpent in the shell." "Interfere not, interfere not, young serpents are coming forth." "I have been long absent from my home, and on my return I thought that I should have much enjoyment, but on opening a basket to procure some cakes, I found they were all serpents," meaning, instead of pleasure, he had found pain on his return. "I touch it! No, no; the last time I did so the shell broke and a young serpent gave me a bite, which has poisoned my whole frame."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 11. We roar all like bears, and mourn sore like doves: we look for judgment, but there is none; for salvation, but it is far off from us.

In parturition those animals are said to make a tremendous noise: hence people in poignant sorrow say, "We roar like bears." "Hear you not the widow's cry last night? the noise was like that of a she-bear." "What is the fellow roaring about? he is like a she-bear."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 15. Yea, truth faileth; and he that departeth from evil maketh himself a prey: and the LORD saw it, and it displeased him that there was no judgment.

In the preceding verses, the wickedness of the abandoned Jews is strongly portrayed; and when they began to confess their sins and repent, as in the ninth and fourteenth verses inclusive, they were by some, as in the margin, "accounted mad," in consequence of their change of views and conduct. It is an amusing fact, that when the heathen become very attentive to the directions of their own religion when they rigidly perform the prescribed austerities; "when they sell themselves to the gods, and appear like men of another world," they are "accounted mad" by their neighbours. On the other hand, should a man begin to deride the national faith; should he never go near the temples, and laugh at idols and outward ceremonies, the people again exclaim, "The fellow is mad!" But, above all, should a person embrace Christianity, the general story is, "the poor fellow has gone mad." "Have you heard Supplyan has become a Christian?"—"No; but I have heard he has become a madman."—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER LX.

Ver. 6. The multitude of camels shall cover thee, the dromedaries of Midian and Ephah; all they from Sheba shall come: they shall bring gold and incense; and they shall show forth the praises of the LORD.

That species of camel called the dromedary, is chiefly remarkable for its prodigious swiftness; the Arabs affirming, that it will run over as much ground in one day, as one of their best horses will perform in eight or ten. If this be true, the prophet had reason to call it the "swift dromedary;" and the messengers of Esther acted wisely, in choosing this animal to carry their important despatches to the distant provinces of that immense empire. Dr. Shaw had frequent opportunities, in his travels, of verifying the wonderful accounts of the Arabs in relation to the swiftness of this creature. The sheik who conducted the party to Mount Sinai, rode a camel of this kind, and would frequently divert them with a display of its abilities; he would depart from their caravan, reconnoitre another just in view, and return to them again in less than a quarter of an hour.—PAXTON.

Ver. 7. All the flocks of Kedar shall be gathered together unto thee, the rams of Nebaioth shall minister unto thee: they shall come up with acceptance on mine altar, and I will glorify the house of my glory

Here we have unquestionably another metaphor, to illustrate the prosperity and influence of the church among the heathen. I think, therefore, it is trifling with the text, to suppose it alludes to a literal possession of the "rams of Nebaioth," "the flocks of Kedar," or the "dromedaries of Midian." I believe it refers to the people of those countries, who are spoken of in the passage, under the names of the animals for which their localities were most famous. This mode of speech is perfectly oriental, and may often be heard in common conversation. Thus, for instance, the district of Mullitevo is famous for its numerous buffaloes; hence the people of that place, when they go to another town, are often, by way of pleasantry, called buffaloes. The district of Poonareen abounds with the wild hog; and it excites a smile to call one of its inhabitants the pandy, i. e. pig of Poonareen. The islands opposite North Ceylon are noted for shells, and when the islanders come to the towns, it is asked, should a person wish to have a little merriment at their expense, "Why do these shells of the islands come hither?" Batticootta is celebrated for having numerous men who are expert in digging tanks: hence all the people, as circumstances may require, are humorously called OTTAR, i. e. diggers. I think, therefore, the figure is descriptive of the glory of the church in the acquisition of the PEOPLE of Midian, Ephah; of Sheba, of Kedar, and Nebaioth.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 8. Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows.

In this passage, he beheld in vision the captive Israelites, liberated by the decree, and encouraged by the invitation of Cyrus, returning with the greatest alacrity to the land of their fathers; and exulting at the sight, he cries out with surprise and pleasure, "Who are these that fly as doves to their windows?" The prophet apparently supposes, that in his time, buildings for the reception of doves were very common. And this is by no means improbable; for, when Maundrell visited Palestine, dove-cots were numerous in some parts of the country. In the neighbourhood of Isbahan are many pigeon-houses built for the sole purpose of collecting pigeons' dung for manure. The extraordinary flights of pigeons which alight upon one of those buildings, furnish a good illustration of the prophet's vision. Their great numbers and the compactness of their mass, literally look like a cloud at a distance, and obscure the sun in their passage. In some parts of Egypt are numerous whitened dove-cots on the tops of the houses. The dove flies more swiftly when she returns to the windows of these cots, than when she leaves them; because she hastens to revisit her young which she had left, and to distribute among them the food which she had collected. A similar passage occurs in Hosea: "They shall tremble as a dove out of Egypt; and as a dove out of the land of Assyria; and I will place them in their houses, saith the Lord." They shall fly with trepidation; or, like a dove trembling for its young, or alarmed for its own safety, which puts forth its utmost speed. Phrases of this kind are not uncommon in the sacred writings; thus, when Samuel came to Beth-lehem, the elders of the town trembled at his coming; that is, they ran out with trepidation to meet him. A similar phrase occurs in the third chapter of Hosea: "They shall fear to the Lord and his goodness;" that is, they shall run with trepidation to the Lord and his goodness in the latter days. These verbs (וָרָחַק and וָרָחַק) phahad, which are nearly synonymous, according to some Jewish writers, mean only to return with haste. Thus, Aben Ezra, on the last quotation from the prophecies of Hosea: "They shall return with haste to the Lord and his goodness."—PAXTON.

Ver. 11. Therefore thy gates shall be open continually; they shall not be shut day nor night: that men may bring unto thee the forces of the Gentiles, and that their kings may be brought.

Dr. Boothroyd says, "That they may bring to thee the wealth of the nations." Of a wealthy man who is continually adding to his stores, it is said, "His gates neither day nor night, AKO-RAT-TIRAM, are closed." Also it is said of a charitable king, "His gates are always open." So in those days of glorious accession to the church, "Her doors shall be open continually, and day and night shall the Gentiles be gathered into her pale."—ROBERTS.

Ver. 14. The sons also of them that afflicted thee shall come bending unto thee; and all they that despised thee shall bow themselves down at the soles of thy feet; and they shall call thee, The city of the LORD, The Zion of the Holy One of Israel.

"Come bending unto thee." Who in the East has not seen the humble suppliant come BENDING to ask forgiveness or to entreat a favour? See him go stooping along, with his hands spread out, till he come near his superior, and then, as in the next words, he bows himself down at his feet.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER LXI.

Ver. 3. To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness: that they might be called Trees of Righteousness, The Planting of the LORD, that he might be glorified.

Perfumed oils are very expensive, and are believed to possess many virtues. Except for medicinal purposes, they are used only on joyous occasions. "My friend, why are you so dejected? the gods shall give you PARE-MALATIYALUM," i. e. precious or odoriferous ointment.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 10. I will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.

It would be considered unfortunate in the extreme for a bride to be married without having on numerous jewels: hence the poorest females, those who have not a farthing in the world, may be seen on such occasions literally covered with jewels. The plan is this:—the neig bours and friends of the poor girl lend their ornaments in order to make a splendid show; and I have not known an instance (except when lost) of their not being returned; which may be considered a remarkable fact among people who are not very famed for honesty. But the bridegroom also has numerous ear-rings, neck-rings, chains, breastplates, and finger-rings. "I will greatly rejoice — as a bridegroom." "You appear to be very happy, Chinan?"—"Indeed I am happy; and it is like the joy of a kalle-yannun," i. e. marriage. "Ah! my heart has a wedding to-day," says the man who is in great pleasure. "Have you heard of the joy of old Kandan?"—"No, why; is he so happy?"—"Because his daughter has kalmare-potai," i. e. literally, changed her legs; meaning, she has got married. "Happy man should I have been if my daughter had not changed her legs," says the father whose daughter has been unfortunately married.

CHAPTER LXII.

Ver. 4. Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken: neither shall thy land any more be termed Desolate: but thou shalt be called Hephzibah, and thy land Beulah: for the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married.

The margin has for Beulah, married. A sovereign is spoken of as being married to his dominions; they mutually depend upon each other. When a king takes possessions from another, he is said to be married to them. Thus in that day shall God's people, and their inheritance, be married to the Lord.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 5. For as a young man marieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee.

In general, no youth marries a widow: such a thing I scarcely ever heard of, nor will it ever be, except under some extraordinary circumstance, as in the case of a queen, princess, or great heiress. Even widowers also, if possible, always marry virgins.—ROBERTS.

Ver. 6. I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence.

The image in this place is taken from the temple service, in which there was appointed a constant watch day and night by the Levites. Now the watches in the East, even to this day, are performed by a loud cry from time to time by the watchmen, to mark the time, and that very frequently, and in order to show that they themselves are constantly attentive to their duty. "The watchmen in the camp of the caravans go their rounds, crying one after another, God is one, he is merciful; and often add, take heed to yourselves." (Tavernier.) The reader will observe in this extract how mention is made of the name of God by the watchmen.—BURDEA.

Ver. 10. Go through, go through the gates; prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people.

The situation of Babylon, on the river Euphrates, must have made causeways necessary to those that had occasion to go thither or come from thence, as marks set up must have been very requisite to those that had to pass through the deserts, that lay between Chaldea and Palestine: to both which conveniences Isaiah seems to refer, as well as to some other circumstances attending eastern travelling, in that passage in which he prophetically describes the return of Israel from Babylon. The passage I mean is in the close of the 62d chapter: "Go through, go through the gates; prepare ye the way of the people, cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people. Behold, the Loan hath proclaimed unto the end of the world, Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy salvation cometh."

Irwin, speaking of his passing through the deserts on the eastern side of the Nile, in his going from Upper Egypt to Cairo, tells us, "that after leaving a certain valley which he mentions, their road lay over level ground. As it would be next to an impossibility to find the way over these stony flats, where the heavy foot of a camel leaves no impression, the different bands of robbers, wild Arabs he means, who frequent that desert, have heaped up stones at unequal distances, for their direction through this desert. We have derived great assistance from the robbers in this respect, who are our guides when the marks either fail, or are unintelligible to us." After which he remarks, that if it be considered, that this road to Cairo is seldom trodden, it is no wonder that those persons they had with them, as conductors, were frequently at a loss to determine their way through this desert. The learned know very well, that there are many great deserts in various parts of the East; and in particular a great desert between Babylon and Judea; and as Judea was, in the time of the captivity, an abandoned country, at least as to a great part of it, and the road through that desert might have been much neglected, it is not reasonable to suppose, that the piling up heaps of stones might actually be of considerable importance, to facilitate the return of Israel into their own country? And if not, is it not natural to suppose the difficulties in the way of their return, might be represented by want of such works? And consequently, that that clause should be rendered, not gather out the stones, but throw ye up heaps of stones, that you may be directed in your march through the most difficult and dangerous places where you are to pass. It is certain the word בנה sabkeloo, that is used here is, confessedly, in every other place but one, Is. v. 2, used to signify the throwing stones at a person, after which they were wont to cover them with a heap of them, as a memorial of what was done; see particularly the account of the punishment of Achan, Josh. vii. 25, 26; now it must appear somewhat strange, that the same word should signify gathering stones up in order to take them away, and also, on the contrary, to cover over a person or a spot with them, thrown up on a heap. And especially when the stoning the ways, that is, pouring down heaps of stone, at proper distances, to direct travellers in danger of mistaking their way, is so natural a thought in this passage; while we find few or no traces of the gathering stones out of an eastern road, to make journeying more pleasant to the traveller.—HARMER.

CHAPTER LXIII.

Ver. 1. Who is this that cometh from Edom, with died garments from Bozrah? this that is glorious in his apparel, travelling in the greatness of his strength? I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save. 2. Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the wine-fat? 3. I have trodden the wine-press alone; and of the people, there was none with me: for I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment.

The treading of grapes and olives is a custom to which frequent reference is made by the inspired writers. The glorious Redeemer of the church appeared in a vision to the prophet, in the garb and mien of a mighty conqueror returning in triumph from the field of battle, and drew from him this admiring interrogation: "Who is this that cometh from Edom, with died garments from Bozrah? this that is glorious in his apparel, travelling in the greatness of his strength?" To which the Saviour answers: "I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save." The prophet resumes: "Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the wine-fat?" And Jehovah Jesus replies: "I have trodden the wine-press alone; and of the people, there was none with me; for I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment." As the raiment of the treader was sprinkled with the blood of the grapes, so were the garments of the Redeemer, with the blood of his enemies, that were as effectually and easily crushed by his almighty power, as are the clusters of the vine when fully ripe, beneath the feet of the treader. The same figure is employed in the book of Revelation, to express the decisive and tearful destruction which awaits the man of sin and his coadjutors, that refuse to turn from the error of their way: "And another angel came out from the altar, which had power over fire; and cried with a loud cry to him that had the sharp sickle, saying, Thrust in thy sharp sickle, and gather the clusters of the vine of the earth, and cast it into the great wine-press of the wrath of God. And the wine-press was trodden without the city, and blood came out of the wine-press, even unto the horses' bridles, by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs." The new wines in some places, are always poured into casks that had been kept for ages, and after remaining on the old lees of former years, are drawn off for use, which adds greatly to the quality of the wine. To this practice the words of the prophet evidently refer; "And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined."—PAXTON.

The manner of pressing grapes is as follows: having placed them in a hogshead, a man with naked feet gets in and treads the grapes: in about half an hour's time, the juice is forced out: he then turns the lowest grapes uppermost, and treads them for about a quarter of an hour longer: this is sufficient to squeeze the good juice out of them, for an additional pressure would even crush the unripe grapes, and give the whole a disagreeable flavour.—BUANSA.

Ver. 13. That led them through the deep, as a horse in the wilderness, that they should not stumble? 14. As a beast goeth down into the valley, the Spirit of the LORD causeth him to rest; so didst thou lead thy people, to make thyself a glorious name.

The prophet Isaiah makes an allusion to the horse, which is apt, from the difference of our manners and feelings, to leave an unfavourable impression upon the mind; it occurs in the sixty-third chapter, and runs in these terms: "That led them through the deep, as a horse in the wilderness, that they should not stumble. As a beast goeth down into the valley, the Spirit of the Lord caused him to rest: so didst thou lead thy people, to make thyself a glorious name." If these words be understood as merely referring to the unobstructed course of a single horse in the plain, and the descent of a beast into the valley to repose,—the allusion, more especially considering the general beauty and sublimity which characterize the style of Isaiah, seems rather flat and mean; and this is the more surprising, when it is considered, that the prophet is here describing a scene by which the Lord acquired to himself a glorious name, and which, by consequence, demanded no common strength or magnificence of thought. Nor does it appear for what reason, in order to rest, a herd should descend into a valley; for the hills must be equally pleasing and comfortable places of repose as the vales. We shall find it in the manners of the Arabian, to which the simile refers; and a very little attention is necessary to convince a dispassionate inquirer, that the image is most lively and magnificent.

The original Hebrew term (סוס) sous, in the singular number, denotes both a single horse, and a body of cavalry. In the same manner we use the word horse, to express a single animal of that species, and at other times, the horsemen of an army. In the book of Exodus, sous denotes the horsemen of Pharaoh's army who pursued after the tribes of Israel. But if it denote the horse of an Egyptian army, it may, with equal propriety, denote the horse or cavalry of an Arabian tribe. Now, Arabian horses are remarkable for the surprising swiftness with which they escape the hottest pursuit of their enemies. In two hours after an alarm is given, the Arabs strike their tents, and with their families, and their whole property, plunge into the deepest recesses of their sandy deserts, which the boldest and most exasperated enemy dares not invade. In the time of De la Roque, the great emir of Mount Carmel had a mare which he valued at more than five thousand crowns. The Arabians, it seems, prefer the female to the male because it is more gentle, silent, and able to endure fatigue, hunger, and thirst; qualities in which, they have found from experience, the former excels the latter. The mare which the emir or prince of Carmel rode, had carried him three days and three nights together, without eating or drinking, and by this means effectually saved him from the pursuit of his enemies. This account entirely removes the apparent meanness of the prophetic representation, and imparts a liveliness and dignity to the description. At the moment when Pharaoh and his army thought the people of Israel were completely in their power, shut in by the sea and the mountains, that they could not escape,—like the Arab horsemen, they decamped, and through the sea marched into the desert, whither their enemies were unable to follow. If the Arabian horses are not so sure-footed as the mule, which Dr. Shaw affirms, it will account for the next clause in the same verse: "As a horse in the wilderness, they should not stumble." The departure of Israel from the land of Egypt was sudden, and their movements were rapid, like those of an Arab, whom his enemy has surprised in his camp; yet no misfortune befell them in their retreat, as at times overtakes the swiftest and surest-footed horses. The next verse may be explained by the same custom: "As a beast or herd goeth down into the valley, so the Spirit of the Lord caused him to rest." The Arab, decamping at the first alarm, marches off with his flocks and herds, his wife and children, into the burning deserts. This he does, not from choice, but for safety; and by consequence, how proper and agreeable soever the hills may be for pasturage, in times of alarm or danger, the deep sequestered valley must be far more desirable. The custom of the Arabs in Barbary, stated by Dr. Shaw, finely illustrates this figure. About the middle of the afternoon, his party began to look out for the encampment of some Arabian herds, who, to prevent such numerous parties as his from living at free charges upon them, take care to pitch in woods, valleys, or places the least conspicuous. And he confesses, that if they had not discovered their flocks, the smoke of their tents, or heard the barking of their dogs, they had either not found the encampment at all, or with extreme difficulty.—PAXTON.

CHAPTER LXIV.

Ver. 5. Thou meetest him that rejoiceth and worketh righteousness; those that remember thee in thy ways: behold, thou art wroth; for we have sinned: in those is continuance, and we shall be saved.

Does a man expect a guest for whom he has a great regard, he goes forth to meet him. Not to do so would show a great deficiency in affection and etiquette.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER LXV.

Ver. 3. A people that provoketh me to anger continually to my face; that sacrificeth in gardens, and burneth incense upon altars of brick.

See on ch. 1. 29.

Ver. 4. Which remain among the graves, and lodge in the monuments; which eat swine's flesh, and broth of abominable things is in their vessels; 5. Which say, Stand by thyself, come not near to me; for I am holier than thou. These are a smoke in my nose, a fire that burneth all the day.

"Come not near to me, for I am holier than thou." Here we have another instance of the glaring wickedness of the Jews, in their imitation of the heathen devotes, who resembled the Hindoo Yogees. Those men are so isolated by their superstition and penances, that they hold but little intercourse with the rest of mankind. They wander about in the dark in the place of burning the dead, or "among the graves;" there they affect to hold converse with evil and other spirits; and there they pretend to receive intimations respecting the destinies of others. They will eat things which are religiously clean or unclean; they neither wash their bodies, nor comb their hair, nor cut their nails, nor wear clothes. They are counted to be most holy, among the people, and are looked upon as beings of another world.

—ROBERTS.

Ver. 22. For as the days of the tree are the days of my people.

The people of the East have a particular desire for long life; hence one of their best and most acceptable wishes is, "May you live a thousand years." "May you live as long as the oali-tree," i. e. the banyan or ficus indica. I never saw a tree of that description dead, except when struck by lightning. And to cut one down would, in the estimation of a Hindu, be almost as great a sin as the taking of life. I do not think this tree will die of itself, because it continues to fall its own supporters, and will march over acres of land if not interrupted. Under its gigantic branches the beasts of the forests screen themselves from the heat of the sun; and under its sacred shade may be seen the most valued temples of the Hindus.—ROBERTS.

CHAPTER LXVI.

Ver. 12. For thus saith the LORD, Behold, I will extend peace to her like a river, and the glory of the Gentiles like a flowing stream: then shall ye suck, ye shall be borne upon her sides, and be dandled upon her knees. 13. As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you; and ye shall be comforted in Jerusalem.

The native females of South Africa, when at home, literally carry about their children on their side, putting one leg of the child behind, and the other before her, and resting on the upper part of the hip. The child clings to her side, and from the prolongation of her breasts, the mother can conveniently suckle it, without moving it from its place. When I saw this done, it had always a very affectionate appearance. When they travel, or are fleeing from an enemy, they carry their children on their back, under their cloak, their heads only being visible. The females in the South Sea Islands have the same custom. Whether that part of the passage has an allusion to a similar practice existing among Jewish females, I know not; but this I know, that on witnessing the African custom, I thought of the above text, which refers to a peaceful and prosperous period, when God should act in the kindest manner towards his ransomed people. To me, when I saw it, it had the appearance of peace, security, and affection.—CAMPELLE.

Ver. 17. They that sanctify themselves, and purify themselves in the gardens, behind one tree in the midst, eating swine's flesh, and the abomination, and the mouse, shall be consumed together, saith the LORD.

Not only sacred groves in general, but the centres of such groves in special, were, as the Abbé Banier has observed, made use of for temples by the first and most ancient heathens. Some one tree in the centre of each such grove was usually had in more eminent and special veneration, being made the penetral or more sacred place, which, doubtless, they intended as the anti-symbol of the tree of life, and of the knowledge of good and evil, in the midst of the garden of Eden. To this strange abuse alludes that prophetic censure of some, who sanctified and purified themselves with the waters of their sacred fountains and rivers in the gardens or groves, behind one tree in the midst.—BURDEA.

Ver. 20. And they shall bring all your brethren for an offering unto the LORD, out of all nations, upon horses, and in chariots, and in litters, and upon mules, and upon swift beasts, to my holy mountain Jerusalem, saith the LORD, as the children of Israel bring an offering in a clean vessel into the house of the LORD.

The editor of the Ruins of Palmyra tells us, that the caravan they formed, to go to that place, consisted of about two hundred persons, and about the same number of beasts of carriage, which were an odd mixture of horses, camels, mules, and asses; but there is no account of any vehicle drawn on wheels in that expedition; nor do we find an account of such things in other eastern journeys. There are, however, some vehicles among them used for the sick, or for persons of high distinction. So PITS observes, in his account of his return from Mecca, that at the head of each division some great gentleman or officer was carried in a thing like a horse-litter, borne by two camels, one before and another behind, which was covered all over with scarloth, and over that again with green broadcloth, and set forth very handsomely. If he had a wife attending him, she was carried in another. This is apparently a mark of distinction. There is another eastern vehicle used in their journeys, which Thevenot calls a coune. He tells us, the counes are hamper, like cradles, carried upon camels' backs, one on each side, having a back, head, and sides, like the great chairs sick people sit in. A man rides in each of these counes, and over them they lay a covering, which keeps them both from the rain and sun, leaving, as it were, a window before and behind upon the camel's back. The riding in these is also, according to MAILLET, a mark of distinction; for, speaking of the pilgrimage to Mecca, he says ladies of any figure have litters; others are carried sitting in chairs, made like covered cages, hanging on both sides of a camel; and as for ordinary women, they are mounted on camels without such conveniences, after the manner of the Arab women, and cover themselves from sight, and the heat of the sun, as well as they can, with their veils. These are the vehicles which are in present use in the Levant. Coaches, on the other hand, Dr. RUSSEL assures us, are not in use at Aleppo; nor do we meet with any account of their commonly using them in any other part of the East: but one would imagine, that if ever such conveniences as coaches had been in use, they would not have been laid aside in countries where ease and elegance are so much consulted.

As the caravans of the returning Israelites are described by the prophet, as composed, like Mr. Dawkin's to Palmyra, of horses and mules, and swift beasts; so are we to understand, I imagine, the other terms of the litters and counes, rather than of coaches, which the margin mentions; or of covered wagons, which some Dutch commentators suppose one of the words may signify, unluckily transferring the customs of their own country to the East; or of chariots, in our common sense of the word. For though our translators have given us the word chariot, in many passages of scripture, those wheel-vehicles which those writers speak of, and which our version renders chariots, seem to have been mere warlike machines; nor do we ever read of ladies riding in them. On the other hand, a word derived from the same original is made use of for a seat any how moved, such as the mercy-seat, 1 Chron. xxxviii. 18, where our translators have used the word chariot, but which was no more of a chariot, in the common sense of the word, than a litter is; it is made use of also for that sort of seat mentioned Lev. xv. 9, which they have rendered saddle, but which seems to mean a litter, or a coune. In these vehicles many of the Israelites were to be conducted, according to the prophet, not on the account of sickness, but to mark out the eminence of those Jews, and to express the great respect their conductors should have for them.—HARMER.

JEREMIAH.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 11. Moreover, the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, Jeremiah, what seest thou? And I said, I see a rod of an almond-tree.

12. Then said the LORD unto me, Thou hast well seen: for I will hasten my word to perform it.
